The above, feebly conveyed perhaps to the reader, may be considered THE LAST WORDS OF A PHILOSOPHER. They made an impression on my mind which has never been effaced; and I trust never will. The reader need not suspect him of "prosing." The above were uttered with no pompous, swelling, pedantic swagger of manner, but with the simplest, most modest air, and in the most silvery tones of voice I ever listened to. He often paused, from faintness; and at the conclusion, his voice grew almost inaudible, and he wiped the thick-standing dew from his forehead. He begged me, in a low whisper, to kneel down, and read him one of the church prayers—the one appointed for those in prospect of death: I took down the prayer-book, and complied, though my emotions would not suffer me to speak in more than an often-interrupted whisper. He lay perfectly silent throughout, with his clasped hands pointing upwards; and when I had concluded, he responded feebly, but fervently, "Amen—Amen!"—and the tears gushed down his cheeks. My heart was melted within me. The silk cap had slipped from his head, and his long loose silvery hair streamed over his bed-dress: his appearance was that of a dying prophet of old! But I find I am going on at too great length for the reader's patience, and must pause. For my own part I could linger over the remembrances of these solemn scenes for ever; but I shall hasten on to the "last scene of all." It did not take place till near a fortnight after the interview above narrated. His manner during that time evinced no tumultuous ecstasies of soul; none of the boisterous extravagance of enthusiasm. His departure was like that of the sun, sinking gradually and finally, lower—lower—lower—no sudden up-flashings—no quivering—no flickering unsteadiness about his fading rays!

Tuesday, 13th October.—Miss E—— sent word that her uncle appeared dying, and had expressed a wish to see both Dr D—— and me. I therefore dispatched a note to Dr D——, requesting him to meet me at a certain place, and then hurried through my list of calls, so as to have finished by three o'clock. By four we were both in the room of the dying philosopher. Miss E—— sat by his bedside, her eyes swollen with weeping, and was in the act of kissing her uncle's cheek when we entered. Mr E——, an exemplary clergyman, who had been one of E——'s earliest and dearest friends, sat at the foot of the bed, with a copy of Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying," from which he was reading in a low tone, at the request of E——. The appearance of the latter was very interesting. At his own instance, he had not long before been shaved, washed, and had a change of linen; and the bed was also but recently made, and was not at all tumbled or disordered. The mournful tolling of the church-bell for a funeral was also heard at intervals, and added to the solemnity of the scene. I have seldom felt in such a state of excitement as I was on first entering the room. He shook hands with each of us, or rather we shook his hands, for he could hardly lift them from the bed. "Well—thank you for coming to bid me farewell!"

said he, with a smile; adding presently, "Will you allow Mr F—— to proceed with what he is reading?" Of course we nodded, and sat in silence, listening. I watched E——'s features; they were much wasted—but exhibited no traces of pain. His eye, though rather sunk in the socket, was full of the calmness and confidence of unwavering hope, and often directed upwards with a devout expression. A most heavenly serenity was diffused over his countenance. His lips occasionally moved, as if in the utterance of prayer. When Mr F—— had closed the book, the first words uttered by E—— were, "Oh! the infinite goodness of God!"

"Do you feel that your 'anchor' is within the veil?" enquired F——.

"Oh!—yes—yes!—My vessel is steadily moored—the tide of life goes fast away—I am forgetting that I ever sailed on its sea!" replied E——, closing his eyes.

"The star of faith shines clearest in the night of expiring nature!" exclaimed F——.

"The Sun—the Sun of faith, say rather," replied E——, in a tone of fervent exultation; "it turns my night into day—it warms my soul—it rekindles my energies!—Sun—sun of righteousness!"—he exclaimed, faintly. Miss E—— kissed him repeatedly with deep emotion. "Emma, my love!" he whispered, "hope thou in God! See how he will support thee in death!"—She burst into tears.—"Will you promise me, love, to read the little Bible I gave you when I am gone—especially the New Testament?"—Do—do, love."

"I will—I——," replied Miss E——, almost choked with her emotions. She could say no more.

"Dr ——," he addressed me, "I feel more towards you than I can express; your services—services——" he grew very pale and faint. I rose and poured out a glass of wine, and put it to his lips. He drank a few tea-spoonfuls, and it revived him.

"Well!" he exclaimed, in a stronger voice than I had before heard him speak. "I thank God I leave in perfect peace with all mankind! There is but one thing that grieves me—the general neglect of religion among men of science." Dr D—— said it must afford him great consolation to reflect on the steadfast regard for religion which he himself had always evidenced. "No, no—I have gone nearly as far astray as any of them; but God's rod has brought me back again. I thank God devoutly, that he ever afflicted me as I have been afflicted through life—He knows I do!" * * * Some one mentioned the prevalence of materialism. He lamented it bitterly; but assured us that several of the most eminent men of the age—naming them—believed firmly in the immateriality and immortality of the human soul.

"Do you feel firmly convinced of it—on natural and philosophical grounds?" enquired Dr D——.

"I do; and have, ever since I instituted an enquiry on the subject. I think the difficulty is to believe the reverse—when it is owned on all hands, that nothing in Nature's changes suggests the idea of annihilation. I own that doubts have very often crossed my mind on the subject—but could never see the reason of them!"

"But your confidence does not rest on the barren grounds of reason," said I; "you believe Him who brought 'life and immortality' into the world."

"Yes—'Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!'"

"Do you never feel a pang of regret at leaving life?" I enquired.

"No, no, no!" he replied with emphasis; "life and I are grown unfit for each other! My sympathies—my hopes—my joys, are too large for it! Why should I, just got into the haven, think of risking shipwreck again?"

* * * * *

He lay still for nearly twenty minutes without speaking. His breathing was evidently accomplished with great difficulty; and when his eyes occasionally fixed on any of us, we perceived that their expression was altered. He did not seem to see what he looked at. I noticed his fingers also slowly twitching or scratching the bed-clothes. Still the expression of his features was calm and tranquil as ever. He was murmuring something in Miss E——'s ear; and she whispered to us, that he said, "Don't go—I shall want you at six." Within about a quarter of six o'clock, he enquired where Emma was, and Dr D——, and Mr F——, and myself. We severally answered, that we sat around him.

"I have not seen you for the last twenty minutes. Shake hands with me!" We did. "Emma, my sweet love! put your arm round my neck—I am cold, cold." Her tears fell fast on his face. "Don't cry, love—don't—I am quite happy!—God—God—bless you, love!"

His lower jaw began to droop a little.

Mr F——, moved almost to tears, rose from his chair, and noiselessly knelt down beside him.

"Have faith in our Lord Jesus Christ!" he exclaimed, looking steadfastly into his face.

"I do!" he answered distinctly, while a faint smile stole over his drooping features.

"Let us pray!" whispered Mr F——; and we all knelt down in silence. I was never so overpowered in my life. I thought I should have been choked with suppressing my emotions. "O Lord, our heavenly Father!" commenced Mr F——, in a low tone, "receive thou the spirit of this our dying brother——." E—— slowly elevated his left hand, and kept it pointing upwards for a few moments, when it suddenly dropped, and a long deep respiration announced that this great and good man had breathed his last!

No one in the room spoke or stirred for several minutes; and I almost thought I could hear the beatings of our hearts. He died within a few moments of six o'clock. Yes—there lay the sad effigy of our deceased "guide, philosopher, and friend;"—and yet, why call it sad? I could detect no trace of sadness in his features—he had left in peace and joy; he had lived well, and died as he had lived. I can now appreciate the force of that prayer of one of old—"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

There was some talk among his friends of erecting a tablet to his memory in Westminster Abbey; but it has been dropped. We soon lose the recollection of departed excellence, if it require any thing like active exertion.

IGNORANCE ON THE FINE ARTS.

No. II.

We now return in our ignorance to the exposition of the Fine Arts of old in England.

On ancient English painting our friend Allan gives a rapid and vigorous sketch; scanty enough, indeed, but ex nihilo nihil fit. The shallow rill was lost in desert sands, and the true fountain of British Art arose in the 18th century. Whatever may be decided as to the authenticity of Ossian or Tasso, they certainly were not the fathers of modern British verse.

Religious painting of some sort or other was introduced by St Benedict Biscop, the friend and early preceptor of the venerable Bede, whose history you have read in Southey's Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae, or if not, pray do. He ornamented the church of Wearmouth with the Visions of the Apocalypse. It would be curious, if it were possible, to compare those said Visions at Wearmouth with Mr West's Death on the Pale Horse, and other pieces taken from the same mysterious source in later times, all of which, whatever their historical merits, seem to fall into the same error of presenting simultaneously objects which the Prophet must have seen in succession. But it is quite impossible to paint a Vision, far more to convey to waking uninspired sense, the power and import of a Prophet's vision. The best that can be achieved in that kind is as impotent as the black pages in Tristram Shandy to portray primeval darkness. Of St Benedict, however, Mr Cunningham says nothing, but begins his survey with Henry the Third, a timid and pious king, who founded many Cathedrals, and enriched them with sculpture and painting, to an extent, and with a skill that merited the commendation of Flaxman. The royal instructions of 1233 are curious, and inform us of the character of art at that remote period, and of the subordinate condition of its professors. In Italy, indeed, as well as in England, an artist was then, and long after, considered as a mere mechanic. He was commonly at once a carver of wood, a maker of figures, a house and heraldry painter, a carpenter, an upholsterer, and a mason; and sometimes, over and above all this, he was a tailor. This seems to surprise and offend Allan; but, for my part, I am so far from wondering that artists were tailors in the fourteenth century, that I regret that tailors are not artists in the nineteenth, and fearlessly affirm that no human being is fit to be tailor, mantua-maker, milliner, corset-maker, coiffeur, or even so much as to dress his own hair, who has not a taste for the arts of design. Are not the greatest masters almost as much celebrated for their draperies as for their nudes? Does not the tailor, as well as the artist, require much knowledge of colour, much skill of hand, much experience in human character, an acquaintance with anatomy, a smattering of geometry, a fine sense of beauty, and adroitness at flattery, a nice observance of complexions, dexterity in concealing the defects of nature, and the talent of displaying and imitating her perfections? Does not a comely costume require a variety of parts, a unity in the whole, a harmony of colours, a tone, a fitness, a just magnitude, a proportion, a characteristic expression, suited to the age, country, profession, aspect, height, and manner of the wearer? If Albert Durer drew mathematically, and published a book of proportions for the instruction of his trade—our modern costumiers take measure by algebra, and cut out by diagrams. If a perfect connoisseur can ascertain the merits and dimensions of a colossus, of which no part is extant but the great toe, Snip can do more—he can make you an impeccable pair of inexpressibles, by simply taking the girth of your thumb. It would contribute marvellously, not only to the grace of our beaux, but to the health of our belles, if their advisers in affairs of dress had studied the antique, read Sir Joshua's Lectures and Hogarth's Analysis, and imbibed the principles of the Italian masters. So might they learn what to aim at—any fashionable assembly will shew them what to shun.

As the colouring of a picture may be at once chaste and rich, so may a dress be splendid, and yet simple. Bad pictures are often both tawdry and dingy—so are ill-dressed people.

With regard to all drapery, whether stitched, painted, or carved, one rule is absolute—it should never challenge a separate attention, but seem a necessary congenital part of the person. Clothes, if we think of them on ourselves, must be uncomfortable—if in others, indecorous. The draperies of mere drapery-painters remind us of the silks and velvets displayed some years ago at Brandenburg-house, or a Sabbath-breaking Cockney in his Sunday toggery—or, to come nearer to the point, a lay figure in real clothes. Ill-fashioned garments have always more or less of this fault; you can neither wear them, nor see them worn, without thinking of them. But the best and most graceful offend on the same ground, if, however well-fashioned, they be very much out of the fashion, or anywise unsuitable to the age, rank, or character of the wearer. Sombre habits in a dashing woman of fashion have the effect of a disguise. It is possible to dress too plain for modesty.

Sir Joshua advises that drapery should be neither silk, satin, gros de Naples, velvet, plush, sarsenet, calico, cambric, paduasoy, corduroy, bombazine, buckaback, nor any other fabric or manufacture. It should be drapery, and nothing else—a wise precept, which the tailor cannot follow to the letter, but to the spirit whereof he will do well to attend. To prove that I am not singular in my views of this subject, it is only necessary to mention that certain ladies consulted Kent, the universal genius, painter, architect, and landscape-gardener, about their birthday suits; and the wicked wag arrayed one in a petticoat, decorated with columns of the five orders, and another in a bronze-coloured satin, with ornaments of gold.

In sober sadness, and conscious ignorance, I cannot conceive the mere colourist, or even the designer, who works for the eye alone,—whose designs contain neither poetry nor sense, and communicate neither knowledge nor power,—as anywise superior to a tailor. His craft may, or may not, be the more difficult of the two; but Snip's is undoubtedly the more useful. As for the sensual pleasure which colour is capable of affording, Titian himself was a fool to the waned and watered, glossy, light-catching, ever-varying hues of the silken bales, for which hungry Spitalfields too often receives the wages of starvation. Every vagrant Autolycus,—“each wandering merchant bent beneath his load,”—exposes to the covetous eyes of the village lass more gorgeous tints than ever lay on mortal palette!

To proceed. When the arts were reviving in Italy, England, occupied with foreign and domestic wars, oppressed in her trade, exhausted in her treasury, devoted to ruin, expense, and senseless ostentation, profited not by the example. Italy exported Bulls and Legates a Ceitere, but kept the painters at home; yet, in the age of Chaucer, a great artist would not have been neglected. The third Edward was magnificent; his unfortunate grandson was profuse. John of Gaunt was the patron of Chaucer, but whether as poet or painter, does not appear. Richard II. noticed Gower.* What “art

- * In Thames, when it was flowing,
As I by boat came rowing;
So as Fortune her time set,
My liege lord perchance I met,
And so befell, as I came nigh,
Out of my boat, when he me sigh—i.e. saw,
He had me come into his barge,
But when I was with him at large,
Amongst other things he said,
He hath this charge upon me laid,
Some new thing I should book,
That he himself might on it look.

Confessio Amantis

The earlier copies of this strange poem contain many flattering notices of Richard which the old bard thought proper afterwards to expunge when that unhappy prince had lost the popularity to which he “entitled himself,” and for which he forfeited authority and respect.

Poets, vain men, in their mood,
Travel with the multitude.

Yet it was not much to Gower's credit, after receiving such condescension from his hapless sovereign, to hail the accession of the usurper Bolingbroke, in vile Leonine, or rather Ameline verse. The author who hesitates in established sovereignty, has at least custom to plead for his folly; but he that hastens to salute the pariah of revolution, runs the risk of being derided as a false prophet, and despised as a sycophant. Poets, it seems, could be as base in the fourteenth century as in the nineteenth. Nay, I will tearfully aver, that the moral character of fine literature was never so high or so pure as at present.

Gower has of late found a sturdy patron in Sharon Turner, who seems inclined to set him on a level at least with Chaucer. Sharon is a sensible man, a patient investigator of the past. English history is much indebted to his labours; but he is not quite free from that amiable partiality which we all are apt to feel for what is peculiarly our own. Well did Elia observe, one cannot make a pet of a book that every body reads. But a book that nobody has read but one's self, and perhaps half a dozen of one's particular friends, becomes part of one's personality—“bone of my bone.” Sir William Jones equalled Euripides to Homer, and thought the Scaentala worthy of Euripides, Racine, or Shakspeare. Probably Dr Bowring thinks the Russian anthology superior to the Greek.

According to “ancient Gower,” love-making in his time must have been a very serious and erudite business; for his Confessio Amantis—a conversation between a young lover and the Priest of Venus—seems to be a metrical encyclopædia,—a brief, tedious abstract of the omne scibile,—a compendium of all the dogmas then extant. Some of the love-tales, however, are related with much truth and simple pathos. Gower had certainly been in love himself; but whether he found alchemy and logic very serviceable in his courtship, is rather there was, lack'd not encouragement." Painting partook of the warlike spirit of the time, and became martial, instead of religious. But a passion for gilded banners and surcoats of arms, is not a taste for art. St Edward is as good a subject as St George; and the Wiverus of Heraldry are as far removed from la belle Nature, as the Dragons of the Apocalypse. In fact, kings and princes cannot make artists; they can only employ and pay them; and mere pageantry is so far from art, that it hardly implies civilization. Well does Milton speak of "barbaric pearl and gold." The spirit of art is proud, and brooks not the condition of a pampered menial; hence, though it may spring, and grow, and flourish amid war and tumult, and even survive under a despotism—under a military aristocracy, it scarce can lift its head. It must be loved, honoured, esteemed, for its own sake—not fed, flattered, and despised. The knights and barons bold might be liberal, as the better kind of thieves generally are, to the minstrels who lauded their vices, and would have rewarded the limner who could emblazon images of blood or sensuality, as well as the largitores rapinae commonly reward the instruments of their pleasures; but they cannot confer dignity. These haughty lords dubious. The leading idea of his Confessio is this—that the suitor, to be worthy of his mistress, should be furnished, not only with every moral and Christian virtue, but with all divine and human learning, with every feat of skill, and every device of wit. Mr Turner has given copious extracts, which will probably satisfy the curious reader. He that wants more of the "moral Gower," will find the whole of his English works in the second volume of Chalmers's collection. His French verses, entitled Petit Chantre, and his Latin Rhyming Chronicle, have not, to my knowledge, been printed. The Vox Clamantis is a half-historical, half-allegorical description of Wat Tyler's insurrection, and the disorders consequent thereon. It may contain some curious information, and should be carefully and learnedly edited at the public expense. Gower could not tell his tale of domestic troubles without converting it into a vision. This daring omnambulist-fashon then in vogue, has of late been copied by poets, who have gone to sleep to dream over what they had read in the Times or the Annual Register,—to be informed, supernaturally, of the contents of the London Gazette, ordinarily. It is remarkable, that almost all the allegorical compositions of the middle ages begin with a description of the weather, or the time of the year—a custom followed in the "Induction to the Mirror for Magistrates," and in the prologues to Guinevere, Dostoevsky's Enid. The Vox Clamantis accordingly begins with a florid delineation of summer, as Wat Tyler's rebellion broke out in June 1381. The poet innocently goeth forth to pick flowers, falls asleep, and dreams that a huge multitude of men-monsters, in the shape of wolves, apes, swine, &c., advanced towards him—who for their leader chose a fly, called Wat—committed terrible havoc, and drove well-disposed persons—himself among the rest—to the woods and caves. His Wat, whom he sets forth as "Vox tenuis, trux vultus, verisima mortis imago," bears small resemblance to the sighing sentimental Reformer, the Wat Tyler of antieptatious notoriety. The poem proceeds with a satirical description of the vices of the times—not exactly in the manner of the "Age," a poem; or the "Age Reviewed," a satire; or even of the "Reigning Vice"—and concludes with earnestly exhorting Richard to a radical reform of himself. As a specimen of Gower's Latin versification.

Sylvæ vetus densa, nulla violata securi,
Absque supercilio, nila nubes sub tegumento;
Nulla superficies tunc, quia trita fuit,
Perque dies aliquot latitens omnemque tremescens
Ad strepitum sagi, visa pericla cavens.

These verses would hardly escape flogging at Eton.

Gower seems to have been a man of considerable wealth, which he devoted and bequeathed to pious purposes. Like most of our early writers, characterised at least as much by the gaiety of age as the simplicity of childhood, "full of wise saws and modern instances," an endless story-teller, who could conjure a Christian meaning into a heathen fable, and evoke a heavy moral from a light love-tale; a very honest man—politics excepted—with a fair allowance of honest self-importance; a severe censor of his age, which was indeed a bad one; and a bold monitor of his king, when that king was too feeble to resent the indignity.

might have sense enough to admire genius; but the pride of caste would never allow them to esteem it.

Vanity is a bad patron, and Superstition a much worse. It is a great mistake that Popery was the nurse of modern painting; the more rigid Romanists are, and always were, as averse to real art as the Puritans themselves. Individual Popes, and wealthy orders, doubtless, encouraged painting; but this supposed misappropriation of church-treasures did not escape censure. Superstition is the child of Fear—the basest, cruellest, blindest, stupidest passion in human nature. It represents the Deity as an ugly and malignant Demon; sees nothing but evil and deformity in the works of God. How, then, should it imprint beauty on the works of man? Idolatry, and her elder sister Allegory, have spawned more monsters than ever sprung from Medusa's Gorgon blood. Nothing can be meaner or more hideous than the daubs and dolls to which the Papists fall down. Raphael's Madonnas work no miracles. In truth, the church of Rome has been as much divided against itself, as ever the Protestant Miscellany. There are High-church Catholics, and Low-church Catholics, bigots, and liberals, poetical enthusiasts, vulgar fanatics, and Utilitarian prosemen, united, it may be, by a nominal adherence, to Lord Peter, but far enough from being of one mind, either about religious painting or any thing else.

After all, the most interesting artists of the Middle Ages were not the professors, with their omniogenous qualifications, but the monks and the ladies. The illuminated missals, and other manuscripts—as finely pencilled as time and patience could make them—as gay as gilt and glowing colours must be—not always so decorous as work of holy hand should be—have a value, which does not invariably pertain to the chef-d'œuvres of the classic schools—one may learn a great deal from them. From these, and the unceasing fulminations of the pulpit against excess of apparel, together with the yet more inefficient sumptuary laws, we find that our wise ancestors were even more expensive, and far more absurd and indecent, in arraying their persons, than the most degenerate of their descendants. We discover something of their way of living, which was far more genial and comfortable than we are apt to suppose. We may form some notion of their prevailing cast of features. Above all, the existence of such laborious luxuries of the eye, is a consoling fact. To read the books called Histories, we might imagine that murder and arson, tyranny and fraud, usurpation and persecution, were the sole employments of mankind—that the great were all wicked, and the poor all miserable. It is pleasant, therefore, to find that men have always had some leisure—that a few have ever been able to look out of their windows with calm, observant eyes—and that many can be amused with trifles in the worst of times—that is, at all times—which, thank God, are not half so bad as some malcontents would persuade us. Many of these curiosities were destroyed at the Reformation, which, like all great changes, was brought about by the combined agency of the best spirits and the worst. Whether the havoc of that era proceeded from misguided zeal, and indiscreet imitation of the Israelites, or from the mobbish love of destruction, incited, as usual, by cold-blooded speculators in plunder, for us it is most wise to consider it as the price of a benefit, which could not be purchased too dear. It is some consolation, too, that we had no works of art worth regretting. We have cathedrals still in beauty and perfection; and though some are in ruins, they are not less honourable—perhaps more honoured, and certainly more poetical and picturesque. But the tapestry and embroidery, the curious needlework, the labours of the graphic loom, which employed the well-pricked fingers of the dames of old, could excite no religious animosity; but worms, and damp, and fire, and change of fashions, and perhaps more than all, the gold and silver thread which they contained, have mingled most of these products of domestic industry with the mass of things that were. But it is by no means true, as Mr Cunningham asserts, that this branch of art is entirely neglected at present. The ladies do not, indeed, work battle-pieces, or Scripture-pieces, or naked gods, in worsted, mohair, or silk; but flowers, fruit, and birds of gorgeous plumage, lions, tigers, and giraffes, grow daily beneath their hands; and very pretty they are. We have watched their progress many a time. We can remember, too, when the cozy parlour of a country inn, or the triangular sanctum of a respectable shopkeeper, was never without some garniture of this kind, with the fair artist' name (generally a pretty name) ingeniously interwoven. We think, by the way, that Delia, and Daphne, and Strephon, with all the paraphernalia of Cupids, arrows, crooks, and sheep, never look so natural as when stitched in worsted. Needlework is the pastoral poetry of design. A snug room hung round with tapestry is the truest Arcadia.

But we loiter in these bypaths and flowery lanes—fugit irreparabile tempus—it is past twelve, and we are still in the 14th century. If you please, we will pass on to the year 1526, when Holbein arrived in England; and for the first time our dear little Isle entertained a great painter. He was a native of Basle; but finding the salubrious influences of native air counteracted by an over-rating wife and an under-rating public, he came to the court of bluff King Harry. His first English patron was the Earl of Arundel—a title to which art owes something, and chronology more.

Hans is commonly regarded as a literal prosaic portrait-painter, who drew correctly what he saw, but saw only with every-day eyes, and made a dead map of the human countenance,—devoid of all that makes beauty charming, or irregularity characteristic. Those who have seen his "Dance of Death," will not readily believe that he wanted invention. He who could impart expression to a skull, and intellectual interest to all varieties of corruption, could scarce be a mechanical matter-of-fact person. Neither is it true that his portraits are without meaning, though they may not be distinguished for grace. They are like what his sitters for the most part were, and were content to be represented—kings, queens, lords, and ladies, not divinities, nor very amiable men and women. But when he had a worthy subject, he could do ample justice—witness his Sir Thomas More, in whom he has combined, what seldom meet, regular beauty, with the cast of thought,—dignity with benevolence,—the air of rank with the stamp of individuality. It is beautifully engraved in Southey's Colloquies, and is very like the apparition. Hans did not flatter Henry, whom he has made as fat, sensual, cruel, and clever, as the life itself; he could flatter, however, as King Harry found in the case of Anne of Cleves, whose Teutonic bulk drew forth that well-known exclamation of the Defender of the Faith, which proves that kings were less courteous in days of yore than at present; a Flanders mare had been too good a wife for him. He had good brains, however, and knew something of value, if the following anecdote be true: "One day, while the artist was painting in private the portrait of a favourite lady for the king, a great lord unexpectedly found his way into the chamber. The painter, a brawny, powerful man, and somewhat touchy of temper, threw the intruder down stairs, bolted the door, ran to the king by a private passage, fell on his knees, asked for pardon, and obtained it. In came the courtier, and made his complaint. 'By God's splendour,' exclaimed the king, 'you have not to do with Hans, but with me. Of seven peasants I can make seven lords, but I cannot make one Hans Holbein.'" It is traditionally asserted that Henry employed Holbein to paint the portraits of the fairest young ladies in his kingdom, that in case of the queen patient playing the provoked wife, he might go and choose from his gallery. There is no knowing what such a king might do,—but what need of portraits, when he could command the originals?

The love of title and precedence is the besetting sin of womanhood, but surely no good woman would willingly have been Henry's wife—even to be England's queen? Bluebeard, or the Sultan Schahriar, or the Prince of Camboj, "who nightly stinks a queen to death," would have been a preferable spouse.

Holbein died of the plague in 1554. Allan has thought it worth while to tell us, that he wrought with the left hand. He is perfectly right,—let the left hand not lose the credit of so much excellence.

"He had a strong frame, a swarthy sensual face, and a neck like a bull." His works were once more numerous in England than at present; some were destroyed during the civil wars, some sold abroad by the Puritan Parliament, and many perished when Whitehall was burned. That his portraits are stiff, is historically a merit—they represent folks that had nothing easy about them. With such costumes, such morals, such politics, and such religion, what could people be but stiff? The gradual influence of truth, liberty, and Christian charity, were needed to give elasticity to the limbs, and play to the features.

It is no trivial circumstance in the history of art to record how artists were paid. Allan, we think, is wrong in supposing that the arts were necessarily in a low condition, when some artists were paid by the square foot. Duodecimals are not more arbitrary than popular taste. Many have been the painters who would have rejoiced to be remunerated by so equitable a standard. Besides, the instances he produces refer chiefly to the ornamenting of public buildings, painted windows, &c. which have ever been consigned to the trading branch of the profession. Painters are, and always were, better paid than poets. Trading painters and trading authors can only expect to receive value for quantity. Literature is not universally degraded because certain penmen are recompensed at the rate of a penny a-line; and are not splendid articles written monthly for ten and even five guineas per sheet?

"Painting maintained its place in popular estimation during the brief and guilty reign of Mary." Its place in popular estimation was probably low enough—the Romanist thought it mechanical, and the Protestant damnable. "Sir Antonio More received from Philip for his portrait of the Queen a chain of gold, with the more substantial addition of L.400 a-year as painter to the King." If Sir Antonio painted the traditional likeness of bloody Mary, he was no flatterer. She is old and ugly enough for a frontispiece to the Book of Martyrs. Mr Cunningham has doubtless sufficient vouchers for his facts; but one would scarce have suspected Philip of loving his wife well enough to give away chains for her vinegar features; and if Sir Antonio received L.400, he was better paid than he could possibly deserve. Holbein's pension was only two hundred florins.

How happy had it been for Mary had she died a nun, or sunk uncrowned beneath the weight of royal sorrow! The comfort of a worse than widowed mother—the dutious daughter of a father who disowned and bastardized her, the devoted confessor of an oppressed and plundered church, she had been a saint to the generous Protestant no less than to the sympathizing Catholic, had her rival's success consigned her to the cloister, or the overthrow of her religion to a grave. The Princess Mary had been consecrated to memory had the Queen Mary never reigned. Sir Antonio seems to have loved the savour of human sacrifice, for he accompanied Philip to Spain, and subsequently held an office under the Duke of Alva, whose favour he conciliated by portraits of favourite ladies—no solitary instance of the Miltonic juxtaposition of "lust and hate." At length he betook himself to the receipt of custom in West Flanders, and forsook an art to which he was probably no ornament.

Advancing to the golden days of good Queen Bess, we feel as one that, after long wandering in the uncertain twilight of a subterraneous ruin, and guessting at the mutilated images and outworn inscriptions, steps at once into cheerful day, and bails familiar forms of living beauty. We hear our own language—we find ourselves among men of like passions as ourselves. The age of Cressy and Poitiers, of Langland, Gower," and Chaucer, was the Soobhi Kazim of England, that premature and short-lived dawn which the fanciful Persian ascribes to the sun's peeping through a hole in Mount Caucasus—which but forebodes and typifies the real daybreak. An interim of deep and perilous darkness ensued—the unseen righteousness of heaven made human wickedness perform the needful work which good men cannot do. The strongholds of iniquity were shaken by the gloomy earthquake; and then, the pure light that sets not till even—that shall not set till angels sing the vespers of this earth—came forth in power and glory. Happier days have been before and since, than the days of Elizabeth. Much as we owe to the men of her time, it was no time to make us murmur at that irrevocable decree beyond the power of Jove to alter, which forbids the past to return. It was a time to think, to dream, to read—not to live in. But it is doubtful whether any period since the flood has been so favourable to the development of the poetic imagination. It was the true age of chivalry. Chivalry never existed but in the imaginations of poets, and in the noble desires of men who aspired to realize the inventions of the poets. The Chevalier Bayard and Sir Philip Sidney were only a more rational kind of Quixotes—men brave by nature, actuated by impulses unconsciously imbibed from romantic fiction, who had conceived an idea, and died in the attempt to make it an historic fact. But chivalry was only one element in the orb of poetry. Religion had made every man think of himself—of himself not only as a living, but as an immortal being. It had given an import to every motion, every throb of the individual heart. Character, which among the ancients was ever deemed a defect, a falling away from the standard of abstract humanity, a theme of ridicule, the proper staff of satire and comedy, assumed a tragic dignity; it was seen that each man involves in his own peculiar nature a distinct ideal—and that the perfection of one is no more the perfection of another, than the beauty of the lily is the beauty of the cedar. Yet, amid all this diversity of ministrations, this endless variety of hue and lineament, religion taught, confirmed, and consecrated the mighty truth, that "one touch of nature makes the whole world kin." The daily goings on of our business and bosoms began to partake of that interest which of old pertained only to those massy operations, in which the bulk of mankind are and can be no more than blind agents or passive sufferers. The kindly affections which, according to the Houyhnhm philosophy of the heathens, and the Manichean dogmas of the monks, were at best but tolerated weaknesses or venial sins, were sublimed to holy duties; and human creatures, heretofore considered but as the perishing moments composing the permanent being of a commonwealth, discovered in themselves a principle of duration, compared to which the boasted solidity of states and institutions was a vain and a fleeting thing. The controversies of the time, however profitless in themselves, gave a strength, an agility, a subtle and penetrative quality to thought, which—now no longer hermetically sealed up in axioms, definitions, and formal aphorisms—resumed its natural intercourse with the visible and the sentient. The reciprocal influences of intellect and feeling displayed themselves in act and in speech—in prose and in poetry. Nor was this era less opulent in the matériel of imagination, than potent in the moral. The imposing ceremonial of the Romish church, though banished and forbidden, yet lingered in the regret of many, and in the memory of all. The mask and antique pageantry, the allegorical and symbolical spirit of the middle age, still remained to be immortalized by Spenser. The classes, degrees, and vocations of society were still marked by the picturesque and dramatic distinctions of dress and manner, while the ambitious affectation and ungainly mimicry of the mounting commonalty were endless topics of humour and ridicule.

The splendid apparel, the metaphoric euphuism, the new-fangled oaths, and elaborate gallantry of the young courtiers, who bore their manors on their back, and wasted their sleepless wits to coin new compliments; the grave splendour, the crafty wisdom, the sententious speech, and politic piety of the sage statesman; the precise, square-cut, taciturn regularity of the smooth-pated, velvet-capped citizen; the nicked-bearded, huffing, hectoring, basket-hilted adventurer; the traveller with his foreign phantasies, and unheard-of wonders, best believed when he was lying, and often discredited when he told the truth; the country gentleman who had newly stepped into the place of a thinned and impoverished baronage; the idolized, but not yet enfranchised females, in whose wardrobe was no middle state between velvet and homespun woollen, in whose education no mean betwixt the erudition of a divine and the ignorance of a household drudger, either calculated to govern a kingdom, or simply fit "to suckle fools and chronicle small fees?"—these, and a hundred antics beside, not forgetting the all-licensed fool, that excellent substitute for a free press, made the world a mask of all professions—a gay and gorgeous procession of fancy costume. Add to this, that two-thirds of the planet, with numberless varieties of men, and much that was vast, magnificent, beautiful, rich, and strange by land or sea, were but just disclosed to Europe by voyagers and pilgrims, whose personal deeds and sufferings outdid romance, and made impossibility seem light work. Natural philosophy, too, had much of the sentimental and mysterious character which accords with poetry. Enough of real science mingled with it to draw respect to the superstitious alloy, which wrought on the hopes and fears of the many. Astrology walked hand in hand with astronomy;—and the chemists besought the spirits of the elements to impart to their occult and suspected enquiries, the elixir of life, and the transmuting stone. At once dupes and deceivers, they pretended to secrets which they knew that they did not possess, and to extract from less learned fools, the means of performing their costly and endless researches, ever fancying that the present experiment would make them masters of the earth. How large a field of allusion was supplied by the mystic properties, signatures, antipathies, and sympathies of stones and plants, by planetary hours, and stellar configurations? The heart and passions of men entered into every pursuit; even the barren, unfeeling lines of the mathematician were interested with human fate, and abstract numbers were powerful over happiness and misery. It is needless to remark how much true science is indebted to these fancies. We speak of their value to the imagination, for the poet Dec was a better stargazer than Herschel, and Paracelsus a far greater chemist than Sir Humphry Davy. The quacks of that day spiritualized every thing. Those of our times are the earthiest of all materialists.

The lore of Greece and Rome, the beautiful shapes of the old mythology, which have lately been re-admitted to verse, contributed not a little to the rich fancies of our earlier bards. They were not, then, polluted by Cockneyism, or worn out by school versifiers, not staled by loveless love-dirties, and laureate raptures uninspired by loyalty—they had all the freshness of novelty, and the weighty reverence of age and association.

The more recent literature of Spain, Italy, and France, was also rare in England. Our poets borrowed much. What they deemed excellent they made their own with Roman boldness. What was good was not spoiled to make it original; for there were no reviewers in those days,—none of those indefatigable bookworms, who would wade through the dullest folio in search of stolen goods; and, to convict a contemporary of plagiarism, would even read their Bible.

The sex and character of Elizabeth herself was no weak ingredient in the poetic spirit of the time. Loyalty and gallantry blended in the adoration paid her; and the supremacy which she claimed and exercised over the church, invested her regality with a sacred unction that pertained not to feudal sovereigns. It is scarce too much to say, that the Virgin-queen appropriated the Catholic honours of the Virgin Mary. She was as great as Diana of the Ephesians. The moon shone but to furnish a type of her bright and stainless maidenhood. To magnify her greatness, the humility of courtly adulation merged in the ecstasies of Platonic love. She was charming by indefeasible right;—a jure divino beauty. Her fascinations multiplied with her wrinkles, and her admirers might have anticipated the conceit of Cowley—

More inflamed than amorous rage.”

It is easy for a Whig, or a Puritan, or any other unimaginative block-head, to cry out against all this, as nauseous flattery, and assert that after all she was rather an unpoetical personage than otherwise—a coarse-minded old maid, half crude, half coquette, whose better part was mannish, and all that belonged to her sex a ludicrous exaggeration of its weaknesses. But meanwhile, they overlook the fact, that not the woman Elizabeth, but the Virgin-queen, the royal heroine, is the theme of admiration. Not the petty virtues, the pretty sensibilities, the cheap charity, the prim decorum, which modern flatterers dwell upon, degrading royalty, while they palaver its possessor, but Britannia's sacred majesty, enshrined in chaste and lofty womanhood. Our ancestors paid their compliments to sex or rank—ours are addressed to the person. There is no flattery where there is no falsehood—no falsehood where there is no deception. Loyalty of old was a passion, and passion has a truth of its own—and as language does not always furnish expressions exactly adapted, or native to the feeling, what can the loyal poet do, but take the most precious portion of the currency, and impress it with the mint-mark of his own devoted fancy? Perhaps there never was a more panegyric rhymer than Spenser, and yet, so fine and ethereal is his incense, that the breath of morning is not more cool and salutary.

“It falls me here to weep for Chastity
That fairest virtue, far above the rest,
For which what needs us seek from Lacy,
Fortune examples it to have express'd,
Sith it is shrouded in my secret breast,
And bound so lively on each perfect part,
That to all ladies, who have it profess,
Needs but behold the portrait of her part.
If pourtray'd it might be by any living art;
But living art may not best part express,
Nor life-resembling pencil it can paint,
All it were Zeuxis or Praxiteles—

His dædæle hand would faile and greatly faynt,

And her perfections with his error taynt;
Ne poet's wit that passeth painter farre—
In picturing the parts of beauty daynt,” &c.

But neither Zeuxis nor Praxiteles were called from the dead to mar her perfections, or record her negative charms. Poetry was the only art that flourished in the Virginia reign. The pure Gothic, after attaining its full efflorescence under Henry VII., departed, never to return. The Grecian orders were not only absurdly jumbled together, but yet more outrageously conglomerated with the Gothic and Arabesque. “To gild refined gold—to paint the lily,” was all the humour of it. A similar inconsistency infected literature. The classic and the romantic (to use those terms, which, though popular, are not logically exact) were interwoven. The Arcadia and the Fairy Queen, are glorious offences, which “make defect perfection.” Perhaps, Shakspeare's “small Latin, and less Greek,” preserved him from worse anachronisms than any that he has committed. Queen Bess's patronage was of the national breed: she loved no pictures so well as portraits of herself. As, however, her painters have not flattered her, it may not uncharitably be concluded that they were no great deacons in their craft. It is a much easier thing to assure a homely female, in prose or rhyme, that she is beautiful, than to represent her so upon canvass. Her effigies are, I believe, pretty numerous, varying in ugliness, but none that I have seen even handsome—prettiness, of course, is out of the question. She was fond of finery, but had no taste in dress. Her ruff is downright odious; and the liberal exposure of her neck and bosom anything but alluring. With all her pearls about her, she looks like a pawnbroker's lady bedizened for an Easter ball, with all the unredeemed pledges from her husband's shop. She seems to have patronised that chimera in the ideal or allegorical portrait, at which Rubens and Sir Joshua were so often doomed to toil. She would not allow a shadow in her picture, arguing, like a Chinese, or a chip-logic, that shade is only an accident, and no true property of body.

Like Alexander, who forbade all sculptors but Lysippus to carve his image, she prohibited all but special cunning limners from drawing her effigy. This was in 1638, anno regni 5, while, though no chicken, she still was not clean past her youth. This order was probably intended to prevent caricatures. At last, she quarrelled with her looking-glass, as well as her painters, and her maids of honour removed all mirrors from her apartments, as carefully as Ministers exclude opposition papers (we hope not Maga) from the presence of our most gracious Sovereign. It is even said, that those fair nettles of India, took advantage of her weakness, to dress her head awry, and to apply the rouge to her nose, instead of her cheeks. So may the superannuated eagle be pecked at by daws. But the tale is not probable. After all, it is but the captious inference of witlings and scoffers, that attributes to mere sexual vanity that superstitious horror of encroaching age, from which the wisest are not always free. It may be, that they shrink from the reflection of their wrinkles, not as from the despoilers of beauty, but as from the vault-couriers of dissolution. In rosy youth, while yet the brow is alabaster-veined with Heaven's own tint, and the dark tresses turn golden in the sun, the lapse of time is imperceptible as the throbbing of a heart at ease. "So like, so very like, is day to day," one primrose scarce more like another. Who ever saw their first grey hairs, or marked the crow-feet at the angle of their eyes, without a sigh or a tear, a momentous self-abasement, a sudden sinking of the soul, a thought that youth is flown for ever? None but the blessed few that, having dedicated their spring of life to Heaven, behold in the shedding of their vernal blossoms, a promise that the season of immortal fruit is near. It is a frailty, almost an instance of humanity, to aim at concealing that from others, of which ourselves are painfully conscious. The herculean Johnson keenly resented the least allusion to the shortness of his sight. So entirely is man a social animal, so dependent are all his feelings for their very existence upon communication and sympathy, that the "see griefs," which none but ourselves are privy to, are forgotten as soon as they are removed from the senses. The artifices to which so many have recourse to conceal their declining years, are often intended more to soothe themselves, than to impose on others. This aversion to growing old is especially natural and excusable in the celibate and the childless; The borrowed curls, the pencilled eyebrows,

"The steely-piison d shape,
So oft made taper, by constraint of tape," the various cosmetic secrets, well-known to the middle ages, not only of the softer sex, are not unseemly in a spinster, so long as they succeed in making her look young. They are intolerable in a mother of any age. But we, my dear Christopher, resigned and benevolent old bachelors as we are, can well appreciate the vanity of the aged heart, that sees not its youth renewed in any growing dearer self. Nothing denotes the advances of life, at once so surely and so pleasantly as children springing up around a good man's table. Perhaps our famous Queen, in her latter days, though full of honours as of years, would gladly have changed places with the wife of any yeoman that had a child to receive her last blessing, whose few acres were not to pass away to the hungry expectant son of a hated rival. Her virginity was not like that of Jephthah's daughter, a free-will offering to the Lord. Pride, and policy, and disappointment, and, it may be, hopeless, self-condemned affection, conspired to perpetuate it. Probably it was well for England that no offspring of hers inherited her throne. By some strange ordinance of nature, it generally happens that these wonderful clever women produce idiots or madmen. Witwena, Semiramis, Agrippina, Catherine de Medicis, Mary de Medicis, Catherine of Russia, and Lady Wortley Montague. One miniature of Elizabeth I have seen, which, though not beautiful, is profoundly interesting; it presents her as she was in the days of her danger and captivity, when the same wily policy, keeping its path, even while it seemed to avert, was needful to preserve her life, that afterwards kept her firm on a throne. Who was the artist that produced it? I know not: but it bears the strongest marks of authenticity, if to be exactly what a learned spirit would fancy Elizabeth—young, a prisoner, and in peril—be evidence of true portraiture. There is pride, not aping humility, but wearing it as a well-beseeming habit; there is passion, strongly controlled by the will, but not extinct, neither dead nor sleeping, but watchful and silent; brows sternly sustaining a weight of care, after which a crown could be but light; a manly intellect, allied with female craft;—but nonsense! it will be said; no colours whatever could represent all this, and that, too, in little, for the picture was among Bone's enamels. Well, then, it suggested it all. Perhaps the finest Madonna ever painted, would be no more than a meek, pious, pretty woman, and an innocent child, if we knew not whom it was meant for.

Little as genuine art was cultivated or encouraged under Elizabeth, portrait, which, in strict speech, is historical, contra-distinguished from poetical, painting was not neglected. The features of most of her worthies, warriors, statesmen, poets, and divines, have been recorded with fidelity, or at least with much verisimilitude. There is a decided cast of countenance, a family likeness, in all the subjects of Elizabeth and James, which can no more be mistaken than described. It is not that sameness which an unimaginative dauber cannot help impressing on a generation of sitters—it is not the "foolish face" transmitted through a whole pedigree of country gentlemen—it is not the generic likeness of a breed—the gentilitious contour of a nation. Every face has its own character, and the degrees of beauty and ugliness are abundantly varied. Shakspeare is as unlike Darnley as Darnley is unlike Cecil, or Queen Elizabeth is unlike the Scottish Mary. But so is the style of Shakspeare's dramas utterly different from Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, or Burleigh's State Papers; yet it is manifestly the style of the same period. The analogy holds good with regard to the style of features and expression. If any one, having the opportunity, which, alas! I have not, will examine Lodge, Vertue, or any well-engraved series of portraits, or a decent gallery of family pictures, he will verify an observation, which words can but ill convey, and argument cannot prove. The Elizabethan physiognomy prevailed, with slight variation in the generic character, through the reign of her successor, and in the court of Charles the First, though the superior genius of Vandyke superadded to that character a grace, a life, power, action, thought, fire, and generosity, that was his own. The Cavaliers, however, with few exceptions, were men of more honour than principle—more passionate than meditative—more elegant than profound. We may vainly regret that Spenser, Sidney, Shakspeare, Raleigh, Bacon, had not a Vandyke to draw them. Of the Puritans, such as were gentlemen preserved, beneath the cropped heads and high-crowned hats, the ancient English contour, though the free play and transparency of looks are gone. Heaven help the Puritans had the Long Parliament, and the Assembly of Divines, been permitted to realize their ideal in church and state! Ere one generation had passed away, not a pretty woman would have existed between John-o'-Groat's house and Lizard Point. To see the havoc which Puritanism makes in the loveliest faces, even after they are fully formed, what would be its effect on plastic infancy—how would it intensify itself by traduction!

Another race of visages came in with the Restoration, and yet another with the House of Hanover. We are ourselves a fourth; but this is anticipation. Who were the artists who portrayed the luminaries of the Maiden reign, is not exactly recorded. As economy was the order of the day, few foreigners seem to have been tempted across the Channel. We read, however, of one Lucas de Heere, a native of Ghent, a poet, a painter, and wit, who visited England, and executed several portraits. He was employed to paint the gallery of the Earl of Lincoln, in which, among other allegorical emblems of nations, as the representative and express image of Anglicism, he drew a naked man, with a pair of shears, and various coloured cloths! His witticism, which is manifestly descended from the ass and trusses of hay, was borrowed from Andrew Borde's Induction to Knowledge, prefixed to which is the figure of an English Adamite, with these lines :

"I am an Englishman, and naked I stand here, Musing in mind what garment I shall wear."

Andrew Borde, a doctor of physic, and a man of much learning, is said to have been the original Merry-Andrew. Times are altered. There is now no such character as the erudite Buffoon, the Mountebank of Genius, the Vagabond Philosopher,—no Tom Brown, no Beronicius, no Paracelsus. The men of highest endowments, and greatest acquirements, are distinguished by domestic virtues, and regularity of life.—So much the better for themselves and their families, but all the worse for their biographers.

Hilliard, Oliver, and Cooper, are the first native names that occur in the list of British artists. They were all miniature painters; and may have preserved the lineaments of men whose deeds are recorded in history, or their minds impressed upon works of their own. Miniature occupies about the same station in art that sonnet obtains in poetry—exquisite finish, softness, and brilliance, are essential to both, and perhaps portability is the best property of either. A lady may wear a miniature about her neck, or on the blue veins of her polished wrist, or next her heart, if it be her father's or husband's—so may she carry a sonnet in her album, bound in waxy satin, with golden clasps over, or in her reticule—not ridicule—at least if it be mine, or in her memory, if it adheres spontaneously, as honey dew to rose leaves, for I deprecate the practice of getting by heart, maître prépanse. By my humanity, I would not publish a poem, if I thought one single poor child would be tasked to learn it by heart, not for a penny a line!

The accession of the House of Stuart naturally leads us to enquire to whom we owe the effigy of Mary, whose beauty continues to influence imagination, after her very bones are turned to dust. Her portraits are various; the most lovely I ever saw is in the Bodleian at Oxford. It is the most powerful vindicator her memory has obtained—and yet there is that in her look which a fond husband might suspect, and a fool like Darnley tremble at. She could not forgive the murder of Rizzio. She has the glance that maddened poor Chatelair : well might Elizabeth fear her—

"The mermaid,

Uttering such dulcet and harmonious sound,
That the rude sea grew rival at her song,
And certain stars shot madly from their spheres,

To hear the sea-maid's noise."

The Stuarts, an ingenious but unhappy race, were cultivators and encouragers of the arts of intellect. Even the unfortunate favourites of James III., though described by historians as low artisans, were probably liberal artists. Cochrane, who is called a stone mason, might be an architect. Rogers was a skilful musician, and doubtless a poet, like his namesake. The very name's a poet. Leonard was a smith; but so was Benvenuto Cellini. He was no maker of hobnails, but a deviser of curious articles in metal—and perhaps, had he lived, and Homer been translated, would have copied the shield of Achilles. Hommih, the tailor, was a sculptor and painter, who exercised his taste and ingenuity in contriving costumes. But Archibald Bell-the-Cat cared for none of these things; and thus it is men are dressed, not according to the high function of their minds, but the humble means whereby they sustain their bodies. Had James patronised Burns, he would have been reproached with the familiarity of a gauger. Walter called Milton the old blind schoolmaster, and there are who have spoken of Wordsworth as the stampmaster.

Passing over the reign of the learned and pacific author of the Counterblast to Tobacco—we find a truly loyal patron of art in his unfortunate successor. Whether Charles could have made England a country of painters, may be doubted; for to create genius, is a higher prerogative than he ever assumed; but he certainly did his best to make his court a domicile of artists, and his palace a conservatory of pictures. Considering how, even in his peaceful days, he was straightened for money, it is wonderful how much he did—and while his political friendship was worth purchasing, foreign states assiduously paid homage to his taste,—and instead of ivory puzzles and diamond snuff-boxes, the usual free-will offerings of diplomacy, presented him with Tintorets and Titians. But Catholic artists were slow in accepting his invitations; nor is it surprising that they shunned a country where the multitude were taught to consider their genius a crime, and where their religion was a statutable offence. Yet Rubens, protected by the sacro-sanctity of an Ambassador, partook a while of his hospitality, and adorned Whitehall with the apotheosis of James the First. Rubens was the Claudian of painters, the pictorial laureate; the splendour of his colouring, and the vigour of his design, disguises the nothingness of his subject. His pictures put you in mind of a vast parterre of thick-set carnations and anemones—a glowing brochure of double-daisies. Every thing is rich and voluptuous, but all seems over-fed, and forced. Men, women, beasts, virtues, and duties, are fattened like prize oxen for a show. Rubens is Titian Dutchified. I should like to know whether he ever drank canary with Ben Jonson—they would have agreed admirably, unless, indeed, they were too blunt for one another. By far the most interesting of Rubens' pictures are his portraits of himself and his wives;—he was worth a score of French dukes and cardinals; and to have been the spouse of such a man, was better than being the unloved consort and early widow of the over-lauded apostate hero of the Hemiade. But Rubens is not to be ranked among English painters. There is a luxuriant negation of common sense in his court allegories, that does not amalgamate with our national character. The genius of England is essentially dramatic. No people are so intensely individualized as the English. Every Englishman is a definite self, and sympathizes with his fellow-creatures, not as portions of a constituted whole, but as organized microcosms. The self-love of an Englishman is not selfishness—it is the light which instructs how to love his neighbour. He, not alone, but perhaps more than other men, knows and feels, that the very meanest child of Adam—a labourer bowed to earth with daily toil—an infant at the breast—a little lassie singing as she carries her eggs to market—is a more express image of the great Creator, than all the innumerable orbs of lifeless matter that throng infinity; that all the abstract perfection which philosophers have dreamed, is not half so good as the everyday goodness which human life is always needing. He that talks of “stooping to truth,” either talks nonsense, or tries to puzzle his hearers with irreverent irony, and at all events, does not speak good English.

This spirit of individuality has had a strong and shaping power over our literature. Perhaps the most striking instances of it are to be found in works where it would be least expected. We do not wonder that Chaucer and Shakspeare should have individualized their characters—it was their business, their poetic duty, so to do. But that Spenser and Bunyan (start not, good reader, they are well worthy to be mentioned together) should have made mere abstractions as substantially familiar to the imagination as if they were living members of our domestic circles,—that they should have turned personifications into bona fide persons—and clothed the dry bones of allegory with vital flesh—and shewn fairy land—and the valley of the shadow of death—and the delectable mountains,—that figure the calm of a Christian death-bed, the counterpart of blessed immortality, as vividly, yea palpably, as our own birth-place appears in our happiest dreams, bespeaks a might of love that never was bestowed by mortal passion—which dimly shadows the creative orgasm of the Eternal. I know not whether that partiality for portrait, of which historical painters are given to complain, is not a necessary result of the peculiar constitution of British society, but certainly we are more interested in our own and our neighbour's faces, than in the finest combinations of line and colour. Hence Vandyke, Lely, and Kneller, though foreigners by birth, may justly be recorded among English artists, for they are the illustrators of our history. To the taste of

King Charles, and the successful mediation of Sir Kenelm Digby, inventor of ———"the famed Hermetic powder.

Which wounds five miles point-blank would solder."

we are indebted for our Vandykes. Happy was the painter who was summoned, not to take an inventory of blue eyes, arched eyebrows, Grecian noses, rosy-mouthed and dimpled chins, insipid prettiness, and ugly no-meaning—not to register charms uninteresting to all but lovers, or set nature's faults in a note-book—not to cheat oblivion of her due, and tell the world that folly and vanity wrote as legible a hand two centuries back as at the present day—but to realize the narration of Clarendon—to justify the panegyrics of Waller—to shew how they looked upon earth, whose spirits speak to us from the grave. But most happy are we, who, with hearts as tranquil as the mute image of departed sorrow, can look on the likenesses of the illustrious dead, and read their sad but ever glorious story, and, wondering, ask ourselves if such things really were.

Of Vandyke's merits as a painter, I profess not to discourse. Mr Cunningham has, doubtless, done him justice. He calls him the Delineator of Intellect; and says that his men are superior to his women—"who have not the fresh innocent loveliness of nature." But art has its limits. I do not think the fresh innocent loveliness of nature can be painted: The innocence of life looks silly in a picture—a painted smile is at best an immoveable simper, and laughter stares out of the canvass like idiot drunkenness; you might as well attempt to sketch the corporeal dimensions of a sound, to tell the colour of a thought, or represent a forgotten dream in perspective, as to depict those charms that would not charm were they not for ever on the wing. The beauty of painters is of a grave, steadfast character; they can give the permanent expression of conscious thought, and trace the lines of habitual feeling, but when they try to perpetuate the transiency of emotions that are co-eval with the moment, they vie in absurdity with the Virtuoso, who took out a patent for crystallising moonshine.

Moreover, it is to be recollected that Vandyke was the recorder of an ominous season. The shadow of the time was cast on every countenance. I can scarce think the babies smiled, as now they smile. The face of Charles himself is a prophecy of his doom; and his fair Queen has eyes that seem made for tears—a bosom swelling with anticipated woe.

Vandyke died just before the storm broke out. As a portrait-painter, he was probably less obnoxious to the ruling party than some of his brethren in art would have been; yet he would not long have escaped the calumny which all and every thing noble and elegant partook with the royal patron. The love of art was ranked among Charles's heaviest crimes; and sad it is to think that many who loved art themselves, prompted or echoed the malignant outcry, which the vulgar got by rote out of Puritan sermons. Would it were forgotten that Milton ever was the yoke-fellow of Hugh Peters, the reviler of down-trampled majesty, and the salaried flatterer of Cromwell! Yet, perhaps, it is best that it be not forgotten; for it is good that all men should know, that neither the sublimest genius, nor the sternest virtue, can purify the inherent baseness of rebellious faction. Worth, in a better sonnet than Milton ever trumpeted, addresses the soul of his great prototype as "a star that dwelt apart;" alas, that fine poetry should not always be true! For many years it dwelt with all the servile imps which the archfiend rebellion flatters and scorns, with rage—with slander—with sacrilege—with passions that turn our milk to gall—with sundering of domestic charities—with power which sweet religion never sanctified—with the foul despotism of anarchy. I would not be thought deficient in reverence to names that still are mentioned in a breath with liberty. What has been we know—what might have been, if Charles and his bishops had been allowed to work their will, we can but guess. To the dearest freedom of the human soul, the indefeasible prerogative of conscience, the Episcopalians and Presbyterians were alike hostile. Both presumed to dictate the terms upon which man was to approach his Maker. The question at first seemed to be, whether this tyranny should be exercised by scholars and gentlemen appointed by a court, or by vulgar fanatics, at once the slaves and slave-drivers of the mob. The infallible result of success on either side, would have been gross superstition in the multitude, and tacit infidelity in the educated orders. The modern fashion of compromise and concession would have done nothing, for neither party could concede, without a departure from their avowed duty. Unsuccessful war, financial embarrassment, and the ostentatious dissoluteness of the aristocracy and their retainers, only partially corrected by the good example of King Charles, enabled the Puritan leaders to enlist the political discontents of the nation in their quarrel. With true Machiavelian policy, they contrived, by withholding the necessary supplies, in a manner to compel the king to violate the letter of the law. Like the serving-men of the Montagues, they managed to have the law on their side. But ship-money was no more the cause of the Long Parliament's usurpation, than the stamp-act was the true origin of American independence. Taxation will never annul the allegiance of a loyal people, unless it directly tends to make the daily bread of life unattainable to the many. Financial oppression, as long as it only depresses property, will generate nothing but submissive remonstrance. No man will risk his all, because a trifling per-centage is informally demanded. That Charles's imposts were cruel—that they took the food out of the mouths of the poor—was scarcely asserted; nor were we then, nor are we now, such a sordid tribe, as to subvert the state that gives us all we call our own, the church, into which we were baptized, because a certain number of shillings were claimed somewhat irregularly. If the pulpits had been silent, the politicians would have been innoxious. Pym and Hampden would have been clever ministers; all necessary reforms would have been easily accomplished, and Cromwell would have lived and died a simple country gentleman, or, at the most, a stammering brawler in an impotent minority. The first fatal error of Charles's reign, was his marriage with a French Catholic; the second, was his promotion of Laud to the spiritual primacy. Laud should never have left his college. There his learning, his piety, his munificence, would have earned an unenvied admiration. The congé-d'elire that made him Archbishop of Canterbury, signed his sovereign's death-warrant and his own. Protestant in faith and morals, he was a Papist in taste and feeling; it was his conscientious ambition to erect the clergy of England to a Judaic priesthood, to make the hierarchy a caste instead of a profession. He perceived that this could only be effected by investing the monarchy with a sacerdotal character. He would have the king respected as a priest, and every priest obeyed as a king. But being better acquainted with the letter of Scripture than with the living operation of the spirit; deeper read in the fathers and schoolmen than in human life; dividing his studies between the past and the eternal; purblind to the present, and vainly credulous of the future; too stubborn in imagined rectitude to conciliate, and yet too milky and gall-less to act up to his own schemes of coercion, he lived and perished to teach mankind, that he who would rule in church or state, should be wise as well as good, and not more good than wise. I do not conceive that any thing short of revolution, civil and ecclesiastical, would have satisfied the high-flying republicans; but these were never numerous, and though the multitudinous echo of the city might propagate a delusive preponderance of noise, the still and steady voice of the people was always for Monarchy and Episcopacy. The English are a very loyal nation, and so are the Scotch, and if Charles had left it to the good sense of the latter to fashion their own devotions, perhaps we should now have had uniformity of worship, and no act of uniformity at all; but for his misadventurous attempt to thrust written prayers down the throats of Scotchmen, he would probably have died in his bed, with Laud to furnish his soul for its journey.

Great men have been among us, Ludlow, Hutchinson, and others, that called Milton friend, compared to whom the feeble agitators of modern times are but as the theatrical thunder invented by poor Denuis, to the real thunder of the angry heavens—men before whom one should tremble, and blush at one's own trembling; whose names shoot terror to the heart of kings, and like a trumpet pierce a nation's ear—men to whom the importunity of weaker nature was a mere argument of austere scorn, a thing unheeded, as a sickly infant, which a stern stepmother bids cry itself to sleep; whose will within their breasts was absolute—how terrible then if evil!—but I am not sorry they lived before my time.

I could hardly have loved them much on earth, nor would I desire a letter of introduction to their souls, wherever they are at present. Methinks, I should have shrunk from their touch, as from the grasp of a marble statue, into which a necromancer had conjured some crafty spirit; for cold they were, and exceeding crafty, as the subtle serpent. But may deathless honour, for which they shed their blood—and, it may be, the blood of better Christians—still attend their names! They did their work; and had they been better, they could scarce have done it so well. They find their reward. May the good they did—and it is great—atone for the means by which they did it; and may we—who live to read the story of their worldly travail, who calmly judge the issues of passions too strong to be confined to single breasts, and coolly wonder at the dark intrigues, the jarring reflections of a king too weak to be honest—of factions that, in their zeal for God, forgot the reverence of truth—for liberty, imposed intolerable bondage—and for the welfare of an abstract commonwealth, renounced the social charities, which only make a state worthy the support of Christian Man—let us be thankful to him, who, out of evil, works transcendent good, that such things have been—that they are no more.

But what has all this to do with the British painters? More perhaps, good, impatient reader, than you would think—for the men of whom we speak have been painted; and their effigies throw more light on the transactions of the time, than the rolls of Parliament, or the court-sermons, or the would-be-witty pamphlets, and hard-rhymed ballads, that lent a voice to the many-headed monster. Look at Prynne, for instance. It is easier than reading his books—and you will be certain that he was a block-head—and that his prosecutors were little better when they gave effect to his bray by amputating his ears. Look at Pym—or, if you will, at Hampden—they are not at all alike—for Hampden was a high-born gentleman—and Pym could never cast the puritanical simper with which he came to the door of the House of Commons to receive the women's petition—but if you think either of them an honest man, let me tell you, you are no physiognomist. Look at Charles himself—never did face tell a plainer story. The introverted lustre of his eyes—the patrician gravity of his mouth—the melancholy traces of departed smiles—even the cut of his hair and beard—are history—biography—a confession. Clarendon has told us what he did, and said, and suffered. Vandyke has shewn us what he was.

But, oh! that some inspired hand could depict his last, his noblest moments—could portray him as he sat before the High Court of Justice, grey-headed, poorly clad—more unattended than the vilest thief—so destitute that none dare pity him—solitary amid the mob of scorners—bereft of fortune, power, and hope—but surrounded with indelible majesty—

“Not all the water in the wild wide sea
Can wash the balm off an anointed king

What a variety of passions might a great artist introduce upon the scene! The judges should not be made all alike. A cabal of regicides has not the sameness of a pack of hounds. One would display a proud determination to think himself right—another would try not to think at all—a third would look at his partner in iniquity, and dress his countenance according to the fashion. The young, with hungry eyes, would woo the prostitute approbation of the spectators—the old, like a coiled snake, wrapt up within himself, would have no sense but of his own dire purpose. All this might easily be painted. Then there should be a crowd of heads, one peering above another—here a hat, and there a hand held up—and there a foot advanced. But in some quiet nook there should be one good face of silent loyalty—not weeping—not utterly cast down—but upheld by generous admiration of kingly fortitude—and on this face should fall a beam of light, that should seem a meek irradiance of patient virtue. I wish I could paint it myself. But to do justice to the subject would demand the dramatic powers of a Hogarth or a North, and the sublime conception of Michael Angelo.

There is another subject, taken from the same period of our history, which I would recommend to the attention of sculptors. What think you of a statue of Oliver Cromwell, in the act of turning out the Rump? It should be of Corinthian brass—placed in the most conspicuous situation of St Stephen's chapel—and should appear, as all good statues and pictures do, to look every member full in the face—with the very expression with which that great radical reformer addressed Harry Morton—"Thou art," &c.

Vandyke was succeeded by Lely, and Lely by Sir Godfrey Kneller—Lely has descended to posterity as the insidious immortalizer of frail beauty, and patrician prostitution—

Kneller has bequeathed to staring canvass the long wigs, stars, and garters, that effected and maintained the revolution—we are sorry that Allan has not given us their lives in detail. They have at least as good a right to a place among English artists, as either West or Fuseli—and the lives of men who lived in the busiest epochs of court scandal, must needs abound with anecdote—but anecdote not, perhaps, fitted for a Family Library. Their professional merits are now accounted small. Like the poetry of Pope, and the criticism of Johnson, they are subjected to an Abernethian regimen to cure their supposed plethora of reputation. Having once been praised at the expense of their betters, they are now depreciated at the expense of justice. But their portraits bear the stamp of truth, and shew us how states are governed, and from what Salmacian fountains the defecated blood of nobility is derived.

And here, without spending precious time upon the sprawling saints of Verrio and Laguerre, which it gives me a crick in the neck to look at, or disturbing the pendulous allegories of Sir James Thornhill, we will conclude our commentary on Mr Cunningham's notices of early art in England, which, in good sooth, is something like a history of the world before the creation of man.

PARLIAMENTARY SAYINGS AND DOINGS. No. III.

THE re-assembling of the Parliament after the Christmas recess, was looked forward to with extreme anxiety, as the period when the public would at length be made acquainted with the plans which Lord Grey's administration had been maturing for their benefit. Previously to the recess, the standing reply of the Ministers to any hint respecting the fine things expected from them, had been, "give us time;" and when the business, which they deemed it necessary to dispatch immediately after coming into power, is considered—namely, the disposal of places to charitably-selected relatives and dependents—the increase of the army—the creating of new judges and new pensions in Ireland—the abolition of duty on a foreign product, without consent of Parliament, and sundry other little indispensables—when all these are considered, it is not surprising that an interval of studious leisure should have been required before any of those measures should be entered upon, regarding which they had pledged themselves to the public on obtaining power. They were, therefore, indulged with rather more than the average boarding-school complement of holydays at Christmas, and it was expected that they would return to their parliamentary duties with all their tasks prepared; that the Reform arrangement would be announced forthwith; that a reduced Civil List would be quite ready to be tossed across the House for the caresses of Mr Hume; that a finance scheme would be developed, shewing that the true philosopher's stone had at last been obtained in the furnace of Lord Althorpe's glowing mind; that Ireland was to be tranquillized before Lent, and the Catholic priests turned into peace-preservers; that the rural war, and its attendant fires, were to cease, and peace and plenty to prevail; and, finally, that politics and polyanthus would flourish together, and liberty and green leaves grow and increase in company, under the fostering influences of Whiggism and the opening Spring. Fallacious hopes! The meeting has taken place, and instead of delightful prospects of reform, retrenchment, peace, plenty, and good humour, we see nothing before us but doubt and difficulty, abortive measures in Parliament, and dissatisfaction and distrust among the people. Where is this to end?—a change of Ministry—alas! what would that avail now? Where are now the men to whom we could with confidence confide the conduct of the vessel of the state in these times of peril? England,

"Where be thy men of might, thy grand in soul?"

Muddy-minded, obstinate, despotic, are the Whigs, as they were ever—disunited, spirit-broken, are the Tories—commonplace and incompetent, the minor band that lies between. Shall we then look to the Radicals? Heaven forefend! Add brutality to a Whig, and you make a Radical; and yet, Hunt—but this brings us back to a remembrance of our duty.

We are to record the events of that Parliament, which—thanks to the "spirit of the age!"—has the honour to enrol Mr Henry Hunt, late of Rochester gaol, as one of its members. The House filled early on the 3d—novelty is as attractive at Saint Stephen's as at Covent Garden or Drury Lane, and it is doubtful whether the new serious piece of Ministerial Reform, the first scene of which was expected to be enacted on the first appearance of the celebrated monster Mr Hunt, was most effective in procuring so large an audience. The elected of Preston did not long keep the House in waiting for the sound of his voice, nor is he likely to let them forget it through neglect of repetition. He arose amid "profound silence," and commented on the atrocity of a mercantile house having six hundred thousand pounds "laid down" in tallow. This was a melting theme; but it passed; and Lord Althorpe was the next to arise amid silence equally profound, and with the distinctness of elocution, and winning playfulness of manner, which so peculiarly distinguish that noble lord, announced the intention of his Majesty's government to intimate at a future time what they intended to do. He rose, he said, to inform the House, that his Majesty's government would be prepared to submit to the House their measure for Reform on the first of March; and, further, to inform the House, that the government had determined to entrust the bringing forward of that measure to his noble friend, the paymaster of the forces, (Lord John Russell.) "We have selected that noble lord," he continued, "because of his perseverance on the subject of Reform, at a time when it was almost impossible to bring forward the measure. My noble friend has proposed various partial measures of reform, when even partial measures were looked upon with disfavour. Now, therefore, when the cause is prosperous, the government think that, on account of his perseverance and ability, the noble lord should be the person selected to bring forward a measure of full and efficient reform, instead of the partial measures which he had hitherto proposed."

As the time which his Majesty's government have fixed for at length condescending to inform the Commons what their designs are on so very important a subject, will have arrived before these observations come generally before the public, it would be needless to dwell upon the many conjectures to which a communication of this description gives rise, or to do more than notice the contemptuous disregard of public anxiety, in thus postponing, without even the least apology, all mention of the views of government upon a subject which they had been given six weeks to consider, and in which the whole country feels so deep an interest. The amiable modesty, too, with which the ministerial leader of the House concedes to "his noble friend" the grateful task of proposing a measure which he deems to be in so very "prosperous" a condition, is highly worthy of notice, and will be duly appreciated by all who understand the sincerity of the Treasury Bench. Perhaps, since Lord Althorpe's pleasing experiment with the budget, he may not feel quite so confident as to the extreme "prosperity" of every measure which their High Mightinesses of the Cabinet may have determined upon. It is indeed ridiculous to observe how this liberal minister, and Sir James Graham, another man of the people, are possessed with the notion that the decisions of a Cabinet in which they sit, must be as absolute and final as the decrees of a dictator. A little experience will dissolve this dream.

The following evening, the new Civil List scheme was laid before the House, and Lord Althorpe ventured his bark, for the first time, in the dangerous and perplexed navigation of arithmetical figures, denoting pounds, shillings, and pence. As the late government were thrown out of place (ostensibly at all events) for having done that which they ought not to have done, and left undone what they ought to have done, respecting this same Civil List, it was expected that some very important change would have taken place under the economical auspices of the new Ministry, and that the "new broom" would have swept clean all the foul places of the Civil List. But no such thing happened, and another exemplification was afforded of the truth of the doctrine, that he who would avoid disappointment, must expect nothing. Put not thy faith in Ministers, especially if they promise to be very "liberal;" they mean liberal of the people's money, or if, haply, they be honest in intention, they but deceive themselves: for as the world goes, they must spend the money, or submit to changes which no man in the novel possession of official power, and basking in the sunshine of Court favour, is prepared to relish. The sum of money to be paid by the country, according to the new arrangement of the Civil List, (if approved of by the committee to whose consideration it has been submitted,) is within a trifle of that which was proposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer: the difference of the present plan from the other, lies in this, that the sum fixed for the life of the Sovereign, to defray the expenses of his Court, and his privy purse, amounting to £510,000 a-year, will be separated from the £970,000 formerly proposed as the amount of the Civil List: and the balance of £460,000, which was to be appropriated to the payment of public servants, will be placed upon another fund, and be subject to the revision of Parliament every year. This is, pro tanto, an advantage; and it is but fair to admit, that the whole statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject was extremely candid, plain, and intelligible—he acknowledged the ignorance with which he formerly judged the matter, and the impossibility of the saving which he had thought practicable, and the only thing in which he seemed to fail, was in the courtesy of apologizing to those whom he had formerly opposed, for having ignorantly blamed what he did not understand.

"When," said the noble lord, "I first looked at the subject, I confess it seemed extraordinary, that, while the expense of all articles of consumption was so much decreased, the charge for the maintenance of the royal household had remained unabated; but, on examining the subject more minutely and accurately, I have arrived at the opinion, that a reduction cannot be made without compelling his Majesty either to alter his present state of living, or to incur debt. I am sure the House will not wish that either alternative took place." Mr Hunt, who talked with unexpected good sense and decency, rather pertinently remarked, that it appeared to him that the whole of the question before the House had been that night argued as if the people had nothing at all to do with the matter—as though it was a matter entirely between the Crown and the House—as though the House were to pay so much money out of their own pockets to the Crown, and that there was no such thing in this country as a people from whose hard earnings alone could the sums under discussion be drawn. We are no lovers of Mr Hunt's notions upon political arrangement or royal economy; but it is pleasant, in a matter of argument, to have the minds of noble lords and honourable gentlemen brought home to the real point in issue. Indeed, if his Majesty's Chancellor of the Exchequer would be pleased to condescend to a few lessons in practical logic, it might be a not unuseful addition to his present valuable acquirements, and it might save him the trouble of being "prepared to assert that his Majesty could not live in his present style with a smaller allowance, unless he pursued a system of greater economy in all the departments of the royal household;" the argument on the other side being expressly, that such "a system of greater economy" was just and necessary. The affair of the pensions on the Civil List was managed with considerable adroitness, so as to afford a show of reduction, without interfering, in any the least degree, with the patronage of the Ministry in this department. The gross amount of the pensions (the reader may apply the adjective in the sense that seemeth unto him most fitting) is one hundred and forty-four thousand pounds, whereof sixty-nine thousand are taken away from the Civil List, and placed upon the Consolidated Fund, where they are not to be renewed, but expire with the persons who shall be unfortunate enough to die, having such sung allowances to make this life comfortable. But the remaining seventy-five thousand is to be left on the Civil List, and each pension to be renewable in one or more pensions to others, as the present holders drop off. Now this last list—the seventy-five thousand pounder—is all taken from the oldest pensions, and therefore such as would in all probability first drop in—if the pensions remained as they were, all that would fall in for some years to come would probably be among those which are retained for renewal, so that the Ministers lose no pension-giving patronage, unless, indeed, they intend to live and hold their places for twenty years to come, which in these changeable times is rather improbable.

That portion of the radical faction which was inclined to look favourably upon a "reforming" Ministry, was much incensed at the deference to royalty and royal expenditure shewn in the Civil List debate; and in the city, "where merchants most do congregate," many bitter words were put forth against the new government, which more recent circumstances have not caused them to retract. It is sometimes a grievous thing to have been popular. On the 7th, Lord King, in the Upper House, presented some petitions on the subject of tithes, and availed himself of the opportunity to introduce a discussion upon the subject, in which he displayed his accustomed coarseness, and habit of rude assertion, where, in general, some argument is expected; and gave notice of his intention to continue to speak in the same strain on the presentation of numerous additional petitions which were on their way to him. There were some Bishops spoke, but they said little to the purpose—the law lords, who might have answered Lord King, did not speak—probably they thought it not worth their while to encounter with such a wit as his Lordship possesses. It might, however, be well if the assertions he makes, with regard to Church property, and which may possibly make some impression on the public, were briefly exposed. When a man gets up to talk about “property” in an English House of Parliament, it is to be supposed that he means property according to the law of England, unless he make a proviso that he is not so to be understood. Now, Lord King talks a great deal about tithe property and church property, and if he mean by property that which the law contemplates as such, nothing can be more loose and erroneous than that which he lets fall. “I know,” said he, “it is said that tithe is property, but it is very different in its nature from individual property; it is, for the most part, now the property of the Church, and the Church is the creature of the State; and its temporal concerns, its pay, and emoluments, might be regulated in any manner which the State might think proper to direct.” All this is gross error, and mere vulgarity. “Individual” property, it is to be presumed, means the property of an individual. There are thousands of individuals whom the law recognises as having a property in tithes. Suppose it be granted that a Rector, as a corporation sole, holds by a tithe different from that of ordinary individuals, inasmuch as it goes to his successor, and not to his heir, still there are thousands of laymen the possessors of tithes which do descend to the heir, like any other part of the estate—what then becomes of the difference in the individuality of this property which Lord King has discovered? It is not law, nor is it fact, that the Church is the creature of the State, using the word “creature,” as Lord King evidently does, in the sense of a thing dependent upon, and subject to, the will of the State. Although we use the words “Church and State,” in common discourse, it is a matter of almost universal knowledge that the Church is an integral part of the State, and if Lord King uses words so heedlessly as to mean by the State, the executive government for the time being, he still is wrong. The King or the Prime Minister is de facto the nominator of some one of the clerical body to each bishopric, but the authority ends with the appointment; and moreover, the Bishops are not the Church. What does Lord King mean by the “pay” of the Church? If the word means any thing, it must be a stipulated recompense for a specific service. There is no such thing with regard to tithes, or Church property—he says, this “pay” might be regulated in any manner which the State might think proper to direct. One cannot tell exactly of what he is speaking; but if he means Church revenues, and speaks of the law as it stands, he states the fact untruly—if he means that the legislature might enact laws to regulate the Church property, he utters a truism—every one knows that the legislature may dispose of the property of the Church, or of the property of Lord King, as it pleases; and if it began with the rectors, it is not very probable that it would long spare the right honourables.

We by no means wish to contend that the property of the Church of England is distributed as it ought to be; but the evils which prevail in this respect are not to be remedied by attacks on the property itself, founded in ignorance, and conducted with boisterous rudeness.

In the Commons, on the same evening, Mr Kenyon moved for a return of the quantity of uncultivated land in England and Wales, with a view of shewing that, if the poor were allowed to cultivate the land which lies waste, their distresses would be relieved, and they would be fed, through the labour of their own hands. The motion was withdrawn, on the ground that, though the account would be "very interesting," it would be impossible to produce it. Such at least was the assurance of Mr Spring Rice, who added, that there was no officer to make out such a return, and no documents from which it could be compiled. It is, however, obvious that such information might be obtained, and a little of the public money might be well expended in procuring it. But it is, perhaps, too plain, too simple a mode of proceeding, to be tolerated by the scientific politicians of the present day. Men seem to delight in getting entangled in a maze of theories, and view with reluctance every simple proposition, from which the practical deduction is obvious. It is a truth so plain, that it comes into the mind with the readiness of knowledge derived from mere sensation, that there is no natural necessity for distress in this country, and that there is not only enough, but abundance for all, were it not for some pernicious defect which puts it out of the power of the people to use their labour for their own advantage. Land is uncultivated, while the people perish for want of that which, if the land were cultivated, it would produce, and they are ready and willing to cultivate it if they were permitted. Anomalies so monstrous exist around us in all directions, but we fear to look them in the face, because, were they publicly acknowledged, we see that we should of necessity immediately bestir ourselves, and do something, and make sacrifices of unused possessions. We therefore willingly hide our faces, and obscure our vision in the perplexing folds of the mantle of the political economists.

The discussion respecting the reduction of the Barilla duty, without the consent of Parliament, was renewed this evening on Mr Poulett Thompson's motion for going into committee. The right honourable gentleman's defence was a sufficiently good argumentum ad hominem, and effectual against the members of the late government, who, as it appeared, had fallen into a similarly unconstitutional practice; but upon the general question of the impropriety of such a proceeding, Mr Thompson's defence was of no force at all, and serves but to shew the poor subterfuge which he was obliged to resort to, in order to cover the indiscretion into which his despotic vanity had led him. Mr Sadler in vain appealed to the justice and compassion of the House, assuring it, that the alterations already effected in the duty upon foreign Barilla, had "inflicted the deepest misery upon thousands" of the producers of the native manufacture. In vain Sir Matthew Ridley demonstrated the injury which would follow to the shipping interest, and gave all the weight of his long experience to the assertion, that the measure was one of the most pernicious ever submitted to the House. In vain Mr Attwood, whose knowledge upon all commercial matters is so superior to that of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, assured the House, that the facts and arguments of the right honourable gentleman were utterly at variance with the practice. The "Philosophers" had their way—the misery of thousands of poor people—experience—practice—were all thrown overboard, and the resolutions passed without a division.

On the 8th, Lord King, in pursuance of his plan of warfare against the Church and the Clergy, read in the House of Lords a letter containing a gross attack on the son of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, his father being present. The reply of the Bishop was eminently becoming an affectionate father, and a prelate of the Church—he vindicated the character of his son, and trusted the noble lord would feel shame and sorrow for having brought forward so uncalled-for an attack. His Lordship arose and stated that he felt neither sorrow nor shame, though he admitted the excellent character of the clergyman against whom the letter was directed. The matter is worthy of notice for the sake of shewing the temper and behaviour of one of the champions of sweeping reform. How happy would society be under the guardianship and guidance of such men as Lord King!

The Commons were occupied during the greater part of this evening by the speeches of Mr Hunt, the member for Preston, and Mr Bennett, the member for Wiltshire, respecting the personal concern which they had each had in the late affrays in the country. Mr Hunt's motion, which was for an address to the Crown to pardon those who had been convicted in the trials under the Special Commission, was foolish and unconstitutional; and the harangue with which he introduced it was a rambling, blundering, tedious detail, which now and then excited laughter, but would have been much more amusing had it been much more brief. Mr Bennet recounted his valorous deeds among the rural rioters,—

"Wherein he spoke of most disastrous chances,

Of moving accidents by flood and field,
Of hair-breadth 'scapes i' the imminent dreadful breach,"

and gave to his encounters much more of the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war," than was necessary upon the occasion. Mr G. Lamb and Lord Morpeth seemed ambitious to shew how much finer they could talk than Mr Hunt. He of the blacking vans had blundered something about Sparta and Athens, one of which places he seemed to imagine was in Rome, and the other in Greece, and talked some nonsense respecting a statue to a young ruffian who had been convicted of felony, and the propriety of covering it with greens or cabbage, or some other ornament familiar to his fancy; all of which Mr Lamb did into pretty English, and talked of "that young man for whom they were to erect statues, and crown him with wreaths of evergreen." Lord Morpeth was determined to be yet finer, and disavowed his inclination to crown with "eternal chaplets" this young convict. The young lord then begged leave to quote some Latin verse, and having done so, sat down in a fit of amazing contentment with himself. Now this is rather a clever young man, but so spoiled with the foppery of learning, and the affectation of being very wise, and moderate, and elegant, and so forth, that it is not likely that, as a public man, he will ever be worth a farthing. After Hunt's motion was negatived by a majority of 269 to 2, there was some very violent and indecent behaviour on the part of Mr O'Gorman Mahon, whom the chair was obliged to treat with a degree of sharpness, which it is fortunately but seldom necessary to use in the House of Commons. We do not know how long the House is to bear with the very extraordinary manners which this honourable member thinks proper to assume within it. Compared with him, Mr Hunt is a person of extreme civilisation.

Lord Althorpe spoke with spirit and good sense on the state of Ireland. The obvious tendency of Mr O'Connell's conduct seems to be at length understood, and stubborn facts have made it impossible to keep up the delusion that the "healing measure" of 1829 had restored Ireland to peace and subordination. The Repeal of the Union is not merely an extravagant project, it is a wicked pretext to raise disturbance, to inflame the people, to extract money from them to fill the pockets of the bully O'Connell,

I heart a deed, and to gratify his insatiable thirst of vulgar and vociferous applause. The Agitator has every requisite for being extensively mischievous, except courage. His speeches, as Lord Althorpe says, are cautiously terminated with a recommendation of obedience to the law, while they evidently tend to insurrection and rebellion. Justly then does the Minister say, that the wise policy of his Majesty's government is firmly to suppress that violent and seditious conduct which tends to insurrection and rebellion; and by measures of conciliation and kindness, to shew the people of Ireland that there is every disposition to attend to, and remove, their grievances. The government are determined to use their utmost exertions to resist the designs of the agitators, but at the same time, by giving employment to the people of Ireland, by repealing such laws as are obnoxious to them, and by other measures of a similar character, to do all they can to conciliate their affections. Considerable indignation has been expressed in some quarters at the further declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he should prefer even civil war to the dismemberment and destruction of the empire, but in this indignation there is more of sentimentality than good sense. The sword is, no doubt, a dreadful alternative, but there is more mercy in restoring and establishing order, even by force and severity, than in permitting a perpetual state of public disturbance, and all the evils of civil war, except corporeal wounds and death.

On the 11th, Lord King, to whom must be conceded the possession of an unrivalled fund of sneering vituperation, proceeded with his attack upon the Church Establishment, and on this occasion received from Lords Winchelsea and Wynford a measure of castigation, which will tell with the public, whether it have or have not any effect upon a person of Lord King's understanding and feelings. Lord Wynford, especially, held up, in so strong a light, as must bring conviction to every mind, the meanness and the unfairness with which, night after night, advantage was taken of the absence of individuals, in order to calumniate them or their connexions. "H," he said, "the noble baron had any particular grievance to complain of, and a remedy for it to propose, why did he not bring it regularly before the House, with notice to the parties concerned? but he had come down, night after night, attacking the right reverend Prelates, in defiance of every principle of English justice, which ordains that he whose character is to be attacked, should previously be warned of the charge. The noble lord had thought proper to attack Lord Stowell, though he was absent from the intimities of age, and though his brother, Lord Eldon, was prevented by illness from being present to defend him. Did the noble lord not know of the absence of both these noble and learned lords? and if he did, was this a time to bring forward such a charge, without a single friend of Lord Stowell being apprized of his intention? But it was fortunate for the noble and learned lord that the whole complexion of his life was a contradiction to a charge, which, were he in his place to reply to, he would answer in such a manner as the noble baron could not stand under."

The President of the Council (Lord Lansdowne) recorded his opinion, that a little "fair dealing" would be advisable in the House, and the Duke of Buckingham contended that the right of the Church to its property was as strong as that of any noble lord to his estate.

The proceedings of the House of Commons this evening were distinguished by an unsuccessful attempt on the part of Mr Hume to speak. It will not be supposed that any sudden fit of bashfulness overcame the modest member for Middlesex, or that his feelings overpowered him and deprived him of utterance. No, no—it took a power no less than that which overthrew Napoleon in the North, to stop the mouth of Joseph Hume—his voice was frozen up,

"Vox factus hœret."

Baffled by a thawing world, the cold transferred its empire to the throat of the member for Middlesex, as the next in magnitude of importance. Thrice the honourable member essayed to speak, and thrice, (tell it not in Aberdeen, and whisper it not in the streets of Brechin,) amid peals of universal laughter, his attempt turned out mere dumb shew. Mr Hunt sang a lament over his friend's misfortune and the barbarity of the House; and the member for Middlesex went home, to take warm gruel, and expel the enemy from his throat. Gaol business in Wiltshire, and in the city of Dublin, occupied the most part of the evening.

Friday night, the 11th, was devoted to the discussion of the important financial plans of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which created a degree of curiosity and deep interest, unusual in these modern days, and yet not more than proportioned to the occasion which called them forth. In England, where, it is said, "every thing resolves itself into a matter of finance," the measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are doubtless the most seriously interesting that can come before the public; but as the fear of evil is a more exciting principle than the prospect of good, it is always the imposition of new imposts, rather than the repeal of the old, which rouses attention, and calls forth activity. Lord Althorpe got on swimmingly, increasing in favour with Whig, Tory, and Radical, while he spoke of taking taxes off; but no sooner did he turn to the other side of the account, and begin to enumerate those which he would lay on, than he sunk down in esteem, even much lower than the point from which he set out. The task of a Finance Minister, particularly of one who has taken part in all the quackeries and follies of British legislation for the last sixteen years, is indeed a most difficult and embarrassing one. He sees the necessity of extracting a revenue from a people who complain in all quarters of poverty and distress; yet he sees the country teeming with the means of wealth, and manifestly possessing much greater capabilities than it did when a much larger revenue was demanded, and without difficulty obtained. The springs of wealth are there, but their currents seem to have sunk into the earth, and along the banks of their dry and arid channels, crowds of miserable people wander in idle discontent. Why then not go back to the system which, notwithstanding the exhaustion of an enormously expensive war, filled the country with riches and with people, turned wastes into fertile fields, made the bowels of the earth cast forth their hidden wealth of metals and of fuel—covered the land with houses, and filled them with every thing convenient for comfort or luxury,—and reared up innumerable manufactories, with power almost unlimited, of supplying all, except food,—that poverty could ask to make it rich? Alas! he cannot so return: he and his “enlightened” friends, and no less “enlightened” opponents, have over and over, in the face of the warnings of experience, described the alterations which have been made as blessings; and now, when they see that a practical curse has come, personal feeling still keeps up the delusion, and they will still pursue the enlightened and scientific road to ruin. One thing, however, has been for some years plainly seen, though they seem in the House of Commons afraid to talk about it, that the funded interest is the only flourishing one—the only one unburdened, and the only one from which, in the present situation of the country, any considerable addition of revenue can be expected. Mr Pitt, in his wisdom to assure the public creditor, made the Acts of Parliament very express against any deduction or expense coming between him and the full advantage of a transferable interest-bearing loan. Mr Peel, in his error, increased the value of the principal to be transferred, and the interest to be paid, by increasing the value of the currency in which these amounts were expressed, and these circumstances together made the property of the fundholders flourish amid the confusion and decay of all the rest. Lord Althorpe seems to have determined at length to break through acts of Parliament, and make the fund-holder share the charges which cling to every other species of property, and which, without some more active reproducing principle than at present exists, would soon eat it away. The breach could only be made either through Mr Peel's measures affecting the currency, or, more directly, through the acts which may be called public contracts with the fundholder. Most unwisely he chose the latter, and the result was all but universal disapprobation, and consequently, signal defeat. It is needless to repeat that which is now matter of universal knowledge, respecting the details of the proposed budget. The tax of one-half per cent, proposed on transfers of funded property, has been rejected by acclamation, and withdrawn. The indiscretion of the proposal was manifestly extreme—no pains appear to have been taken to ascertain what would be the public sentiment with regard to such a tax, and the usual mistake of Whigs, a presumptuous reliance on their own cleverness, has betrayed them into an error which makes their tenure of official power exceedingly precarious. To the other taxes proposed also, the greatest objections exist. It is very true, that a tax, being a thing essentially disagreeable, must suggest objections wherever it falls; but the skill of the Finance Minister exists in placing it where it will be least felt, and least injurious in its consequences; and it certainly does not seem, that in this respect the Chancellor of the Exchequer has displayed much genus for his office. He removes a part of the tax from newspapers, because it is an impost upon the promulgation of knowledge, and the ready communication of facts and opinions, which high civilisation demands and renders useful; but at the same time, he would tax passengers by steam-boats, which is striking a much more effectual blow at the advantages which free communication affords, than even the high duty on newspapers could inflict.

The principle of affording encouragement and protection to our own colonies, is directly invaded by the alteration in the duties on wines; and a tax on the importation of unmanufactured cotton, with its attendant machinery of drawbacks on the manufactured article, is a cumbrous and impolitic method of raising a revenue. The timber of Canada is legislated against, while the wine of France is encouraged, as if we were sure of the quiet contentment and prosperity of the former, or could hope for any reciprocal advantage from the latter! No one can deny the good which would arise from the abolition of the taxes on coals and candles, and the reduction of that on newspapers; and few will be disposed to question the good intention with which the alterations have been proposed, but we do not believe that, in order to purchase such advantages, it is necessary to submit to imposts so injurious in their probable effects as those which have been proposed.

On Tuesday the 15th, a discussion on the real state of the trade of the kingdom was brought on by the submission of what Alderman Waithman calls "a string of resolutions," to the House on the subject. On this subject we have unfortunately but to tell over again the old story. The reasoning of practical men, and even their attestation as to facts, were met by abstract propositions, and reference to official returns. That which these returns would indicate ought to be, and not that which is, was relied upon by Ministers, and acted upon by the House. Mr Attwood shewed, as plainly as it was possible to be shewn, that the reasonings from these returns were quite fallacious; that while the trade was greater, the traders were in a state of ruin, and the people suffering misery, while these returns would go to prove that they were consuming luxuries. How long shall our patience be abused by this abstract insanity, in matters of practice on which the evidence of circumstances lies plainly before us, if we would but look at it?

The first of March approaches, and all look forward with eager anxiety to the developement of the Ministerial Plan of Reform. The failure in the Budget is looked upon as an evil augury to Ministerial success.

S. 1st.—The Snuggery.—Time—Nine o'clock.—Present—NORTH, the SHEPHERD, and TICKLE.

SHEPHERD.

The Snuggery sit, has a power o' contraction an' expansion, that never belonged afore to any room in this sublunary world. Let the party be three or thirty, it accommodates its dimensions to the gatherin'—still the Snuggery, though the Saloon.

NORTH.

I hope you approve of the Burial, James, among the finest of Macdonald's.

SHEPHERD.

Life-in-death Emages' A'berst, methinks, are solemn—a lot for thee, they are shoo-blime. What's that aboon your head, sir?

NORTH.

Socrates.

SHEPHERD.

The Christopher North o' the ancient, as you are the Socrates o' the modern Athens. Baith o' you by natur, as may be read in your fiznomies, wi' a strang bias to animal—to sensual indulgences; an' baith o' you, by means o' self-study and self-government, pure in conduct, in heart, and in hum', as our philosopher that ever strengthened, by his practice, his theory o' truth. Oh! sir, but the Sophists hate you wi' a malignant hatred—and fan wou'd they condemn you to drink the hemlock, aye, out o' that verra punch-bowl, the dolphin himsell—

NORTH.

I have an antidote against all poison, James——

SHEPHERD.

What is't?

NORTH.

Hush. An herb of sovereign virtue, gathered on the Sacred Mountains.

SHEPHERD.

What's the Emage atowre un pow?

NORTH.

Wordsworth—the Plato of poetry.

SHEPHERD.

Bee't sae. I seldom read Plawto.

TICKLE.

Here we are, once more, James—the Knights of St Ambrose——

SHEPHERD.

An admirable, but an indescribable set o'——

TICKLER.

Satirists, caricaturists, madcaps, harebrains, bee-in-the-bonnets, scape-goats, scape-graces, idlers, dreamers, loungers, ramblers, spectators, tattlers, amateurs, cognoscenti, artists, poets, painters, sculptors, novelists, critics, politicians, physicians, theologians, metaphysicians, statesmen, saints, sinners, heroes, patriots, martyrs——

SHEPHERD.

Mankind's Epitome.

NORTH.

Our orgies, James, have thrown their share of light on human life.

TICKLER.

That motley masquerade called human life!

NORTH.

In which, here and elsewhere, we have contrived, not discreditably, to support our characters. I hope, my dear James, that you sometimes think of Ambrose's, when going out to meditate at even-tide by the shores of St Mary's Loch, or up away yonder to the Loch of the Lowes, where, when stillness steepens the solitude, you even hear the Grey-Mare's Tail——

SHEPHERD.

Whuskin' through the wild, wi' an eerie sigh, till again it is hushed as death—aye, as the verri grave.

TICKLER.

Think you sometimes of us, then, James?

SHEPHERD.

I ha'e startled to hear that 'Tum pierce sm' the bonn in the wilderness, and a' at once ha'e believed myself in the heart o' Ambro' here in the Snugery—wi' your twa endless legs, Mr Tickler, emblems o' minuteness and eternity, stretched awa' until the regions about the earth, far ayeont the bounds o' this "visible diurnal sphere," and creawtin' superstitious terrors in the inhabitants o' Sawturn.

NORTH.

Tickler?

SHEPHERD.

Oh, su' how many tailors are for how many years, night and day employed, without respect to Sabbaths, in gettin' up for you ae pair o' breezings?

TICKLER.

You are pleased to be facetious—su'.

SHEPHERD.

Maist facetious—but it's no in the pool o' the wut o' mortal man to do justice to the fooljerk.

NORTH.

You do, however, my dear Shepherd, sometimes think of us in the Forest?

SHEPHERD.

Hoo the hts and feelings, su', do arise, and follow ane another in the sowle, like flocks o' birds frae distant regions, and disappearing about the hft intil distant regions, flocks after flocks, withouten end, sometimes in wintry weather, when flakes are visibly augmenting the snaw-wreaths, and sometimes in autumn, when the leaves are rustlin' to the bit robin-red-breast——

NORTH.

What imagery!

SHEPHERD.

——preparin', etc lang, to flit down the glen, and tak' up his domicile among the dwellins o' us Christian creatures, that never grudge our crumbs to the birdie, safe in his scarlet shield frae the verri cats, wha, for fear o' the weans, daurna touch a feather, by love and pity consecrated ever syne the burial o' the Babes in the Wood——

NORTH.

A story, that in its touching simplicity, would almost seem to have been written, prophetically, for Blackwood's Magazine.

SHEPHERD.

It's an out-o'-the-way place, the Forest, sirs, though a great road rins through't; for it's no easy to break the charm o' the seelence and the solitariness o' natur'. A great road rins through't; but after ha'e I sat on a knowe commanding miles o't, and no ae single speck astir, far as the ee could reach—no a single speck, but aiblins a sheep crossin', or a craw alichtin', or an auld crouchin' beggar-woman, that ye thocht was leavin' motionless on her stick, till, by and by, ye discerned the colour o' her red cloak, and a gae while afterwards, saw, rather than heard her, prayin' for an awmous, wi' shuivelled hauns faulded on her breast, or in their palsy held up heavenwards, sae beseechingly as to awauken charity in a meeser's heart!

NORTH.

But no miser, James, art thou—though but a poor man, thou hast a hand open as day to melting charity."

SHEPHERD.

What Heaven has been pleased to give me o' this life's needments, o' that I never grudged a share to ony son or dochter o' affliction.

NORTH.

True as holy writ.

SHEPHERD.

And holy writ it was that taucht me—for our natur', sir, is selfish, and it's my belief that mony and mony a time wud the best o' us neglect the commonest duties o' humanity, if it weren a for religion. We hae a', at times, hard cauld hearts; and I dinna scruple to confess, that I've felt my anger risin' at beggars—even at auld bowed-down widow-beggars—when three or fowte o' them in the course o' a lang summer day hae come creepin' in succession, at a snail's pace, in at the yett, and then taken their station at the vera parlour-window, wi' a sort o' meek obstinacy and wae-begone dourness that wou'd na understan' the repulse o' neglect, or even o' a waff o' the haum to be awa' wi' themselves—when suddenly some holy text has been revived in my heart, perhaps that ane tellin' o' the widow and her mite, and a' at ance, as if an angel had jogged my elbow, I hae ca'd the puir auld body in; and then to be sure the wite hersel wasna slaw, without waitin' for a word frae me, to come wi' her ain twa comely hauns fu' o' meal, and empty them tidily intil the wallet, no unobserved, sir, by Him wha taucht us to say, "Give us this day our daily bread."

TICKLER.

Yes, my dear James, the blessing of many a waytaring man and woman—

SHEPHERD.

Wi' troops o' weans—

TICKLER.

—has been on Mount Benger.

SHEPHERD.

It needed them a', for it's a gae cauld place stannin' yowner on a knowe in a funnel, in the thoroughfare o' a perpetual sigh. Yet 'twas cheerfu' in the sun-glints, and hallowed be the chawm in which my bairns were born! Howsomever, we're fully as comfortable noo at Altrive Lake—a far lousier spot—and yon nyeuck o' the garden, wi' the bit bourtree-bower, oh, sir! but it's an inspirin' retreat frae the din and daffin' o' the weans, for the indit'n o' a bit cheerfu' or pensie sang! Sometimes, indeed, wee Jamie tu's me out, and thrusts the sweet lauching face o' him through the thoruleless branches, to frichten me, as he thinks—God bless the bonnie bogle!—but I scauld him aff wi' a pretended anger, and a frown fu' o' luvie, and awa' veers he thro' amang the flowers like a butterfly, while out o' my heart gushes the sang like a shower-swollen stream.

TICKLER.

'Childless Eld feels as if he were a father, James, at such a picture.

SHEPHERD.

You and Mr North should baith marry yet. Indeed Mrs Gentle maun be—

NORTH.

James! (putting his finger to his lips,)
SHEPHERD.

Forgie me, sir.

NORTH.

Have you read the last number of the Quarterly Review, James?

SHEPHERD.

No. It hauns come our length yet.

NORTH.

'Tis therein said, James, that in these our Noctes you are absurdly represented as a "boozing buffoon."

SHEPHERD.

What? In the Quarterly? Na—na—sir. I can swallow a gude den-frae you—but that's bacon I canna bolt. The yeditor kens better—for—

NORTH.

But, like other editors, James, he sometimes naps when he should only be nodding, and sometimes nods when he should be broad awake as a ful north-west moon.

SHEPHERD.

Eh?

NORTH.

Some hypocritical humbug has had the audacity, however, to palm that falselood upon our dozing friend, and, through him, on the Pensive Public?
—some brainless big-wig, who believes that the Baltic has been drunk half dry by a whale.

SHEPHERD.

NORTH.

At this moment, James, that "budge doctor of the Stoic Fur" fears that the world thinks you are a ten-gallon-man, that you have a sma'-still in your bedroom, and that you have bribed the ranger by making him a pal-four-boarder.

SHEPHERD.

Haw! haw! haw! haw!

NORTH.

Every thing the Cockney reads he takes for gospel.

SHEPHERD.

Except, aiblins, the Bible.

TICKLER.

Good, James—good.

NORTH.

That the rhinoceros drinks a river every morning before breakfast—

TICKLER.

And the war-horse literally devours the ground between him and his enemies—swallowing at bunch five acres, four roods, and three perches.

SHEPHERD.

Haw! haw! haw! haw!

NORTH.

So, being a man of the strictest veracity, and of the highest authority in the moral world, the mandarin shakes his head at our Noctes, and gives not only the lie circumstantial, but the lie direct to a fact unfortunately established, I fear, in the conviction of the Pensive Public, that We Three have frequently demolished at a sitting the Tower of Babel.

TICKLER.

Were the worthy gentleman here now, why he would be under the table in a state of civilisation superior to any thing seen since the last debauch of Sardana.

NORTH.

'Tis a sad dog—and, to my knowledge—with a wife and a dozen children
—keeps a—

SHEPHERD.

O fie, sir, nae personalities. We maun pity and forgie stupidity when it tries to mander—even though it mander melle.

TICKLER.

I presume he has made a pilgrimage to the grave of Sir Roger de Coverley.

NORTH.

Sleeping in the sunshine side by side with Will Wimble.

TICKLER.

He believes devoutly, no doubt, that the Spectator had a short nose——

NORTH.

And got boozy thrice a-week at Button's.

TICKLER.

• The world is well stocked just now, James, with matter-of-fact men——

SHEPHERD.

What? Can't ye't a matter-o'-fact that a boozin' buffoon ever Glenlivetized at the Noctes?

TICKLER.

It is a matter-of-fact lie, James—and that the Cockney knoweth right well; but he wished to do you a kindness, without in his dotage clearly comprehending how to set about it, and with the best intentions in the world, has accordingly committed one of the usual calumnies of the Cockneys, manifestly priding himself all the while in the idea of having essentially served the Patrick Shepherd, and given him a shove up the bill of preferment.

NORTH.

Somewhat of the latest—a feeble fumble of falsehood at the eleventh hour.

SHEPHERD.

I'm sure I ought to be muckle obliged to the weak, but weel-mennin' man for his vindication o' my character. But I houp the wark o' superelevation may na be ill for his constitution; and it's the first time I ever heard o' any body's pityin' Atlas for supportin' on his back and shouthers the starry heavens.

NORTH.

He then tells the Pensive Public, that at our Noctes the entire talk is of "Party Politics."

SHEPHERD.

Na! that's an even-doon lee—and gin' a writer wull indulge in trash, he should spic 't wi' at least an grain o' truth, or he'll be in danger, in a fit o' coughing, to choke on his ain slaver.

TICKLER.

Don't be coarse, James.

SHEPHERD.

Coarse? Wha's fine but fules? Muckle nonsense we do speak at the Noctes—but party-politics we leave to the twa Houses o' Parliament—an' discuss, when we hae discussion, the universal and eternal interests o' mankind.

TICKLER.

The truth is, gents, that this jackass must have had his long ears pulled, and his tawty hide knouted by Maga, and Joannes has with his well-known good-nature indulged him in a quarterly bray——

SHEPHERD.

A jackass brayin' at the moon! a comical cemaige.

NORTH.

But still he must be cudgelled off the premises, and "taught never to come there no more,"—if it were only for the sake of the poor echoes.

SHEPHERD.

Do you ken, sirs, that it's a curious fuck in natur' that the bray o' an ass has nae echo? Gin it had an echo, sic is the disposition o' the cretur, that it would keep brayin' till it drapped doon dead, forgetfu' o' its thustles; whereas, by the present constitution o' the breed, nae lang-continued brayin' can tak' place acropp when there are a multitude o' asses by some strange chance colleckit together; and then, indeed, ilka ane imagines that a' the rest are but his echoes, and thus, in pride o' heart, the gang do astonish the heavens. But in the Quarterly Review, the ass aforesaid maun find himsell a solitary beast, and will sune loot doon his lang leather and lanthorn jaws in seelence amang the dockens.

TICKLER.

I only hope he won't cross the breed, James, else, instead of the ethereal coursers of the sun that run in that chariot, ere long we shall see a team of mules that, in their native obstinacy, will reest when they meet with any up-hill work, or bolt obliquely into the sea.

SHEPHERD.

Nae fears.

TICKLER.

I am delighted to see that the Quarterly—like some other Periodicals—has the spunk to imitate Maga in her Double Numbers. The last was, in general, admirable, and is to be followed immediately—next time I hope the two will appear simultaneously—by another, which I doubt not will be worthy of its predecessor, now justly making a distinguished figure in the world.

NORTH.

The Quarterly Review is a great national work, and may it live for ever. Notwithstanding his not unfrequent oversights, not a man alive could edit it in such a style as Mr Lockhart.

SHEPHERD.

No me. But wha's he this?

NORTH.

The wisecrack, James, has been pleased to inform the Royal Society of Literature, that, in spite of the Noctes, the Ettrick Shepherd is a sober man, and a loyal subject.

SHEPHERD.

Hoo ken's he that?

NORTH.

He also says, James, that Altrive is as melancholy a solitude as can be imagined—

SHEPHERD.

What? and wee Jamie there!

NORTH.

And speaks of you as a fit object, not only of patronage, but of pity.

SHEPHERD.

Pity I spurn—patronage I never asked—but for the patronage of enlightened men, if it ever be bestowed upon me, I hope that I shall have deserved it.

NORTH.

James, let us, for a moment, be serious on this subject. All Britain—and many other lands besides—have delighted in the Noctes Ambrosianae, of which you are the Life and the Soul. Ours has been ever "weel-timed daffin;" our mirth

"On the wan cheek of sorrow has waken'd a smile,
And illumined the eye that was dim with a tear!"

SHEPHERD.

Aften, sir—I ken aften—

NORTH.

In our higher moods, we have opened our hearts to one another, nor concealed one secret there that ought to be divulged in the sacred intercourse of friendship between man and man.

SHEPHERD.

Aften, sir, aften.

NORTH.

We have unburdened to one another our hearts of cares and sorrows, which we share in common with all our brethren of mankind;

"All our secret hoards of unsunn'd griefs" have—as far as might and ought to be—been laid out in the light of confident affection, and been aired by the gracious gales of heaven.

SHEPHERD.

Now and then sic has indeed been the case.

NORTH.

We have looked over the fields of human life, and we have made our reflections on the on-goings there, sometimes, perhaps, in no unlearned spirit, not seldom in a spirit which I do not fear to call religious, and almost always in a spirit of humanity—blaming none but the worthless—honouring the good—and celebrating the great—whatever tongues they speak, whatever climes they inhabit.

SHEPHERD.

We hae dune that, sir, to the best o' our abeelity—and our abeefity's no sma', unless the warld be a leear.

NORTH.

Seldom do we talk about politics at all, here, James; but when we do, assuredly not about party politics, as I said a moment ago; but about such measures of the Ministry or Government as affect the well-being of the State. Occasionally we have taken a glance at the Continent, where revolutions are brewing, or have burst, and where the deafest ear may hear, like subterranean music, a hubbub foretelling war. Now and then, when excursively disposed, we

“Survey mankind from China to Peru;”

and more than once, embarking in our Ship of Heaven, with Imagination at the helm, we have doubled Cape Horn.

SHEPHERD.

Circumnavigawtors!

NORTH.

Nor have we feared, James, at times

—“to pierce

The caves obscure of old Philosophy.”

TICKLER.

And to bring up in a bucket Truth from the bottom of her well.

NORTH.

In short, James, there is no subject which, at our Noctes, we have not touched; and none have we touched that we did not adorn;—making

“Beauty still more beauteous.”

SHEPHERD.

And ugliness mair ugsome, till the stammach o' the universe scunner'd at vice.

NORTH.

And of such Dialogues, diviner than those of Plato—yea, even than his Banquet—our friend presumes to say that the staple is boozing buffoonery, and party-politics!

SHEPHERD.

He's wrang there.

NORTH.

Now, James, what were the politics of the Quarterly Review—I speak of a period previous to its present management—during, perhaps, the most perilous crisis in which this country had ever been placed? I ought rather to say where were its politics? Why, according to a tardy confession in the last Number, they were kept sealed up by Mr Canning, with his official impress, in the conscience of Mr Gifford.

SHEPHERD.

Eh? What? Hoo?

NORTH.

While we, James,—while Maga, James,—while the Noctes, James, were defending the principles of the British constitution, bearding its enemies, and administering to them the knout, the Quarterly Review was mute and mum as a mouse—

TICKLER.

Afraid to lose the countenance and occasional assistance of Mr Canning!

NORTH.

There indeed, James, was a beautiful exhibition of party politics—a dignified exhibition of personal independence——

TICKLER.

Of Tory-truckling enough to make the Collector of the Jacobite Relics a Whig.

NORTH.

The old gentleman informs the Royal Society of Literature, that they must not suffer themselves to be deluded by the Noctes into a belief that the Ettrick Shepherd is not a “loyal subject.” Do traitors compose new King’s anthems? Set loyal songs to their own music? Rout and root out radicals? Baste the Blue-and-Yellow till it is black in the back? And, while the lips of hirelings are locked, chant hymns

“To the pilot that weathered the storm?”

SHEPHERD.

Ma poem on Pitt’s prime.

TICKLER.

Maga has been the mouthpiece of constitutional monarchy——

SHEPHERD.

Ever syne the Chaldee.

NORTH.

Methinks that, with respect to politics, either party or national, the Quarterly Review, of bygone days at least, ought not thus to take such high ground above Maga, seeing that it has, by its own voluntary acknowledgment, hitherto occupied the lowest ever assigned to servility; and that the mautes of Mr Canning’s mute should remain mute still about Maga, who never suffered Prime Minister or Foreign Secretary to shut her mouth, although Christopher North loved and admired George Canning as well as ever William Gifford did, they being, I do not fear to say it, far more congenial spirits; though, to be sure, there was no debtor and creditor account between them, except such as may be kept open between independent men, and closed by either party at pleasure.

TICKLER.

He was a fine—a noble spirit.

NORTH.

He was. But though his smiles charmed, his frowns quailed not Maga; and can it be questioned by the gentlemen of England, that the Quarterly should have deserted Canning rather than the country, at a time that seemed to be alike the crisis of either, and that gratitude to a friend, had he been a bosom-brother, should have yielded to love of one’s father-land?

SHEPHERD.

I’m in the dark, like Moses when the candle went out, about this, my boy. What are ye tawkin’ about?

TICKLER.

Change the subject, Kit. Yet one word, if you please, on the Quarterly’s benefactions to the Ettrick Shepherd. Has she all along shewn the same fiery zeal in defence, support, and exculpation of our friend, now exhibited in “thoughts that breathe and words that burn” by this Curious Antique?

NORTH.

James, nearly twenty years have elapsed since the publication of the Queen’s Wake. The Edinburgh Review did justice to the genius that shines in that poem. But because you turned out to be a loyal Tory, instead of a disloyal Whig, never again did Mr Jeffrey do honour to the Shepherd’s plaid. Nay, a poor creature attacked you personally in an article on your Jacobite Relics—and as a proof of your total want of taste, and your utter unfitness for the task, quoted as the best of all these old ballads, Donald McGillivray, not one of the worst of your own; his ignorance neutralizing his malice, and his stupidity paying unconsciously the highest tribute to your genius.

SHEPHERD.

I had the blockhead on the hip, there, sir, and in Maga I g’ied him his licks till his hips were like indigo.

NORTH.

You did. But during all these twenty years, when you were nobly struggling on, swimming against the stream, with bold heart and sinewy arms, giving buffet for buffet, and though sometimes losing way, yet recovering it by your own energies, and like a water-dragon cresting the spate, pray what assistance or encouragement gave the Quarterly to the bard, seemingly about, at times, to be carried down into the waters of oblivion ? None.

SHEPHERD.

Nane, indeed, or a sma' share waur than nane.

NORTH.

A sneering article on your Poetic Mirror, "damning with faint praise," was all her generosity could afford, all her justice could grant; and I hope you were thankful for the largesse.

SHEPHERD.

I remember naething about it.

NORTH.

Seeing that you were known to be such a loyal subject, why was not the Ettrick Shepherd cheered in the Forest by the voice of praise, which would have at least soothed, if it could not relieve his virtuous poverty ?

SHEPHERD.

I surely deserved better at their hauns, for I'm willing to pitch the Queen's Wake again' ony Oxford poem that ever was wrocht by ony Oxford Professor.

TICKLER.

No sneers at Milman—the most imaginative of all our poets of the classical school.

SHEPHERD.

Is't a sneer at the Fa' o' Jerusalem, to offer to compare we't, in pint o' genie—for I gie up the polish o' the feenishin o' the execution—wi' the Queen's Wake : Ma certes !

NORTH.

Each successive poem of that beautiful writer was highly—not too highly—praised in the Quarterly Review, to which he has been one of the most powerful contributors. On every account he deserved such eulogies. But why were you forgotten, James ? First, because a Scotchman—and, secondly, because you were a shepherd.

SHEPHERD.

And a shepherd's as gude ony day as a shoemaker—though Bloomfield was aye;—as for Gifford, I jalouse he was never mair nor a cobbler.

NORTH.

James, in this age, genius often lives the life, and dies the death of a slave. True devotion is lost in idol worship, a shepherd has no chance against a lord—his sweet solitary pipe is drowned in the clangour of many trumpets.

SHEPHERD.

I'm easy. Mine 'll aye continue to be heard at intervals, like the sang o' the linty among the broom in the season o' spring,—and them that loves to listen to Allan Ramsay, and Robie Burns, and Allan Cunningham, 'll never forget a'thegether the Ettrick Shepherd. That thoct's aneuch for me—and I'm content wi' my fame, sic as it is, amang my native braes.

NORTH.

Right. Your name will never die.

SHEPHERD.

Thank you, sir, here's your health. You've been suffering under a sair hoast, I hear; but thae lozenges maun be Crichton's best, for though last week as hoarse as a crow, your vice is noo musical as that o' the nightingale.

NORTH.

Now, James, look on this picture, and then on this,—from the Quarterly turn to Maga, and exclaim with Wordsworth's lover—

" Oh !

" The difference to me ! "

From the Chaldee to the Winter Rhapsody, she never has been weary of singing your praise. She scorned to flatter—to butter you, James, though well she knew that never yet was flattery lost on poet's ear, nor butter lost on poet's cheek; but she gained and kept for you a clear field and no favour, on which you had elbow-room, James, to contend with all your rivals, and on which you had perpetual opportunities of appearing, with your best foot foremost, before the Pensive Public. Her pages were always open to your genius; and how often, by your genius, have they been illuminated! What, if, since the 1817, when Maga first effulged on a benighted world, she had treated you as the Quarterly did, who now, somewhat late in life, has assured the Royal Society of Literature, that in spite of these wicked Noctes Ambrosianæ which have " frightened the isle from her propriety," the Etrick Shepherd is a loyal subject? Why, let me not hesitate to say, James, that bright as your genius is, the shades of obscurity or of oblivion would long ere now have fallen over it in the Forest.

SHEPHERD.

May be. Burns himsell was little thoct o' in Embro' when he was leevin' in Dumfries.

NORTH.

After your death, my dear James, your fame would have revived, for genius is imperishable; but Maga, and Christopher North, and Yourself, my incomparable Shepherd, by our united power, strong in steadiest friendship, kept the flame of your genius, and the fame of your name, alive during your life, which is better far than that it should have been left, after flickering or going out while its possessor was above ground, to be rekindled on your grave.

SHEPHERD.

Posthumous fame's a wersh thoct without a prein o' the present; for oh, sir! what a difference atween the quick and the dead!

TICKLER.

Did this Censor—

SHEPHERD.

Hear till Mr Tickler—dinna interrupt Mr Tickler.—Mr Tickler, what was ye ettlin to say when Mr North took the word out o' your mouth?

TICKLER.

Did the old gentleman who draws about the boozing buffoonery of the Noctes, ever hear of a celebrated lawyer, one Pleydell, who, in his leisure hours, was strenuously addicted to High Jinks?

SHEPHERD.

I daursay never—he'll prove to be the individual that never heard o' Sir Walter Scott. My freen, Mr Cadell, ance tell't me o' either himsell or an acquaintance forgathering, on the tap o' a coteh, wi' a weel-informed man, in black claes, wha had never heard o' Sir Walter, o' Abbotsford, or the Scotch Novels. He maun be the contributor.

NORTH.

How he came not only to hear of you, James, but to be among the number, if we believe him, of your familiars, is as puzzling as his ignorance of the existence of the greatest man alive; yet, in his simplicity, he supposes the Royal Society of Literature to stand in need of some recondite information from his pen, about the life and character, and genius of a Bard, whose name—the Etrick Shepherd—has long been a household word all over Britain.

TICKLER.

In what unknown cave do these seers abide, supposed to be thus unacquainted with all the ongoings of the upper world?

NORTH.

They live in London—

SHEPHERD.

And me in the Forest. Fowre hunder miles, aften o' mist and maw, intrudes between them and me—and I'm muckle obliged, after a', to the honest gentleman, for remindin' them o' my existence, and for cleanin' my character, aboon a' things, frae the stain o' disloyalty contracted frae the traitors wha hae sae lang been plottin' against Church and King at the Noctes Ambrosianæ. I thank him also for telling their worship that I'm a sober man—though I canna quite agree wi' him in conceevin' to be ony proof to the contrair, that some sax times a-year I indulge in a gaudeamus in the Snuggery. Thank him, too, for assuring the Society, that our meetings here are no purely imaginary, as some coofs jalouse—and that this Glendlivet—oh! but it outdoes itself the night—is no mere pented air, sic as ane endeavours unavailingly to drink in his dreams. He has removed the Noctes frae the shadowy and unsubstantial realms o' Faery, intil the solid world o' reality, established for perpetuity “their local habitation and their name” in the minds of all the people of Britain and elsewhere—yea, embalmed their remembrance in the more than Egyptian wisdom o' his ain genius—

TICKLER.

A pair of mummies, that, when countless generations have passed away, and left no memorial of their being, will be preserved in the museums of the curious and scientific, and poetry penned upon them by the wonder of bards flourishing during the Millennium.

NORTH.

I should be sorry, my dear James, to let the world believe, with the lacrymose eulogist of your sobriety and loyalty—virtues as native to your orb as light and heat to that of the sun,—a luminary, by the by, which he ought forthwith to vindicate from the generally credited calumny, that he seldom goes to bed, or rises from it, without drinking an unconscionable draught of the sea,—I should be sorry, I say, James, to let the world believe that you are a melancholy man, living in a melancholy place, the victim of unmerited misfortunes, and the misunderstood and misrepresented Interpreter in these our Dialogues, at once the disgrace and the delight of the age—countenanced though they be by Kings on their thrones, Bishops and Judges on their benches, Peers and Peasants in hall and hut, Ladies in silk, and Lassies in grogram—

By “Laughter holding both his sides.”

NORTH.

And by Il Penseroso, “under the shade of melancholy boughs,” feeling himself gradually growing into L'Allegro—

TICKLER.

Or coming out of the Cave of Trophonius, with “nods and becks and weathered smiles,” so potent the magic of Maga, folded in a Double Number across his tortised heart.

NORTH.

Most musical thou art, O Shepherd, but not most melancholy; nor hast thou cause, any more than the nightingale, to be other than a merry Bird of Song. True, that with all thy skill and science—witness Hogg on Sheep—thy pastoral farm has not been more prosperous than those of thy competitors; but during all thy struggles, thou didst preserve an unspotted name, nor was there wanting one stanch friend to stand by thee in thy difficulties, whether a new edition of the Wake was deemed advisable, or the publication of Queen Hynde, or a collection of thy matchless Songs, many of them first chanted in this Snuggery, James—and how vocal its roof!—or if thy racy articles, beloved by Maga, were sent in from the Forest to brave the Balaam-Box—that tomb of so many Capulets—one stanch friend, James, whom none but the base abuse—

SHEPHERD.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD. The Ballie has aye been a gude freen to me—but let me say, sir, that I aye gied as gude's I got—and that we staun on the same level o' mutual obligation.

NORTH.

He is your debtor, James—and is proud to be so—

SHEPHERD.

Na—he's no. But in a' his dealings wi' me, he's been the gentleman, which is something mair nor I can say o' some that ance held their head sae high, and far mair than I can say o' others, who, while they trumpet their payment, are as penurious in their poverty as the blusterin' wind that, amidst a glint o' seeming sunshine, brings naething but a cauld blash o' sleet.

NORTH.

Your works, my dear James, in prose and verse, most of them full of the inspiration of true genius, and none of them without its breath, have been, with few months' intermission, appearing before the world, often in Ma-ga for upwards of twenty years—and during all that time, your character has been known to thousands of your admiring and affectionate countrymen. Should any Society, whose noble object it is to reward genius and virtue by solid pudding, and not by empty praise, bestow on you in the calm and bright afternoon of your life—for tis not yet the gleaming, the evening is still far off, and long, long may it be ere cometh to thee the night in which no man can work—there will be a blessing in their bounty—not on you only, but on themselves.

SHEPHERD

Whisht, su, whisht. Poor as I am—I'm independent—at least I'm no idle—and conscious o' my integrity, I'm as happy as a bird, though often, you ken, su, the happiest bird will sit mute and pensive on the bough aside its nest, when its loving mate is cowerin' owre their young ones. I it it was thinkin' within itself what wud become o' them, if it fell aneath the fowler, and the grain were to be a covered wi' spring snaw!

NORTH.

God bless you, my dear James, such melancholy moments but serve to brighten sunshine and gladden song.

SHEPHERD

Oh! but I was cheertu' at the curlew!

H. KIRK

The beet and greens

NORTH

We have put, I think, this matter in the proper light—it moved from it all in suppression—and courteously and kindly reminded the Quarterly, that should the genius and virtues of the author of the Queen's Wake and the Lattrick Shepherd receive their due and dignified reward from my enlightened patronage, whether of an individual or a society, no praise can in that case, by possibility, be deserved by that rich but rather stingy periodical, because that, whatever merit may belong to any one besides the poet himself and those who may prove his benefactors, it most assuredly does belong to William Blackwood, Christopher North, and Ma-ga—to whom——

SHEPHERD

I beg leave to add, with heart fu' o' everlasting gratitude, John Gibson Lockhart, and Sir Walter Scott.

NORTH

On whom, now and ever, be all blessings poured from heaven—and may the light of their hearths burn bright as that of their fame!

SHEPHERD.

Amen,—Hurraw! hurraw! hurraw! Noo, I'll sing you a bit sang, out o' the colleckshun.

O, weel betha' the maiden gay,
In cottage, bught, or penn,
An' weel betha' the bonny May
That wons in yonder glen,
Wha loes the modest truth sae weel,
Wha's aye sae kind, an' aye sae leal,
An' pure as blooming asphodel
Amang sae mony men.
O, weel betha' the bonny thing
That wons in yonder glen!

'Tis sweet to hear the music float
 Along the gloaming lea;
 'Tis sweet to hear the blackbird's note
 Come pealing frae the tree;
 To see the lambkin's lightsome race—
 The speckled kid in wanton chase—
 The young deer cower in lonely place,
 Deep in her flowing den;
 But sweeter far the bonny face
 That smiles in yonder glen!

O, had it no' been for the blush
 O' maiden's virgin flame,
 Dear beauty never had been known,
 An' never had a name;
 But aye sin' that dear thing o' blaine
 Was modell'd by an angel's frame,
 The power o' beauty reigns supreme
 O'er a' the sons o' men;
 But deadliest far the sacred flame
 Burns in a lonely glen!

There's beauty in the violet's vest—
 There's hinnie in the haw—
 There's dew within the rose's breast,
 The sweetest o' them a'.
 The sun will rise and set again,
 An' lace wi' burning goud the main—
 The rainbow bend outow't the plain,
 Sae lovely to the ken;
 But lovelier far the bonny thing
 That wons in yonder glen!

TICKLER.

Clearly and croosely crawled, my cock.

NORTH.

Sweetly and silverly sung, my nightingale.

SHEPHERD.

It's a gran' thing, sirs, to be the cock o' the company, occasionally; at other times, pensie as a pullet.

TICKLER.

Any thing but a hen.

SHEPHERD.

At leeterary soopers, I like to see a blue-stocking playin' the how-towddie.

NORTH.

How?

SHEPHERD.

Chucklin' intil hersell, when a spruce young cockie is lettin' his wing drap close aside hers, and half-receivin' half-declinin' his advances, like ony ither Christian lassie wha may na hae the gift o' writin' verses ayont a Valentine. Fae better sic undertoned and underhaund natural dealins', maist innocent a', than cacklin' about Coleridge, or blooterin about Byron, or cheepin, as if she had the pip, o' Barry Cornwall.

NORTH.

Some maidens I know, James, bright as the muses, whose souls, as well as frames, are made of the finest clay, who before the eyes of the uninitiated pass for common-place characters, because, unpresumptuous in their genius, and retiring in their sensibility, oft "the house affairs do call them thence;" because, to their lips none so familiar as household words; and because to their hearts dearer are the tender humanities of life, than bright to their imaginations the poetic visions, that yet "swarm on every bough," when they walk in their beautiful happiness by Windermere or Loch Lomond.

TICKLER.

I, too, like occasionally to play the first fiddle.

SHEPHERD.

An' you're entitled to do sae; for you've a fine finger, and a bauld bow-haun'.

NORTH.

I love best of all to sit sympathetically mute among my friends, and by a benign countenance to encourage the artless fluency of young lips, overflowing with the music of untamed delight in life, "a stranger yet to pain."

SHEPHERD.

A benign countenance!

NORTH.

Few words have been more perverted from their true meaning, by being narrowed, than the words one so frequently hears, now-a-days, from not unvulgar lips—"Good Society"—"The Best Society."

TICKLER.

"The highest circles."

NORTH.

In my opinion, James, a man may commit a worse mistake, in aspiring to association with persons above his own rank, than in descending somewhat, perhaps, below it, in the intercourse of private and domestic life.

SHEPHERD.

Many suns o' baith sexes do. There may be pride in ilka case; but the pride o' the first maun aften gnaw its thoomb. The pride o' the second aften wats its thoomb to join't to that o' a bither, though born in laigh degree, probably as gude or a better man than himsell; and whan that's foun' out, pride dees, and in its place there grows up a richttu' affection.

NORTH.

All men of sense know their natural position in society—whether it has been allotted to them by birth, by wealth, by profession, by virtue, by talent, by learning, or by genius.

SHEPHERD.

Happy he—and fortunate—to whom have been given all these gifts!

NORTH.

Yet some, my dear James, to whom they all have been given, have abused them—aye, even genius and virtue—and their friends have been speechless of them ever after their funerals.

TICKLER.

Some use the terms "good society," as if they thought all society but that which they have in their eye, bad, and they superciliously shun all other, as not only infra dig, but in itself absolutely low, and such as they could not even casually enter without loss of honour—without degradation.

NORTH.

Yet, when one asks himself, Tim, "who are they?" it is not, at least, of their pedigree they have to be proud, for, perhaps,

"Their ignoble blood

Has crept through scoundrels ever since the flood;"— but by means of some shewy accomplishment, or some acquired elegance, perhaps of demeanour, or some suave subservience that sits so naturally upon them, that they—all unlike though it be—mistake it for the easy manner of the higher class to which they have been permitted to become an appendage—they believe, at last, that they belong to the privileged orders, and look down on people who would not have shaken hands with their father, had he given them half the gold his itching palm had purloined.

TICKLER.

Such aspirants generally sink as they had soared; and after their dangle days are done, you may chance to meet them shabby-gentrel, in streets not only unfashionable, but unfrequented, somewhat old-looking, and ready to return your unexpected nod with an obsequious bow.

SHEPHERD.

Pair chiefs!

NORTH.

We all fall—if we be wise—of our own accord—and according to the operation of laws plain and unperplexing—into our proper place in the intercommunion of life. Thence we can look pleasantly, and cheerfully, and socially, around, above, and below us—unimpatient of peer, and unashamed of peasant—but most at home at firesides most like our own—a modest mansion—half-way, perchance, between hall and hut—that Golden Mean which all sages have prayed for, and which religion herself has called blest!

SHEPHERD.

A' doors alike are open to you, sir, and every heart loup wi' welcomin' at the clank o' your crutch on the marble—the stane—the slate—the wooden, or the earthen stair.

NORTH.

I am no flatterer of the great, James; but——

SHEPHERD.

The Freen' o' the sma'.

NORTH.

Small? Who is—or need sing small, who bears within his bosom an honest heart?

SHEPHERD.

But why look sae fearsome in uttering sic a sentiment?

NORTH.

Because I thought of “the proud man's contumely,” the oppressor's——

SHEPHERD.

There's less oppression in this land than in any ither that ever basked in sunshine, or was swept by storm; sae lay by the crutch, sir, and let that face subside, for “Blackness comes across it like a squall

Darkening the sea;”

aye, aye, thank ye, sir, thank ye, sir, 'tis again like the sky in the mornin' light.

TICKLER.

Not quite so blue, I hope.

SHEPHERD.

Nae sarcasm, Tickler; better blue nor yellow.—May I ask hae ye gotten the jaundice?

TICKLER.

Merely the reflection of that bright yellow vest of yours, James, which, I fear, won't stand the washing.

SHEPHERD.

It'll scoot.

NORTH.

Yet, delightful indeed, James, as you know, are the manners of high birth. There is a mighty power in manners, James, connected with the imagination.

SHEPHERD.

What's your wull?

NORTH.

Why, in societies highly cultivated, some of the lightest and most exquisite motions of imagination exercise acknowledged authority over the framework of life.

SHEPHERD.

Eh, sir?

NORTH.

As it might have been said at Paris, for example, James, in its height of civilisation, that among its highest circles, even the delicate play of Fancy, in lightest conversation, cultivated as it was as an accomplishment, and worn as the titular ornament of those among whom life was polished to its most sparkling lustre, even that grace of courtly wit, and playing fancy, had force in binding together the minds of men, and in maintaining at the summit of life, the peace and union of society. How strongly the quick clear sense of the slight shades of manners marked out to them those who belonged, and those who did not belong, to their order! In that delicate perception of manners, they held a criterion of rank by which they bound together as strongly their own society, as they separated it from all others. And thus the punctilios of manners, which appear so insignificant to ordinary observers, are, as they more finely discriminate the relations of men, of absolute power in the essential regulation and subordination of ranks.

SHEPHERD.

Fine philosophy, I daursay, but rather owre fine for the fingers o' my apprehension, clumsy at the uptak o' silk threads, but strang when clasped roun' a rape or a cable.

NORTH.

Now, James, passing from France under the old régime, when it was acknowledged all over Europe that the French were the politest people in the world, and their nobility the exemplars, in manners, of all nobilities, allow me to say that in all countries, where there is a hereditary peerage, that theirs is a life under the finest influences; and that in the delicate faculties of the mind, in its subtlest workings, in its gentlest pleasures, in even its morbid sensibilities, we are to look for the principles which govern with power their social condition. Why, the literature of this country is a bulwark of its political peace; not by the wisdom of knowledge thus imparted, but by the character it has impressed on the life of great classes of its inhabitants, drawing the pleasures of their ordinary life into the sphere of intellect.

SHEPHERD.

But arena you rinnin' awa' frae the soobjeck?

NORTH.

No, James—if you will allow me to proceed.

SHEPHERD.

Ou aye, I alloo you—proceed.

NORTH.

By a control, then, of whatever kind, exercised upon the most finely sensitive faculties of the mind, the higher classes of civilized nations are bound together in the union of society. But the cultivation of this sensibility is a work that is continually going on among themselves, and is carried to greater perfection, as they are less disturbed by intermixture of those who are strangers to their own refinement. It goes on from one age to another; it is transmitted in families; it is an exclusive and hereditary privilege and distinction of the privileged orders of the community.

SHEPHERD.

I see your drift now.

NORTH.

Now, this cultivated sensibility—of whatever importance, of which I now say nothing—which characterises, governs, and guards the highest classes of a long-civilized society, which war broke up and confounded in France by a political revolution, has been disturbed in our country by the changes which the excess of commercial prosperity has above all things brought on in the social relations of the people.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Tickler, what for do you no join in?

TICKLER.

Thank heaven for that cough. Observe, James, how commerce, which is continually raising up multitudes of men high above the condition of their birth, has thrown up such numbers into a high condition of political importance, so that they have begun to fill what were once the exclusively privileged orders with sometimes—rude enough and raw recruits. The consequence is, and will farther be, that the distinction of ancient birth, which even fifty years ago was still kept very pure, is very fast blotting out from the nation.

SHEPHERD.

Weel continued and carried on, Mr Tickler, in the same spirit wi' North's original and originating remarks. But nae great matter if the distinctions should be mingled together, though no just blotted oot—I cu'd na thole that—we maun hae “our Lords and Dukes and mighty Earls.”

NORTH.

I do not mean to justify, James, the severity with which this distinction is in some countries maintained; but I have no idea that such a distinction, of such ancient importance, can be rapidly done away with impunity.

TICKLER.

Assuredly, sir, it cannot. The sensibilities and principles, whatever they are, which are become hereditary with birth, are abolished with the distinction. However low their own worth may be—but they are not low—they are of vast political importance by the distinctive character they give, by the ostensible and fastidious separation with which they hedge in the highest political order in the state—

NORTH.

And seldom indeed, Mr Tickler, are they without their own high worth. In none of the great states of modern Europe have they been so. In this country, the principles of opinion, and the characteristic feelings which were avowed, cherished, and upheld by the Aristocracy and Noblesse, were of great dignity and importance.

SILPHERD.

Only look at their pictures on the galleries o' auld castles! What beauties and brave faces! What loveliness and majesty! Though noo and then, to be sure, a dowdy or a droich.

NORTH.

This character can no longer maintain itself, James, when any cause, as commerce, throws into the class of the gentry, numbers who were not born to their rank. For the character is maintained by exclusion; in part by education within their own houses, where it may be said to be of hereditary transmission, in part by the power of opinion acting from one to another throughout their order. With the new members, it is evident, that as far as they compose the class, one cause cannot be in force; but more than this, they defeat by their admission the force of opinion among the others; for opinion holds its force solely by its sameness, and as soon as that is violated, its force is gone.

SILPHERD.

Is the change, then, sir, on the whole, think ye, for good or evil?

NORTH.

I cannot say, James. But this I will say, that now aristocracy of rank must be supported by aristocracy of talent and virtue, or it, in another century at latest, will fall.

SILPHERD.

And isn't no?

NORTH.

It is. And therefore, for that, as for a hundred other reasons, I abhor the radicals—and go forth fearlessly to battle against them with—

SILPHERD.

The crutch.

NORTH.

The changes which the commercial system is working, may ultimately be for good; at any rate, they will proceed while that system endures. But the designs of low-minded, low-hearted, base, and brutal Jacobins must be resisted, not by law—for it must not be stretched to reach them—but by literature; not by the gibbet—for that is barbarous—but by the—Press.

SILPHERD.

Noble sentiments, sir. Let the devils ply their hollow engines, but let the angels overwhelm them with solid hills. But as ye say, sir, let there be no a hole in a' the claes o' the nobility themselves—nae stain on their skutches—and then they'll endure to the end o' time.

NORTH.

I believe, indeed I know, that unfortunately among the higher ranks of society, there prevails a great ignorance of the character of the lower ranks—their enjoyments, their pursuits, their manners, their morals, and their minds. They think of them too often almost as an inferior race. From their birth many of them have been trained and taught to do so; and in the condescension of the most enlightened, there is a mixture of pride repulsive to its object, and not to be accepted without some sacrifice of independence.

SHEPHERD.

I aye thoct ye had been freendly to the distinction of ranks.

NORTH.

So I am, James—to a harmonious blending of distinct ranks——

SHEPHERD.

Frae the king till the beggar.

NORTH.

Just so—from the king to the beggar——

SHEPHERD.

I wud rather be the King o' the Beggars, wi' a croon o' strae and coort-duds, than some ither kings I cou'd mention——

TICKLER.

No politics, James.

NORTH.

What strength would be in that State where each order knew the peculiar and appropriate virtues of all the rest—knew, loved, respected, and honoured them; and what a spirit of preservation!

TICKLER.

The worst enemy of his country and of his kind, is he who seeks to set one order against the other, by false aspersions on their prevalent character—the poor against the rich, the rich against the poor,—so with the high the humble born——

SHEPHERD.

And aboon a', the flocks again their shepherds—the shepherds o' their sowles. I never was wrang yet, in settin' doon the fallow for a knave wha jeeringly pronounced the word “parson.”

NORTH.

'Tis become a slang-word with many who pretend to be the friends of the people, and anxious, above all things, to promote their education. What would mighty England be without her Church?

TICKLER.

Her mind had not been a “thing so majestical,” but for her glorious army of martyrs and apostles—in long array, the succession of her philosophic divines.

SHEPHERD.

Oh! dear me! what wad I no gie the noo for a whatt?

(Enter Mr AMBROSE with a Board of Oysters—the Council of Fire Hundred—and TAPPATOURN, with Ale and Porter, bottled and draught.)

TICKLER.

Clear decks.

NORTH.

The Circular!

(The Whatt is deposited, with all its Paraphernalia, on the Circular.)

SHEPHERD.

Awmrose, nia man, I'm thrusty—yill.

TICKLER.

Ditto—Ambrose.

NORTH.

Mr Ambrose—ditto.

SHEPHERD (after a long draught.)

That is yill.

TICKLER (after a longer.)

Consummate!

NORTH (at last.)

Sugarb!

Omnes.

Giles, or Berwick?

AMBROSE.

Neither, gentlemen. 'Tis a sample sent me, in free gift, by Messrs Maitland and Davison——

TICKLER.

Of St Anne's Brewery, Croftangry?

AMBROSE.

Yes, South side.

SHEPHERD.

Croftangry? Is na that a name in the Chronicles o' the Canongate? Our freen's brewery's quite classical.

NORTH.

Nothing in this world can beat Berwick.

TICKLER.

Nor bang Giles——

SHEPHERD.

I cud hae ta'en my Bible-oath it was Berwick.

TICKLER.

And I could have sworn upon that old almanack, history, that it was Giles.

NORTH.

I had my suspicions. There is in Berwick a tife, a racy, and a reamy richness, unknown to any other malt that ever felt the power of barn, whose influence, gradual as the genial growth of spring, lups the soul in Elysium, till the coruscations of fancy play far and wide over a Noctes, like the Aurora Borealis—while in Giles there is a pure spirit of unadulterated strength, that, as it raises the soul to the height of heroic emotion, breathing deliberate colour, so beneath its power has many a cit and soldier

“Bow'd his anointed head as low as death.”

Maitland and Davison—again—has inspired my being with a new feeling, for which no language I am acquainted with can supply an adequate name. That feeling impels me to say these simple words on behalf of the Spirit of Ale in general—speaking through me its organ—He loquutus—“It not suffered by Fate to fix my abode in barrels of Berwick or Giles, where I have long reigned alternate years, in all my glory, scarcely should I feel myself privileged to blame my stars, were I ordered for a while to sojourn in one of Maitland—and Davison!”

SHEPHERD.

What poot it has gien the pallet ower the inmost flavour o' the eisters!

TICKLER.

Shrimps.

SHEPHERD.

Nae such shrimps, sir; but they melt like snaw-flakes,

“A moment white, then gone for ever!”

NORTH.

Already are they decimated.

SHEPHERD.

Weeligh decimated, indeed—for out o' the Coonsel o' Five Hundred, there's no fowrscore noo on the brodd.

TICKLER.

“With speedy gleams the darkness swallowed.”

NORTH.

From my labours I thus fall back in dignified repose.

SHEPHERD.

I never was sae sune stawed wi' eisters in a' my life.

TICKLER.

What! Have you pulled up already, James?

SHEPHERD.

That's the manners aye. She's a sair temptation, wi' that bonny plump bosom o' hers; but I'm ower muckle o' a gentleman to tak advantage o' her unprotected singleness, sae we'll let her be.

NORTH.

Affecting subject for an elegy—The last Oyster!

SHEPHERD.

I canna thole to look at it. Tickler, pu' the bell.

(Enter AMBROSE and KING PEPIN to remove the Board.)

SHEPHERD (in continuation.)

Pippy—she's yours.

(KING PEPIN, with a bunch of empty Pots in each hand—stoops his Mouth to the Board, and sucks the lonely Damsel into his vortex.)

TICKLER.

Let us resume our philosophical conversation.

SHEPHERD.

Wi' a' my heart. My stamach's no fu'er the noo o' eisters than my head is o' Meas. Opium! what's opium to yill? Opium dazes—yill dazzles—opium carries a man until the clude—yill raises him to the sky.

TICKLER.

We were speaking, sir, of education.

NORTH.

Education! what manner of man is he whom we wish to have produced? Who in civil and private life will be "the happy warrior?" Must he not be high-mindedly courageous—generous in his intercourse with all his fellow-creatures—full of deep and tender affections, which are the support and happiness of those nearest and dearest to him—capable of sympathy with all joy and all suffering—with an imagination, not only the source of enjoyment to himself, but aiding to make all the aspects of things, serious, solemn, religious, to his spirit,—

SHEPHERD.

Nae grandeur o' national character, sir, you say weel, without imagination. But, noo-a-days, a' her records are accounted auld wives' tales, and the speerit o' Poetry is driven out o' edication, the edication sought to be imposed on the people, as if it were the plague. The verra claes o' a callant noo that has been found porin' ower an auld ballad, maun be funigated afore he is suffered to re-enter the school,—he maun perform quaranteen, sir, like a ship frae Constantinople or Smyrna, afore the passengers are alloo'd to land on our untainted shores. Is this an impreynment, think ye, sirs, on the wisdom o' our forefathers? If this plan be persisted in, after twa three generations, what will be the Spirit o' the Age? A barren spirit, and a' aneath it bare as broon bent in summer-drought, without ony drappin o' the sweet heaven-dews. Milton weel says, that in the sowle are many lesser faculties—Reason the chief—but what sort o' a chief will Reason be without his tail? Without his clan, noo a' sickly or extinck, ance poorfu' alike in peace and in war, to preserve or destroy, to build up and to pu' down, beautifyin' wi' perpetual renovation and decay the haill face o' the earth. O, sirs! in aither century or less, 'twill be a maist monstrous warld, fit only for your Utilitawrians—and in less nor a second century, no fit even for them.

NORTH.

Intellectual-all-in-alls, who will perish of hunger and thirst, destitute of the bread of life, and of its living waters.

SHEPHERD.

I really believe, sirs, that were I lang to habituate mysell to this Glasgow rum, it wou'd drive out the Glenlivet—accept for caulkers. Only pree this het tummler o' toddy.

NORTH (sipping.)

A Christmas box, James, from my valued friend, the Modern Pythagorean. Quite a nosegay.

SHEPHERD.

Ma smell's gane—and sae maun yours, wi' a' that snuffin', man; Prince's Mixtar, Prince's Mixtar, unce after unce, I wunner ye diuna snivel; but what for do ye aye keep thoomb thoombin' at it in the shell—it's an ugly custom. What's this I was gaun to say? Hae ye read the Modern Pythagorean's wark on Sleep?

NORTH.

Several times entirely—and often by snatches. It is admirable.

TICKLER.

Come, I must keep you, Kit, to the subject in hand. That treatise deserves a separate article from your own pen.

NORTH.

And—sooner or later—it shall have it. Keep, then, to the subject in hand. What was it?

TICKLER.

A thousand powers, each bringing its own blessing, spring up by feeling, and in feeling have their own justification—which such an education never can give, but which it will deaden or destroy.

SHEPHERD.

Eh?

TICKLER.

They are justified, James, by the idea which they themselves bring of themselves, in the mind which produces and harbours them; they bear witness for themselves; the man has felt them good—sua bona novit—and he clings to them unto the death. Who taught you patriotism?

SHEPHERD.

Myself.

TICKLER.

Not the Schoolmaster, who is now abroad—at Botany-Bay, perhaps, for forgery—but the Schoolmaster at home—your own heart, James—teaching itself the task it conned on the side of the sunny brae, or the ingle of your father's hut—

SHEPHERD.

What ken you about my education, sir? Yet the lang-legged chiel's no far wiang attar a'.

TICKLER.

What kind of a nation, my dear shepherd, does your heart rejoice in?

SHEPHERD.

In the British—especially the Scotch.

TICKLER.

Are they better now, in any one sense whatever, than of old?

SHEPHERD.

In a few things, better—in a hantle, waur.

TICKLER.

What do we want in a nation? Not a quantity of reasonable—contented—steady—sober—industrious inhabitants—mere Chineses—

SHEPHERD.

Chineses?

TICKLER.

And nothing more—but you want men, who, if they are invaded, will spring up as one man—loving their ancestors, who cannot do any thing for them—

SHEPHERD.

That's truth—but wha hae dune for them incalculable and inappreciable things—

TICKLER.

And doing every thing for their posterity, who have done and can do nothing for them—

SHEPHERD.

True again.

TICKLER.

—Men among whom crime is restrained, not by a vigilant police, but by an awful sense of right and wrong.

SHEPHERD.

Existing naewhere but in minds deeply imbued wi' religion.

TICKLER.

Who love their soll, though unable to analyze it—

SHEPHERD.

Gude!

TICKLER.

To whom poverty and its scanty hard-wrung pittance are the gift of God—who are sustained and animated in this life by the operation on their minds of their belief in another—a people in whose vigorous spirit joy is strong under all sorts of external pressure and difficulty——

SHEPHERD.

That's no easy—neither is't impossible.

TICKLER.

I speak, James, of a country naturally poor—such as Scotland——

SHEPHERD.

Scotland's no pair—she's rich, if no in the sile o' the yerth, in the sile o' the sowle——

TICKLER.

Were I to speak of England——

SHEPHERD.

Shut his mouth, Mr North, on England, for he's England-mad——

TICKLER.

Well, then, James, I sink England, and say, that Honesty depends also upon Feeling, as a principle of action opposed to mere Intellect—and that this is not known to many of our popular, and preaching and itinerant Educationists. True, that "Honesty is the best Policy;" but Policy without Honesty does not find that out. Honesty, both pecuniary and immaterial, to wit, that will not wrong another in any way, by word, or deed, or thought, as a national trait, rests upon kindly, generous feeling. Courage, frank and fearless, and kind-heartedness, by the very terms, rest on the same foundation.

SHEPHERD.

And what then?

NORTH.

What then, James? Why, that all this present fume and fuss about intellectual education will never produce the desired result, but, in all probability, impede the growth of true national virtue.

SHEPHERD.

You've aften heard me say that, sir.

NORTH.

So much the likelier is it to be true, James. Intellect walks in certain evidences of things—treating objects of positive knowledge—fixed relations—mathematical axioms—and truths drawn from itself—facts given by the senses.

SHEPHERD.

A' verra true and verra important. Say awa', sir.

NORTH.

The character of Intellect is, that it is satisfied when it can refer what is now presented to it, to what it already knows; then, and then only, it seems to understand. But when Feeling springs up upon occasion, it springs up for the occasion, new, original, peculiar, not to be referred. The man does not say to himself, "I recollect that I felt so on such an occasion, acted upon it, and found it to answer;" but the feeling, even if he has so felt and done, comes up as if he had never felt it before—sees only the actual circumstances, the case, the person, the moment of opportunity, and imperatively wills the action.

SHEPHERD.

That's the sort o' state o' the sowle I like—say awa', sir.

NORTH.

It is the unretrospection for authority, or precedent, as the unprosppection of consequences, that makes the purity and essential character of feeling. We may reason and chastise our hearts, afterwards and before, in time of reflection and meditation; but not then when the moment of feeling has arisen, and we are to act by the strength which we know very well is to be had from it.

SHEPHERD.

'Profound, yet clear like a pool i' the Yarrow.

NORTH.

Now, James, the mind that relies habitually on intellect, and does not rely on feeling, will bring the estimate of consequences to the time when it should only feel.

SHEPHERD.

A fatal error in chronology indeed.

NORTH.

Such a mind, James, is disposed to distrust, nay, to discredit and resist, every thing that offers itself per se, and is irreducible to the experienced past. It resists, therefore, miracles, and sneers at Christianity.

SHEPHERD.

That's sad.

NORTH.

Then see how stone-blind it is to much in which you and I rejoice. The common understanding forms a low estimate of the great facts of Imagination and Sensibility. They are to it unintelligible—and it will not even believe that they ever have been felt, except by imbecile enthusiasts.

SHEPHERD.

They laugh at the Queen's Wake—

NORTH.

Aye, at the Paradise Lost. The deeper, the bolder, the more peculiar the feeling, of course the more it puzzles, estranges, repels such an understanding. I do not well know myself, James, what feelings are the most deep, bold, and peculiar; but near to the most must be, I think, the purest and highest moral, the purest and highest religious feelings. For compare with them Imagination, and surely they are deeper far.

SHEPHERD.

Far, far, far'

NORTH.

There is reason enough, then, James, in Nature, why Understanding, cultivated without a corresponding culture of feeling, should be adverse to it, for their causative conditions are opposite. Either cultivated alone becomes adverse to the other. Cultivated together—which is not the mode of popular education now—they are friendly, mutually supporting, helping, guiding, and making joint strength.

SHEPHERD.

Excellent, sir. But said ye never a' this to me afore?

NORTH.

Never at a Noctes, that I recollect. If feeling do exist, how must it "languish, grow dim, and die," under the distrust, or contempt, or ignorance of the understanding that ought to cherish it!

SHEPHERD.

There's Tickler sleepin'.

NORTH.

James—such minds undertake, we shall suppose, the express examination of great moral and religious tenets, with a view to ascertain their credibility; and because they have been trained to modes of reasoning, and to rules of evidence, with which these have little or nothing to do, and to which they are not amenable, why what follows? Their utter rejection.

SHEPHERD.

Deism—niblins atheism.

NORTH.

A mind less trained, might have continued to believe from habit, from authority, which is far better, surely, than not to believe at all, and the inevitable lot of many good and not unenlightened persons; but the pride of intellect in such mind disdains to submit to any thing but conviction, which it is disqualified for obtaining.

SHEPHERD.

I hae seldom heard you mair sage,—(Aside.) Yet I'm sleepy.

VOL. XXIX. NO. CLXXVIII.

2 N

NORTH.

Now, James, the same express scepticism or disbelief, which is thus engendered in the highly taught, is in the lower; and more surely, and worse. For high intellect may see so much as to suspect itself; but intellect, lowly taught, (and how many such are there now?) never does. Moreover, my man, it is infinitely helpless; for it falls upon the difficulties obvious and gross to sight.—boggles at them,—and recoils into disbelief. Then, James, only think on the conceit of knowledge in half-taught people! Is it not often desperate and invincible?

SHEPHERD.

I could knock them down.

NORTH.

An imperfect, ill-founded moral and religious belief, is often still beneficial to the conduct and feelings; but a low, gross, self-conceited unbelief, is more hardening and debasing than one that is more subtle.

SHEPHERD.

Look at Tickler sleepin'; as for me, I'm only beginnin' to yawn.

NORTH.

James, hear me——

SHEPHERD.

I'm doin' ma best.

NORTH.

The ground-error, but which it needs courage to combat, is the proposition, that as Truth must be beneficial, so error and illusion must be injurious. Granted,—that perfect truth is the best thing in the world; but while truth and error are excessively mixed, it is impossible to say, a priori, that the removal of a particular illusion, in a given case, shall be beneficial. That is, it is not true to say absolutely, that there is not a single illusion in one mind, of which the extirpation must not, in all possible circumstances, be better than the continuance. Perhaps the peace, perhaps the virtue, of the mind, is stayed upon it. We must not knowingly teach error, that is clear; but it is not equally clear that we are bound to destroy every error, much less to communicate to every body every truth. There are truths without number that are no concern of theirs. Thus a belief in ghosts——

SHEPHERD (starting from sleep.)

Ghosts! Mercy on us! What was you sayin' o' ghosts?

NORTH (frowning.)

Bad manners—James—bad manners—to fall asleep during——

SHEPHERD.

Sermon or lecture, either in Kirk or Snuggery—but you see I devoured rather a heavy dinner the day, at Watson's; and then there's something sae sedative in the silver tones o' your vice, sir, that by degrees it hails a listener into a dreamy dawning, sic as fa's on a body stretched a' his length on a burn-brae, no far frae a waterfa', till his een see nae mair the but flittin' and doukin white-breasted water-pyets, and his sowle sinks awa, wi' the wimplin murmur in its ears, into Fairy-Land.

NORTH.

I pardon you, my dear shepherd, for your most poetical apology.

SHEPHERD.

“And I promise to do a' I can to keep myself frae fa'in' into the “pleasant land o' drowzyhead.” Spoot awa.

NORTH.

We may suppose, James, that a constant progress is making towards truth, and this is for happiness. But any one who looks at the world, and its history, may satisfy himself that, for some reason or another, this truth is not intended to come all at once.

SHEPHERD (stretching himself.)

Oh! dear!

NORTH.

Either in the human understanding, or the state of the human will, there is some ground wherefore this should not be. It is not possible, then, nor meant to push mankind forward at once into the possession of this inheritance. There are degrees and stages, a progress. Seeing this, a wise man is patient, temperate. He desires to do every thing for his kind; but according to the possibilities and the plans of nature. Seeing this, he does not fall into the error, into which men are misled by an uncalculating impatience, to bring on at once the reign of truth. Thinking that end possible which is impossible, too many now-a-days think means will be effectual which are most ineffectual; and they imagine that small portions of truth communicated, which are in their power to communicate, are the reign of truth begun on earth. The truth which is in their power, is that which regards definite relations, as mathematics, and the science of matter. Their hasty imagination seizes on parcels of this truth, and upon plans for communicating them, and foresees, to judge from their manner of speaking, consequences of a magnitude and excellence, conceivable only if all truth had dominion of the human heart. Let us aid the progress, if possible, as ways open to us; but not imagine that the turn of our hand will transform the universe.

SHEPHERD (brightening up.)

I'm no the least sleepy noo, for that fa' owre the edge o' a precipice has waukened up my seven senses. But this is shameful behaviour in Tickler. (Hollows in Tickler's ear.) Fire! Fire! Fire!

TICKLER (staring.)

Who are you?

SHEPHERD.

The Archbishop of Canterbury.

TICKLER.

What—Howley? How are you, my old buck? And how is Blomfield?

SHEPHERD.

We are both well, sir, but a good deal troubled about these tithes. That auld deevil, Lord King—

TICKLER (recomposing the Shepherd.)

Why that is language barely decorous in your grace—but ha! North, my old boy, what have you and James been prating about during my visit to the laud of Nod? Come—a caulker—and I'm your man.

SHEPHERD.

I have been instructing Mr North in some of my philosophical views on the soobjeck of national education.

TICKLER.

National education! James, there are two periods of human society—the first, of nature ruling in man, and the second of man ruling nature.

SHEPHERD.

Bright as sunrise! sleep catches nae haud on him—but he flings it aff like a garment.

TICKLER.

During the first period, man is wisely governed by errors. During the second, he tends wisely to govern himself by truth. The transition from one period to the other is a time of crisis, and may be of convulsions. Much responsibility rests, North, on those who lead the change; for, though the laws of nature will work out the change, individuals may hasten it.

NORTH.

I remember saying something like that to you, years ago, Tickler; and an acute writer, in some papers in the Examiner, entitled the Spirit of the Age, expatiates well on this topic, though I know no reason why he should have said that I live any more than himself, in the strife of party politics. The Sanctum in Buchanan Lodge—and the Snuggery here—are philosophical retirements not unvisited by the Muses, who are lovers of contemplation and peace.

TICKLER.

We should judge aright the period which is gone by, and that period which is coming on—so rightly may we act during the present. In judging the past, we are not to condemn errors simply because they were errors. They were—many of them—the necessary guidance of man. Neither ought we to judge the total effect of the error by the effect of the excess of the error.

SHEPHERD.

I wiss you wad repeat that apogthegm.

TICKLER.

For example, James, we are not to judge the total effect of monastic orders by the worst pictures of sloth and vice which monasteries have afforded—not the total effect of Aristotle's Dialectics, if erroneous, or erroneously used, by the most frivolous and vain of the scholastic subtleties—not the total effect of the Roman Catholic religion at a Spanish or English Auto-da-fé.

SHEPHERD.

You're a true liberal, Mr Tickler. Sae are you, Mr North; and sae am I; and sae are the Noctes. Nae snorin' noo.

TICKLER.

To judge thus, gentlemen, is to introduce into our minds an asperity of feeling which will infallibly disturb our judgment, will prevent our understanding the world as it is, and our proceeding with the calmness and temper necessary for doing well what we have got to do. Our business is not to hunt error out of the world, but to invite and induce truth.

SHEPHERD.

A mild and majestic sentiment, sir. I can scarcely believe my een an' my lugs when they inform me that the speaker is Southside—Tickler the——

NORTH.

Hush, James. Hear the Sage.

TICKLER.

It is a work not of enmity but of love.

SHEPHERD.

Beautiful!

TICKLER.

We see the line of human progress, Kit; and the opposite character of the two extremities; but know not whereabouts we stand in it. We see errors gone and going; we see truths come and coming;—but we are not to conclude that every error which is left has outstaid its time, and is now no longer any thing but pernicious—nor that every truth that will ever be wanted is now wanted—and, least of all, that any little morsel of truth which we happen to hold, is of such wondrous efficacy that a prodigious effort is to be made to impart it.

SHEPHERD.

You've overheard Mr North in your sleep, Mr Tickler, sae congenial are your thoughts wi' his ain—twun-bruthers.

TICKLER.

Eh, North?

NORTH.

Oh! for a full and perfect union in man of Will and Intellect! In the first period to which you alluded, Will is provided, Tickler; in it you see indeed all the energetic Wills;—the Homeric Greeks, the Spartans, the earlier Romans, the Arabs, the Germans, the Vykingr, the American Indians—you see it everywhere, from north to south; then all the youth of the world was on fire. But, in the second period, man has naturally to provide Will, for in it he comes to be deficient; and what there is, is comparatively cold. In the first period Will, and in the second Intellect, is over-preponderate.

SHEPHERD.

In the third, let us houp that the twa will be sae nicely balanced, that a grain o' sense or a drap o' feelin' will either way turn the beam.

NORTH.

James, my dear boy, you are well qualified, both by nature and education to judge on this question.

SHEPHERD.

What question, sir?

NORTH.

In early society mark how the Will is made strong by the passionate and hard-contending condition of ordinary physical life. Also then, James, the different ranks of society being by the simplicity of life more nearly united, common feelings pervade all. A deep, broad sympathy imbues sentiments and opinions. Superstitious, tenets, faiths of all sorts, hold unquestioned dominion. Men believe by sympathy; for what none has disputed, that is faith. What half dispute, perhaps none cordially believe.

SHEPHERD.

I ken that, by experience o' what is noo gaun on amang the shepherds o' the Forest, wi' their debating clubs, and what not—few noo believe even in the Brownie o' Bodsbeck.

NORTH.

Now, my dear friends, pardon the anxiety of an old man for the children growing up round his feet.

SHEPHERD.

The rising generation, about to shoot up into saints or sinners!

TICKLER.

Wheeshit, James!

SHEPHERD.

Wheeshit yourself!

NORTH.

Education must now form the two—Will and Intellect—one with and by the other—or Education is lame, with one hand only, and, I fear, that the left.

SHEPHERD.

Whulk!

TICKLER.

Wheeshit!

NORTH.

Intellect does every thing, or nearly, for Will, and Will every thing for Intellect. But which is the ultimate object? Will, certainly. The Will is the Man.

SHEPHERD.

Hear it—a' ye nations—the Will is the Man!

NORTH.

Our idea of education is too frequently one of schools and colleges, drawn thence, and forced upon them; but how small a part!

SHEPHERD.

Sma' part indeed

NORTH.

The roots of the Will are in the body—and the roots of Intellect in the Will.

SHEPHERD.

In the body!

NORTH.

Yes, James, in the body. See how the state of the affections—which are Will—nourish even imagination, and how imagination acts into the purely intellectual faculties—and what vivacity mere health and joy will give to the memory, who, you know, in the olden time was called the mother of the Muses.

SHEPHERD.

Sae, indeed, she was—Mymoshumy.

NORTH.

What, I ask you, James, can a listless child learn, an unwilling child understand?

SHEPHERD.

Naething.

NORTH.

Will not a boy, whose heart is full of poetry, learn Greek in Homer, by the force of poetry, though he has a bad talent for languages?

SHEPHERD.

Nae doot—nae doot. I sune learnt Verse in Ossian.

NORTH.

Will not thought and feeling make him a good speaker and writer at last, though he could never understand his grammar?

Confoon' grammu'!

SHEPHERD.

NORTH

The first thing is that the understanding grow in the Will, and the Will up through the heart of the understanding, and an Intellect of ten or twelve years old, may, so far, have been powerfully educated without a single lesson.

SHEPHERD.

Mine was yedicated sae—whether poorly or no, it's no for me to be tellin'.

(Timepiece strikes Twelve—and enter AMBROSE, bending under his load, with his Tail and Supper.)

NORTH

Timothy—James—run to the support of mine host—or he faints and falls.

(The ARCADIAN and SOUTHSIDE reach AMBROSE just in time to prevent his sinking to the floor.)

AMBROSE

Thank ye, gentlemen, this burden is beyond my strength.

NORTH

What is it?

AMBROSE

The GLASGOW GANDER, sir.

NORTH

The great prize Glasgow gander!—Rash man! even for one moment to have dreamt of bearing him in single-handed!

SHEPHERD

Mair strength! mair strength! Luppy, Kizz Pips, Sir Daway!

NORTH

Coming, sir.

SOUTH

Let me give a lift.

(By the anti-laborism of the Kizz Pips, and the Hump, &c., the great Glasgow Gander is placed upon the table, with some loss of grace, on the table.)

TICKLER

How it groans!

HITCHER

What! the gander!

TICKLER

No, the quadruped under him—the table.

SHEPHERD

Props, Ambrose—props!

AMBROSE

The timber—no all sound, gentlemen, and now that they have stood the first shock of the pressure—

SHEPHERD

Is'e uphaud them for a croon.

TICKLER

It is not the legs of the table I tremble for, but the joints of the floor.

SHEPHERD

Wha's aneath?

AMBROSE

The coffee-room, sir.

NORTH

Why, Mr Ambrose, in case of any accident, it might be a serious business, for, to say nothing of the deaths of so many unoffending, yet I fear, unprepared individuals, actions of damages, at the instance of the relatives of the deceased, might be brought against us, the survivors—

SHEPHERD

Na, na—only again the relatives o' the gander, and wha ever heard o' legal proceedings again a flock o' geese?

NORTH.

Hush! did no one hear something creaking?

TICKLER.

Only a coach rattling down Leith-Walk. Let us be seated.

NORTH.

Well, I had heard from several persons of credit who had seen him on his walk, that he was like the cow that swallowed Tom Thumb, "larger than the largest size;" but he out-Herods Herod—I should rather say, out-Goliath Goliath.

TICKLER.

I am surprised his owner, instead of selling him, did not put him into a show. 'T would have made his fortune.

SHEPHERD.

We'll cut him up

NORTH.

If you please—I.

SHEPHERD.

Awmose, you should ha' sent an order to Brummagem for a knife on purpose.

NORTH.

Perhaps the usual instrument will do. How hot he is!

SHEPHERD.

Let him cool while we help our eyes to coolers.

They help them—'t' Coult's still the Gander cools.

NORTH.

A Gander, I remember I read. You know, that while his wife, the Goose, was duty-bound to sit in general or any particular occasion takes to her yadder-sheer, and at last she drops down with his down on the eggs, and broods over them in her most maternal manner, a magnum-looking fully-sheer-lady, a magnum.

SHEPHERD.

He is apt, however, by the inferior he is resident in his dolt, to addle the eggs, or to turn them into washings that bear little analogy to the parent part.

SHEPHERD.

A feathered neck has been made—I howp has been made—true the fleece of the feathered rule—though I suspect the small may prove any thing but soporific. The pluckings of toon-geese bring naething like the pund-wicht compared to the feathered in the kitchen. They're sae coarse—ye see—and seldom or never sweet.

NORTH.

Our friend on the table at times—but of wild geese I have heard many well-authenticated anecdotes, that denote prudence apparently beyond the reach of mere instinct. They are sensible that a disposition to gabble is one of their weak points—and, on taking a flight through the air infested by curles or other birds of prey, they all provide themselves, each with a chucky-stane in his mouth, to hinder the proprietor thereof from betraying their transit to the enemy. Could our poor fat friend, think ye, have been up to that stratagem, to silence and save himself in extremity?

SHEPHERD.

No he. He wou'd hae better' the chucky drap frae his bill, preferring being gutted to nae gabble.

TICKLER.

A gander walking by a pond wi' a chucky-stane in his bill, reminds the classical scholar of Demosthenes on the sea-shore.

SHEPHERD.

Haw—haw—haw!—curin' himself o' an impediment in his quack.

NORTH.

How is he now? Still, like Taylor's goose, hot and hissing.

TICKLER.

Let us put him into ice. Where's the bucket?

SHEPHERD.

Dinna disturb again the bad household.

NORTH.

I once knew a gander, James, that, regularly every sabbath, for several years, conducted an old blind woman to the kirk.

TICKLER.

Hypocrite! to be remembered in her will.

NORTH.

Residuary legatee.

TICKLER.

Our fat friend on the table, I fear, was no church-goer.

SHEPHERD.

I've kent ganders make capital watch-dogs, after a lang prenticeship.

TICKLER.

The most unaccountable fowl at first sight I remember ever to have witnessed, had the reputation in the parish of being the joint production of a gander and a duck.

SHEPHERD.

What a squatter!

NORTH.

A gander, in the sporting circles, would be backed at odds, in pedestrianism, against a bubbly. For half a mile, the bubbly, being longer in the spald, would outstep the gander, and probably reach the goal before him by half an hour. But let them travel from morn till dewy eve, and the bubbly at sunset uniformly goes to roost, while the gander, being of a more wakeful genius, waddles on, and by moonlight laughs to behold his competitor sound asleep in a tree.

TICKLER.

Our gander cou'd not have done at last six yards an hour; for, like Hamlet, he was "fat and scant of breath."

SHEPHERD.

Like Hamlet!

NORTH.

The gander, noble bird as he is, and stately, lives and dies without ever having taken to himself, either scientifically or empirically, his own altitude; so that, high as he holds his head in reality, 'tis not so high, by an immeasurable difference, as in his own towering imagination.

TICKLER.

I admire him most when, with bill hissing earthwards, and hind-end affronting heaven, he expresses his scorn of the whole human race—like Timon of Athens.

NORTH.

In that posture, he is, I grant, impressive; but surely sublimer far is the gander majestically stooping his forehead, as he walks under a gateway, some thirty feet high, considerate of the crown of the arch. What an union of dignity and condescension!

TICKLER.

Aye, every inch a king.

NORTH.

I remember seeing a gander on the morning of the day our late gracious King visited Dalkeith Palace, eyeing the triumphal arch which loyalty had erected at the entrance of those beautiful grounds and gardens, all greenly garlanded for the sovereign approach. He never doubted for a single moment that the pomp was all in honour of him—that to see him was gathered together that great multitude. The rushing of chariots was heard, the tramp of cavalry, and the blare of trumpets—and ten thousand voices cried, "The King! The King!" The gander—prouder far than George the Fourth—whom he despised—at that instant, waddled under the arch—down went the head, and up went the dowp of the despot—

"While unextinguished laughter shook the skies!"

TICKLER.

A few years ago, North, you will remember, that a luminous arch—probably electrical—pained the starry heavens. A gander of my acquaintance, sleepless, mayhap, in unrequited love, I met on a common, in the moonlight seeming a swan—and, indeed, in their own estimation, all geese are swans. The heavenly apparition attracted his eye “in a fine frenzy rolling,” and from the enthusiasm that characterized his whole manner, it was manifest that he opined erroneously, I should suppose, that the Wonder whose span and altitude at that moment philosophers were computing, had been flung across the sky, simply for sake of him who “was stepping westwards,” the victim of a hopeless passion. I believe the arch was about fifteen miles high—but the gander was afraid he might break it did he advance—and, accordingly, down head and up down, after the fashion aforesaid, and so, till he faded in the distance,

“In godlike majesty, erect and tall;”

“Through Eden took his solitary way.”

NORTH.

What a grand figure the gander must have made on descending from the Ark! On the first dawning of the rainbow on the showery sky, down head and up down of the waddling worshipper.

SHEPHERD.

Will you twa never be dune glorifyin’ ganders?—Forgettin’, that noo is the time for deeds, not words—not for description, but execution.—Is he no cool yet?

NORTH.

Now let me cut him up.

TICKLER.

Not yet. Let him cool a little longer.

NORTH.

I shall never cease to regret that I did not see him alive; for if I had, I should unquestionably have had him skinned, and stuffed for the Museum in the Andersonian Institution.

TICKLER.

Do you reinember the learned gander, North?

NORTH.

No. You don’t mean to say he was so?

TICKLER.

Not at all. The learned gander I allude to was brought forward to put down the learned pig. Each had his admirers; but while it seemed to be pretty generally admitted, that the pig was the quicker, the gander was thought to be more profound.

SHEPHERD.

I dinna ken hoo it is, but I’m far frae likin’ his appearance. It’s no wholesome. There’s either a dead rat ahint the wainscoat, or he’s stinkin’.

NORTH.

Poo—poo—poo! stinking! he was gabbling this day week.

SHEPHERD.

He may have been gabblin’, and hiss’in’, and squatterin’ too this day week; but if he’s no stinkin’ noo, I’ve no olfactory nerves in my nostrils.

NORTH.

I begin to believe that I do scent something——

SHEPHERD.

Foumartish.

TICKLER.

He’s in bad odour.

SHEPHERD.

In smell as weel’s in size, he far beats ony Solan.

NORTH.

Gentlemen, I am ready at the slightest signal to cut him up; yet prudence seems to suggest the propriety of first puncturing him with the prongs of this fork, to let out any foul air that may have collected within his breast.

SHEPHERD.

Stop, sir. What if a’ that mass o’ appawrent flesh be naething but a foul congregation o' vapours, pent by teuch skin within the deceitfu' and absurd rotundity o' the gander? Prick it wi' the prang, and oot they'll fizz—fizz—fizz—as frue a crack in a steam-engine; and the consequences may be fatal, sir, not only to us Three and the other occupiers of this house, but to the inhabitants o' the hail lan', nay, o' the city—let me not scruple to say, the kin'dom at large; nor, should the evil extend so widely, is it likely that it will be contented to confine its ravages within the limits of our sea-beat shores, but in all human probability will pass the straits from Dover to Calais, and infect France, and, through her Spain, and the Netherlands, &c., till a pestilence prevail over unhappy Europe—ere long of course to take possession of Asia—not, for my ain part, do I see how America and Africa can reasonably expect to escape the general visitation;—and a' this trac just pittin' a prang until the braud blawn-up breest o' the great Glasgow gander! Weel nicht Pope say,

“What due events frae trivial causes spring?”

NORTH.

The picture you have drawn, James, of the probable effects of such an eruption, is at once natural and alarming; yet I am disposed to believe, that though much foul air there no doubt must be in the animal, swollen out as we see him, much of it must have escaped in opposite directions, when, under the hands of a gang of Guzzies, he gave up the ghost.

SHEPHERD.

Dootless—dootless—Then we should consider his wecht. More foul air could never have had you wecht—no it—so gie him the pint o' the prang—

TICKLER.

May I be allowed humbly to suggest a proposal, in which, how ever selfish it may seem, I can lay my hand on my heart and with a safe conscience declare, that I have nothing so much in view as the lives of his gracious Majesty's most loyal subjects—

SHEPHERD.

Hand your han', Mr North—Tickler, what is't

TICKLER.

That we all plug

SHEPHERD.

That we a' plug! What's that

TICKLER.

To plug, James, being interpreted, means to stuff both nostrils tightly, closely, and firmly with tobacco quidities—and thus is the nasal promontory prevented from absorbing the infection—and the whole man gaudet-proof.

SHEPHERD.

Then let us a' plug

Enter the PLUG with a coil of tobacco, and they plug.

NORTH.

Now to business.

TICKLER.

Stop, sir—

NORTH (impatiently.)

Tickler, I wont be interrupted—

TICKLER.

Steel, if you please, sir. There is no occasion to run into needless expense—and as the same instrument can never be used again, except indeed for a similar purpose, which, in the ordinary and due course of nature, is not likely to recur—why a silver fork—

NORTH.

Well, steel be it. But no more interruption—

SHEPHERD.

Stop, sir, stop just for a moment. Had na we better send for some o' Sir Humphry Davy's Safety Lamps—

NORTH.

Nonsense, James. You don't understand the principle of that admirable invention.

TICKLER.

Let us veil our faces with our bandanas.

NORTH.

Safer bare. Now.

[NORTH plunges the fork into the gander, and the Snuggery is insupportably afflicted with a strange stench, strong as the Jakes.]

SHEPHERD.

Fa' a' doon on your faces, or we'll be snooored.

NORTH (holding his nose.)

Please, Tickler, to open the windows.

TICKLER.

How can I, when you see how my hands are occupied?

NORTH.

How?

TICKLER.

Like your own.

[Enter PICARDY and TAIL.—all nose in hand.]

AMBROSE.

Beg pardon, gentlemen, for the intrusion: but some ladies have fainted in the blue parlour.

SHEPHERD (recovering from a swoon.)

Said ye the common shower had burst under the foundations o' Picardy Place, or hae I been dreamin,' and am noo wakened to the reality o' that unsupportable goose, the Great Glasgow Gander?

AMBROSE.

The Great Glasgow Gander he assuredly is, gentlemen; and I have kept as a curiosity the certificate that was round his neck—a certificate signed by two witnesses besides his original owner, that he was the self-same animal aforesaid, and no counterfeit.

NORTH.

Having gone thus far, we must not recede. He must be cut up.

[North dexterously cuts a circular hole in the apron, off with the do/p, and scores the breast with scientific scarification.]

Corrupt as a rotten borough!

TICKLER.

Cholera Morbus?

SHEPHERD.

Na—that would hae pu'd him doon. No Cholera Morbus.

NORTH.

The disease is in the liver——

TICKLER.

And lights.

SHEPHERD.

Hoo cou'd he possibly hae been cyeueckt?

TICKLER.

A mystery—like Byron's Cain.

NORTH.

The fire has kindled the original sin—the bile with which his whole system was imbued by nature—and smell the result!

SHEPHERD.

O, sirs! O, sirs! what think ye hae they dunc wi' his inside? Hoo disposed o' the entrails?

AMBROSE (coughing, and in a faint voice.)

The sewer runs to the sea.

TICKLER.

Then I, for one, eat no fish for a twelvemonth.

SHEPHERD.

Oh! the puir harmless baddies!

NORTH.

Why stand ye staring there, Picardy, with your long useless tail! Away with the Pest—and let it be “In the deep bosom of the ocean—buried.”

[PICARDY and his Tail, after much severe suffering, with which we are sure all Christian souls must sympathize, bear away the Gander.

—SHEPHERD.

This is dreadful! It gets waur and waur.

TICKLER.

“Deeper and deeper still!”

NORTH.

We must have the Snuggery incensed and fumigated. Here, James, burn this lavender—Tickler, sprinkle this musk——

SHEPHERD.

Oh! that bawdrons there—bookin’ within the fender—were but a rivet!

TICKLER.

I always carry in my bosom a camphor-bag to allay my passions—there it kindles into a flame.

NORTH.

How providential Shepherd’s Ambrosial Fumigating Pastiles!

SHEPHERD.

Alas! alas! a’ won’t do! The dead sea o’ smell neither ebbs nor flows—but keeps thickening in stagnant stench.

[Enter AMBROSE, MON, CADET, KING, PEPIN, SIR DAVID GAM, TAPPETOWRIE, and the PEEN, with Pitch-Pine-Torches.

NORTH.

The smell subsides.

SHEPHERD.

Slaw’s the ebb.

TICKLER.

I seem to breathe, already, in a purer atmosphere.

SHEPHERD.

Unplug.

(The General Assembly unplugs.)

NORTH.

Bring in a couple of casks of Glenlivet—knock in the heads—and in a few minutes the Snuggery will be as sweet as a Still——

SHEPHERD.

Amang the bonnie bloomin’ heather!

(The casks are brought in—and the purification is magical.)

TICKLER.

Now, North—a song. Theodore Hook himself is not a more brilliant improvisatore than Christopher North. I give the theme—The Glasgow Gander.

NORTH.

Tune and measure?

TICKLER.

Take Lockhart’s noble song, “O the Broad Swords of Old Scotland—and oh the Scottish Broad Swords!”

[NORTH rises—and leaning on the crutch—after clearing his throat with a cauter—is thus inspired.

THE GANDER OF GLASGOW.

I sing of the Gander we’ve got from the West,
Who alive was each peaceable passenger’s pest,
And who now is so loathsome and rank when he’s dress’d—
Oh! the great Gander of Glasgow—
Oh! the great Goose of the West!

In what bed of nettles he first saw the light,
Is a point that is hid in the darkness of night,
And we’ll leave it to those who such Chronicles write,
As that of the Gander of Glasgow,
The great gabbling Goose of the West.

Of this I know nothing :—nor can I surmise
How or where he grew up to such hideous size,—
For I ne'er heard his name till he first got the prize
As the wonderful Gander of Glasgow,
The king of the Geese of the West.

But henceforth behold him in Glasgow's fair town,
Full fraught with the thoughts of his well-fed renown,—
His head held on high, and his rump drooping down,
The great prize Gander of Glasgow—
The pride of the Geese of the West.

The old Roman Gander that guarded the state,
Was not more absurdly majestic in gait,
Than once was the gander that lies on that plate,—
The great hirpling Gander of Glasgow,
The great cackling Goose of the West.

There was surely in Nature no sight so absurd
As the aspect of this most preposterous bird :—
And surely no gabble was ever yet heard
Like that of the Gander of Glasgow,
The great gabbling Goose of the West.

With pinious half-told his coat — see him steer !
Oh ! if any one sight more grotesque could appear
Than the Gander in front, 'twas the Gander in rear
The rear of the Gander of Glasgow,
The rump of the Goose of the West !

This ponderous creature of mud and of mire,
Always look'd as he'd set the Guse-dubs upon fire ;
So absurd in his pride, and so fierce in his ire,
Was the great hissing Gander of Glasgow,
The preposterous Goose of the West !

Full many a bout had the Bunny and he,
For their trades were so like they could never agree,
And their gabbling and gobbling 'twas fearful to see,
Alarming the Gorbals of Glasgow,
The peace of the Queen of the West.

The Damsels of Glasgow were stricken with fear,
And fled in dismay when the Gander was near,—
And his Liza herself must have hated the leer
Of the odious Gander of Glasgow,
The ill-favour'd Goose of the West !

Then, vain as he was, how he shew'd his poor spite
To each bird of a nobler and loftier flight,
Whose region of glory lay far out of sight
Of the blear-eyed Gander of Glasgow,—
The great gaping Goose of the West.

Have you e'er seen a dunce whose unfortunate lot
Is to rail at the laurels of Southey or Scott ?
You almost might swear that a hint he had got
From the envious Gander of Glasgow,—
The pitiful Goose of the West !

And whenever you hear such a dunce's abuse,
The cause is the same, and the same the excuse ;

"He's only a Gander, the son of a Goose,
 "Like him of the Gorbals of Glasgow,—
 "The foul-feeding Goose of the West."

Thus liv'd the great Gander;—but this could not last,
 And a gloom o'er the Cause-dubs at length there was cast,
 For his days they were number'd—the sentence was pass'd,
 That silenc'd the Gander of Glasgow,
 The ill-fated Goose of the West!

For the Agent of Amnioni, who liv'd in the place,
 Had his eye on the bird, as the chief of his race;—
 And resolv'd that his carcass the Noctes should grace,
 For the glory of Geese and of Glasgow,
 The much-boasted Queen of the West!

'Twould offend against taste, and might shock the humane,
 To tell how the Gander was put out of pain;
 And the plucking and basting we need not explain,
 Of the ribs of the Gander of Glasgow—
 The great greasy Goose of the West.

He had not been placed on the spit very long,
 When Ambrose suspected that something was wrong, —
 For he ne'er smelt a Goose so confoundedly strong
 As the nauseous Gander of Glasgow,
 The rank-smelling Goose of the West!

And now he's cut up, and his breast is laid bare,
 Oh! what foulness, and rankness, and rotteness there!
 'Twould sicken the patron of Burke and of Hare
 To look on the Gander of Glasgow,
 The hideous Goose of the West!

Now with conduct and carcass so much of a piece,
 What are we to think of this foulest of Geese,
 But that some Glasgow Whig must have taken a lease
 Of the name of "The Gander of Glasgow,"
 The King of the Geese of the West!

'Tis hard to believe, in this sceptical age,
 In migration of souls, like the Samian sage,
 But the soul of some Whig, in corruption's last stage,
 Must have dwelt in the Gander of Glasgow,
 The unfortunate Goose of the West!

SHEPHERD

Haw! haw! haw! was that really, Sir, an extemporaneous impromptu?
 NORTH.

Sung on the spur of the instant, I assure you, James. Indeed, how could it be otherwise? For Ambrose had provided for me an after-piece, which he thought would be "The Agreeable Surprise!"——

TICKLER.

To follow "The Cock of the North," a mellow dram in three canikers——
 SHEPHERD.

No that unwutty, Tickler.

NORTH.

Nor could my prophetic soul anticipate the Gander. But next Noctes, I promise you a more regular and finished performance.

TICKLER.

Some epigrams.

NORTH.

And epitaphs, Tickler; epithalamia and epicedia—different kinds of composition--though old Pirie of the Morning Chronicle thought them one and the same-----

TICKLER.

And sung commonly at christenings.

NORTH.

But now, gentlemen, we must be toddling-----

SHEPHERD.

“Roun’ as a neep we’ll gang toddlin’ hame.”

Hoo sweet the Snuggery! Nae noxious air can lang pollute its pure privacy, ventilated, at a’ seasons, wi’ the breath o’ humanest merriment.

NORTH.

Yes, James, again “the air smells wooingly.”

SHEPHERD.

As in a heather dell!

NORTH.

Lo, a red-deel!

[NORTH bounds over the circular like a Stag-of-Ten.

SHEPHERD (holding up his hands.)

Wunnerfu’ auld man!

(TICKLER leaps upon the SHEPHERD’s shoulders, and the scene shifts to the street.

14. Mary, third daughter of Adam Gordon of Cairnfield, Esq.

— At his house, in Heriot Row, Henry Mackenzie, Esq. in the 56th year of his age. This eminent literary character, and venerable citizen, so well known as the author of "The Man of Feeling," and many other productions, had been confined to his room for a considerable time past, by the general decay attending old age. We cannot but with feelings of regret, notice the departure of almost the last of that eminent class of literary men, who, above fifty years ago, cast such a lustre on our city. In that delicate perception of human character and human manners, so correctly, so elegantly, and often so humorously delineated in the numbers of "The Mirror" and "Lounger," where Mr Mackenzie was the chief contributor, as well as in his other works, and in his general views of the great principles of moral conduct, there have been few authors more distinguished. The elegant society in Edinburgh, well known in former days by the name of "The Mirror Club," consisted, besides Mr Mackenzie, of several gentlemen who were afterwards Judges in the Court of Session, viz. Lord Bannatyne, Lord Cullen, Lord Abercromby, Lord Craig, and also Mr George Home, and Mr George Ogilvie. The first, now Sir William Bannatyne, a venerable and most accomplished gentleman of the old school, is the only survivor.

11. At 48, Minto Street, Newington, William Thomson, Esq. of Westburnham, late banker in Edinburgh.

THE LATE DR THOMSON.

It is with feelings of the deepest regret that we announce the death of this eminent public character and learned divine, which took place about six o'clock in the evening of the 9th of February. Dr Thomson assisted in the forenoon at the ordination of Mr Ritchie to be pastor of St Luke's parish, Demerara. He afterwards took a part in the discussion of Mr McCarg's case at the Presbytery. He left the Presbytery Hall about five o'clock, proceeding along Prince's Street to his house in Melville Street; Mr Hurst Murdoch met him there, and accompanied him home. Having arrived in front of his own house, he turned round suddenly, just as Mr Murdoch was leaving him, as if to say something he had forgotten, but instantly fell back senseless on the pavement. He was immediately carried into the house, and Dr Sibbald, of Hope Street, was sent for, who bled him in the arm and jugular vein, but without effect. Drs M'Whirter, Newbigging, and Abercromby were also sent for, but all their efforts to restore animation were wholly unavailing; the Rev. Doctor never spoke after he had fallen, and expired in about an hour.

During the excitement caused by the sudden death of a public man, cut off in the prime of life, and in the midst of a career of extensive usefulness, it is easy to pronounce a panegyric, but difficult to delineate a character, which shall be free from the exaggeration of existing feeling, and recommend itself to the unbiased judgment of cool reflection. Hardly has such a deep sensation been produced as by the recent removal of Dr Thomson; but in few instances, we are persuaded, has there been less reason for making abatement, on the ground of temporary excitement, from the regret and lamentations so loudly and unequivocally expressed. He was so well known, his character and talents were so strongly marked, and were so much of that description which all classes of men can appreciate, that the circumstances of his death did not create the interest, but only gave expression to that which already existed in the public mind.

Those who saw Dr Thomson once, knew him: intimacy gave them a deeper insight into his character, but furnished no grounds for altering the opinion which they had at first been led to form. Simplicity—an essential element in all minds of superior mould—marked his appearance, his reasoning, his eloquence, and his whole conduct. All that he said or did was direct, straightforward, and unaffected; there was no labouring for effect, no paltering in a double sense. His talents were such as would have raised him to eminence in any profession or public walk of life which he might have chosen—a vigorous understanding, an active and ardent mind, with powers of close and persevering application. He made himself master in a short time of any subject to which he found it necessary to direct his attention, had all his knowledge at perfect command, expressed himself with the utmost purity, ease, and energy; and, when roused by the greatness of his subject, or by the nature of the opposition which he encountered, his bold and masterly eloquence produced an effect, especially on a popular assembly, far beyond that which depends on the salient of imagination, or the dazzling brilliancy of fancy-work. Nor was he less distinguished for his moral qualities, among which shone conspicuously an honest, firm, unflinching, fearless independence of mind, which prompted him uniformly to adopt and pursue that course which his conscience told him was right, indifferent to personal consequences, and regardless of the frowns and threats of the powerful.

Beside the instructions of his worthy father, it was Dr Thomson's felicity to enjoy the intimate friendship of the venerable Sir Henry Moncreiff, who early discovered his rising talents, and freely imparted to him the stores of his own vigorous and matured mind, and of an experience acquired during the long period in which he had taken a leading part in the councils of the national church. Though Dr Thomson was known as a popular and able preacher from the time he first entered on the ministry, the powers of his mind were not fully called forth and developed until his appointment to St George's. He entered to that charge with a deep sense of the importance of the station, as one of the largest and greatest parishes of the metropolis, and not without the knowledge that there was in the minds of a part of those among whom he was called to labour, a prepossession against the peculiar doctrines which had always held a prominent place in his public ministrations. But he had not long occupied that pulpit, when, in spite of the delicate situation in which he was placed by more than one public event, which obliged him to give a practical testimony (displeasing to many in high places) in favour of the purity of Presbyterian worship, and the independence of the Church of Scotland,—he disappointed those who had foreboded his ill success, and exceeded the expectations of such of his friends as had the greatest confidence in his talents. By the ability and eloquence of his discourses, by the assiduity and prudence of his more private ministrations, and by the affectionate solitude which he evinced for the spiritual interests of those committed to his care, he not only dissipated every unfavourable impression, but seated himself so firmly in the hearts of his people, that long before his lamented death, no clergyman in this city, established or dissenting, was more cordially revered and beloved by his congregation. Nothing endeared him to them so much and so deservedly as the attention he paid to the young and the sick; and of the happy art which he possessed of communicating instruction to the former, and administering advice and consolation to the latter, there are many pleasing, and, it is to be hoped, lasting memorials.

Dr Thomson was decidedly evangelical in his doctrinal sentiments, which he did not disguise or hold back in his public discourses; but he was a practical preacher, and instead of indulging in abstruse speculations or philosophical disquisition, made it his grand aim to impress the truths of the gospel on the hearts of his hearers. Attached to the Church of Scotland from principle, not from convenience or accident, he made no pretensions to that indiscriminating and spurious liberality which puts all forms of ecclesiastical polity and communion on a level; but in his sentiments and feelings he was liberal in the truest sense of that word; could distinguish between a spirit of sectarianism and conscientious secession, never assumed the airs of a churchman in his intercourse with dissenters, co-operated with them in every good work, and cherished a respect for all faithful Ministers, which was founded not only on the principles of toleration and good will, but on the conviction that their labours were useful in supplying the lack of service on the part of his own church, and in counteracting those abuses in her administration, which he never scrupled on any proper occasion to confess and deplore.

It is well known that Dr Thomson belonged to that party in the Church of Scotland, which has defended the rights of the people in opposition to the rigorous enforcement of the law of patronage; and in advocating this cause in the Church Courts he, for many years, displayed his unrivalled talents as a public speaker, sustained by an intrepidity which was unawed by power, and a fortitude which was proof against overwhelming majorities. Of late years, he has devoted a great portion of his labours to the defence of the pure circulation of the Scriptures, and the emancipation of the degraded negroes in the West Indies; and in both causes he has displayed his characteristic ability, zeal for truth, and uncompromising and indignant reprobation of every species of dishonesty, injustice, and oppression. His exertions in behalf of the doctrines and standards of the Church, against some recent heresies and delusions, afford an additional proof, not only of his unwearied zeal in behalf of that sacred cause to which he devoted all his energies, but of his readiness, at all times, to "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints."

Great as Dr Thomson's popularity was—and few men in his sphere of life ever rose so high in popular favour—he was not exposed to the woe denounced against those “of whom all men speak well.” He had his detractors and enemies, who waited for his halting, and were prepared to magnify and blazon his faults. Of him it may be said, as of another Christian patriot, no man ever loved or hated him moderately. This was the inevitable consequence of his great talents, and the rough contests in which he was involved. His generous spirit raised him above envy and every jealous feeling, but it made him less tolerant of those who displayed these mean vices. When convinced of the justice of a cause, and satisfied of its magnitude, he threw his whole soul into it, summoned all his powers to its defence, and assailed its adversaries, not only with strong arguments, but with sharp, pointed, and poignant sarcasm; but unless he perceived insincerity, malignity, or perverseness, his own feelings were too acute and too just to permit him gratuitously to wound those of others. That his zeal was always reined by prudence,—that his ardour of mind never hurried him to a precipitate conclusion, or led him to magnify the subject in debate,—that his mind was never warped by party feeling,—and that he never indulged the love of victory, or sought to humble a teasing or pragmatic adversary, are positions which his true friends will not maintain. But his ablest opponents will admit, that in all the great questions in which he distinguished himself, he acted conscientiously, that he was an open, manly, and honourable adversary; and that, though he was sometimes intemperate, he was never disingenuous. Dr Thomson was by constitution a reformer: he felt a strong sympathy with those great men who, in a former age, won renown, by assailing the hydra of error, and of civil and religious tyranny, and his character partook of theirs. In particular, he bore no inconsiderable resemblance to Luther, both in excellencies and defects; his lionine nobleness and potency, his masculine eloquence, his facetiousness and pleasantry, the fondness which he shewed for the fascinating charms of music, and the irritability and vehemence which he occasionally exhibited, to which some will add, the necessity which this imposed on him to make retractions, which, while they threw a partial shade over his fame, taught his admirers the needful lesson, that he was a man subject to like passions and infirmities with others. But the fact is, though hitherto known to few, and the time is now come for revealing it, that some of those effusions which were most objectionable, and exposed him to the greatest obloquy, were neither composed by Dr Thomson, nor seen by him until they were published to the world; and that, in one instance, which has been the cause of the most unsparing abuse, he paid the expenses of a prosecution, and submitted to make a public apology, for an offence of which he was innocent as the child unborn, rather than give up the name of the friend who was morally responsible for the deed;—an example of generous self-devotion which has few parallels.

To his other talents, Dr Thomson added a singular capacity for business, which not only qualified him for taking an active part in Church Courts, but rendered him highly useful to those public charities of which the clergy of Edinburgh are official managers, and to the different voluntary societies with which he was connected. This caused incessant demands on his time and exertions, which, joined to his other labours, were sufficient to wear out the most robust constitution, and he at last sunk under their weight.

In private life, Dr Thomson was every thing that is amiable and engaging. He was mild, and gentle, and cheerful,—deeply tender and acutely sensitive in his strongest affections; most faithful and true in his attachments of friendship,—kind-hearted and indulgent to all with whom he had intercourse. In him the lion and the lamb may be said to have met together. But it was around his own family hearth, and in the circle of his intimate acquaintances, that Dr Thomson was delightful. It was equally natural in him to play with a child, and to enter the lists with a practiced polemic. He could be gay without levity, and grave without moroseness. His frank and bland manners, the equable flow of his cheerfulness and good humour, and the information which he possessed on almost every subject, made his company to be courted by persons of all classes. He could mix with men of the world without compromising his principles, or lowering his character as a minister of the gospel; and his presence was enough to repress any thing which had the semblance of irreligion. His firmness in principle, when he thought principle involved, whatever of the appearance of severity it may have presented to those who saw him only as a public character, had no taint of harshness in his private life; and, unbending as he certainly was in principle, he never failed to receive with kindness what was a kneecead to his passion in the spirit of friendship. It may indeed be said with truth, that, great as were his public merits, and deplorable the public loss in his death, to those who had the happiness to live with him in habits of intimacy, the deepest and the bitterest feeling still is, in the separation from a man who possessed so many of the finest and most amiable sensibilities of the human heart.

The loss of such a man, and at such a time, is incalculable. His example and spirit had a wholesome and refreshing, an exhilarating and elevating, influence on the society in which he moved; and even the agitation which he produced when he was in his stormy moods, was salutary, like the hurricane, (his own favourite image), and the last which he employed in public, purifying the moral atmosphere, and freeing it from the selfishness, and duplicity, and time-serving, with which it was overcharged.

Dr Thomson was born in June 1774, and was ordained in the year 1802. He has left a widow and seven children, of whom five are daughters.

VOL. XXIX.

A STORY OF GOOD QUEEN BESS.

BY THE ETRICK SHEPHERD.

It is a fact well known to those versed in the annals of illustrious British families, that, after the death of Mary Queen of Scots, there was still another accomplished young lady, who was an only child, and so nearly related to both the English and Scottish crowns that Elizabeth became restlessly jealous of her, and consulted with the timid James by what means the young lady might be prevented from having a legitimate offspring. James, entering keenly into the same feelings, urged Elizabeth to claim her as a royal ward, and then, having her under her own eye, she might readily find means, on some plausible pretence or other, to prevent her from marrying. Elizabeth acquiesced, and forthwith sent a message to that effect. The young lady, little knowing with whom she had to do, would willingly have gone to the court of her cousin, the English queen; but neither her mother, step-father, nor guardian, would permit it. And though the answer they returned to the Queen was humble and subservient, there was one intimation in it which cut Elizabeth to the heart, and prompted her to the most consummate means of revenge: it was, that the young lady was placed by her father's will under noble guardians in Scotland, who would not suffer the sole owner of two earldoms, and the presumptive heir of two crowns, to be removed from under their charge. This roused the jealousy of the old vixen into perfect delirium, and from that moment she resolved on having the young lady cut off privately.

These being known and established facts, the following story will easily be traced by a few to the real actors and sufferers; but, at the same time, I judge it incumbent on me to change the designation of the family and of the castle in some degree, that the existing relatives, numerous and noble, may not be apparent to every reader.

Shortly after this message, there came into Scotland, by King James's permission, a party of Englishmen, with a stud of fine horses for sale. They lingered in the vicinity of Acremoor castle (as we shall denominate it) for a good while, shewing their fine horses here and there; and one of them, on pretence of exhibiting a fine Spanish jennet to the young lady, got admittance to the castle, and had several conversations with the mother and daughter, both together and separately.

At the same period, there came to a farm-house on the Acremoor estate, late one evening, a singular old woman, who pretended to be subject to fits, to be able to tell fortunes, and predict future events. Her demeanour and language had a tint of mystical sublimity about them, which interested the simple folks greatly; and they kept her telling fortunes and prophesying great part of the night. Among other things, after a grand fit, she exclaimed, "Ah! is it so? Is it so? How came I to this place to-night to be the herald of treachery and misfortune! The topmost bough of the noble tree must be lopped off, and the parent stem fall in the dust! Woe is me! The noble and beautiful! The noble and beautiful! Curses on the head of the insatiable wretch!" And with such ravings she continued, till suddenly she disappeared.

There lived in the castle a very pretty girl, named Lucy Lumsdaine. She was the young lady's foster-sister, her chief waiting-maid and confidant, and there subsisted a strong attachment between them. That very night, about midnight, or, as some alleged, considerably after it, Lucy raised such an alarm in the castle as roused the terrified sleepers with a vengeance. She ran from one room to another, screaming out Murder! and after the menials were aroused and assembled together, the poor girl was so dreadfully affected that she could scarce make herself intelligible. But then she had such a story to deliver! She heard some strange sounds in the castle, and could not sleep, but durst not for her life leave her chamber in the darkness. She kept constantly listening at her key-hole, or looking from her lattice. She at one time heard her young lady sobbing, as she thought, till her heart was like to burst; and then the door of the catacomb beside the dungeon open and shut; then heavy steps moving stealthily to and fro; and finally, long after, she saw a man leap out at a window on the ground-floor, and take the dead body of her young mistress on his back in a sack, and retreat with hasty steps towards the churchyard. She saw one arm and the head outside the sack, and the beautiful long hair hanging down; and she was convinced and certain that her young lady was ravished and murdered by an English horse-jockey.

The ladies were both amissing. They had never been in their beds, and what to do the terrified inmates knew not; but, in the plenitude of their wisdom, they judged it best to proceed in a body to the churchyard, and seize the murderer before he got the body buried, and wreak ample vengeance on him. When they arrived at the burial-ground, there was nobody there, nor any thing uncommon to be seen, save an open grave newly made, into which not one of them dared to look, pretending that they knew for whom it was made. They then returned home contented after this great exertion. Indeed, what could they do, as no trace of the ladies was heard of?

There was little cognizance taken of such matters in that reign; but on this occasion there was none. King James, perhaps, either knew of or suspected the plot, and kept quiet; and the only person who made a great outcry about it was poor Lucy, who tried all that she could to rouse the vassals to enquiry and revenge; and so far prevailed, that proclamation was made at the pier of Leith and the cross of Edinburgh, and rewards offered for the apprehension of those who had carried the ladies off, and kept them in concealment. Murder was not mentioned, as a thing not to be suspected.

But behold, in a few days, Lucy also disappeared, the great mover of all this; and her sweetheart, Alexander Graham, and her only brother Lowry, with many other relations among the peasantry, were left quite inconsolable, and knew not what course to take. They had resolved to take vengeance in their own hands, could they have discovered whither to have directed it; but the plot had been laid beyond their depth.

The old witch-wife about this time returned, and having obtained universal confidence from her prophetic ravings about the topmost bough being lopped off, and the parent stem, and the noble and the beautiful, &c. &c. So, at the farmer's request, she was placed by David Dallas, the steward on the estate, in a little furnished cottage, a sort of winter resting-place for the noble family, near a lin in the depth of the wood; and there she lived, feared and admired, and seldom approached, unless perchance by a young girl who wished to consult her about a doubtful sweetheart.

After sundry consultations, however, between Alexander Graham, Lucy's betrothed sweetheart, and Lowry Lumsdaine, her only brother, it was resolved that the latter should go and consult the sibyl concerning the fate of Lucy. One evening, near the sun-setting, Lowry, taking a present of a deer's-ham below his plaid, went fearfully and rapidly away to the cot in the lin. That his courage might not eventually fail him, he whistled one while and sung another, "Turn the blue bonnet wha can;" but in spite of all he could do, heavy qualms of conscience sometimes came over him, and he would say to himself, "'Od, after a', gin I thought it was the deil or ony o' his awgents that she dealt wi', shame fa' me gin I wadna turn again yet!"

Lowry, however, reached the brink of the bank opposite the cottage, and peeping through the brambles, beheld this strange being sitting in a little green arbour beside the cottage, dressed in an antique and fantastic mode, and, as it appeared to him, employed in plucking leaves and flowers in pieces. She sometimes cast her eyes up to heaven, and then wiped them, as if she had been weeping. 'Alas! poor creature!' said Lowry to himself, "wha kens what she may hae suffered i' this wicked world! She may hae lost an only daughter or an only son, as I hae dune an only sister, and her losses may hae injured her reason. Aye, I hae little doubt, now when I see her, but that has been the case; an' that's the way how she sees intil hidden mysteries an' events. For it is weel kend that when God bereaves o' ae sense, he always supplies another, and that aften of a deeper and mair incomprehensible nature. I'll venture down the brae, and hear what she says. —Hqw's a' wi' ye, auld lucky o' the lin?—Gude-e'en t'ye. What's this you are studying sae seriously the night?"

"I'm studying whether a she-fox or a wild-boar is the more preferable game, and whether it would be greater glory to run down the one with my noble blood-hounds, or wile the other into a gin. Do you take me, Mr Lumsdaine?"

"Lord sauf us! she kens my name even, an' that without ever seeing me afore. I thought aye that we twa might be auld acquaintances, lucky, an' see what I hae brought ye in a present. It will be ill for making you dry, but ye're no far frae the burn here."

"You have been a simple, good-natured fool all your life, Lowry; I can perceive that, though I never saw your face before. But I take no gifts or rewards. Leave your venison, for it is what I much wanted, and here are two merks for it. Do as I bid you, else you will rue it."

"Aih! gudeeness, d'ye say sae? Give me a haud o' the siller then. It will mune turn into sklait-stanes at ony rate; sae it will make sma' odds to ony o' us. But, gude forgie us, lucky, what war ye saying about hunting? Ye may hunt lang ere ye start a wild-boar here, or a she-fox either, as I wad trow; sae an ye wad tell me ony thing, it maunna be in parables."

"Aye, but there's a she-fox that sees us when we dinna see her, and whose cruel eye can pick out the top chickens of the covey, and yet they cannot all suffice her insatiable thirsting after blood. She reminds me of the old song, to which I request your attention. It will tell you much:—

1.

"The boar he would a-wooing go,
To a mistress of command,
And he's gone away to the lady fox,
And proffer'd her his hand.
'You're welcome here, Lord Bruin,' she says,
'You're welcome here to me;
But ere I lie into your den,
You must grant me favours three.'

2.

"'Yes—favours three I will grant to thee,
Be these whate'er they may,
For there is not a beast in the fair forest
That dares with me to play.
Then bid me bring the red deer's heart,
Or nombles of the hind,
To be a bridal supper meet,
Fitting my true love's mind.'

3.

"'O no, O no,' said the lady fox,
'These are no gifts for me;
But there are three birds in fair Scotland,
All sitting on one tree;
And I must have the heart of one,
And the heads of the other two.
And then I will go, for well or woe,
To be a bride to you.'

4.

"Now woe be to that vile she-fox,
The worst of this world's breed,

For the bonny, bonny birds were reaved
away,
And doon'd by heg to bleed;
And she tied the boar up by the neck,
And he hung till he was dead."

As she sung these verses with wild vehemence, Lowry looked on and listened with mingled terror and admiration, trying to make something out of them relating to the subject nearest his heart; but he could not, although convinced that they bore some allusion to the subject. "I am convinced, lucky, that ye hae a swatch o' a' things, past, present, an' to come," said he; "for ye hae foretold some wonderfu' things already. But I can mak naething o' sic wild rants as this, an' unless ye speak to me in plain, braid Scots, I'll never be a bawbee's worth the wiser."

"Because, Lowry, that head of yours is as opaque as a millstone. Kneel down there, and I'll throw a little glamour over you, which will make you see a thousand things which are invisible to you now."

"Na, na, lucky! Nane o' your cantrips wi' me. I'm as feared for you as ye war a judge o' death an' life afore me. I just came to ask you a few rational questions. Will you answer them?"

"Perhaps I may, when I get a rational being to converse with. But did it ever strike that goblet head of yours, that it formed any part or portion of the frame of such a being?"

"But then, lucky, I hae nature at my heart, an' that should be respectit by the maist gifted body that exists. Now, as I am fully convinced that ye hae a kind o' dim view of a' that's gaun on aneath the heaven—as for ony furrer, that's rather a dirdum—we mauuna say ought about that—But aince for a', can ye tell me ought about my dear sister Lucy?"

"Alas, poor fellow! There, indeed, my feelings correspond with yours. Can it be that the rudest part of the creation is the most affectionate? Yes, yes, it must be so. From the shaggy polar bear to the queen upon the throne, there is one uniform and regular gradation of natural affection. In that most intense and delightful quality of the human heart, the lowest are the highest, and the highest the lowest; and henceforth will I rather ensconce myself among nature's garbage than snuffle the hateful atmosphere of heartless indifference and corruption. Why did it behove poor Lucy to suffer with her betters? Her rank glittered not in the fox's eye. But the day of retribution may come, and the turtle-dove return to her mate. There is small hope, but there is hope; such a villain can never sit secure. Mark what I say, hind—

'When the griffin shall gape from the top of Gont-Fell,
And the falcon and eagle o'er Scarbeck
shall yell,
When the dead shall arise, and be seen by the river,
And the gift, with disdain, be return'd
to the giver,
Then you shall meet Lucy more lovely than ever.'

Now leave me, good hind, leave me; for a hand will come and lead me in, which it is not meet you should see. But ponder on what I have told you."

Lowry was not slow in obeying the injunction, not knowing what might appear to lead her in; and as he trudged homeward, he conversed thus with himself:—"She's a terrible auld wife that! an' has something about her far aboon the common run o' women, wha are for the maist part great gouks, for as bonny an' as glib-tongued as they are. But here is an auld grim wrinkled lucky, wha, farby good sense an' right feeling, has a tint o' sublimity about her that's perfectly grand. May they no as weel be good spirits as evil aunes that she converses wi'? If ane could but trow that, what a venerable creature she wad be! She bids me ponder on her rhymes, but I can make naething o' them. That last ane refers to something they ca' coats wi' arms that the gentles hae, an' sounded like a thing where there was some hope, save a bit o't, 'when the dead shall arise.' When she came to that, oho! that's rather a dirdum, thinks I, and lost hope, and I'm now fairly convinced that my young lady an' sister are baith murdered; for I dreamed ae night that the spirit o' my dead mother came to me an' tauld me, that they were baith murdered by this new lord, and sunk wi' sackfu's o' stanes in the Acremoor Loch.

Now, O what heart can stand sic a thought as that !"

All the three females being thus lost without the least trace of any of them having been discovered, shortly thereafter an heir appeared, with a patent from King James for the estates, but not the titles; and he took forthwith uninterrupted possession. He was a sullen and gloomy person; and though at first he tried to ingratiate himself with his people, by giving to the poor, and employing many day-labourers, yet every one who could shunned his presence, which seemed to shed a damp and a chilliness over the human heart. At his approach the schoolboys left the play-green, retiring in detached and listless groups, till the awe-inspiring look scowled no more upon them. The laugh along the hay-field ceased at his approach, and the song of the reaper was hushed. He was styled Sir Herbert; but Sir Herbert soon found that his reign was likely to become an uneasy one. For word coming to Acremoor that he had been expressly sent for by Queen Elizabeth, and having waited on her, left her on some private commission for Scotland shortly before the disappearance of the young heiress and her mother; then it was that an indefinable sensation of horror began to inspire all ranks in that district. Their young lady's claim to both crowns was well known, and often boasted of among her vassals, and they dreaded that some dark and infamous deed had been committed, yet they wist not by what means to implicate their new and detested master, whom they thenceforward regarded as either a murderer, or an accomplice of murderers, and disclaimed allegiance to him.

The government of Scotland was at that time very inefficient, the aristocracy having quite the ascendant; and between the chief and his vassals there was no interference, his will being the supreme law among them, from which there was rarely any appeal. But with regard to who was their rightful chief, to whom they were bound to yield this obedience, that power the vassals kept in their own hands, and it was a right that was well looked into. Of course, at this very time, there was a meeting among the retainers and chief tack-men on these extensive domains, to consult whether or not it was consistent with honour and propriety to pay their rents to this upstart chief, while their late lord and master's only daughter was probably still in life, and might require double payment from every one of them; and it was decided unanimously, that unless a full explanation of his rights was laid before them, they would neither pay him rent nor obedience in future; so that at this time Sir Herbert found his vassals in open and avowed rebellion. It was in vain that he showed them his titles of recognition by the king; the men answered, that their young lady's rights and titles never had been forfeited; and, without a charter from her, they denied his rights of inheritance. They said farther, that they would take no single man's word or oath that their lady was dead, and they were determined to preserve her rights till they had sufficient proof where she died, how she died, and where she was buried.

While the chief vassals were thus interesting themselves more and more about the fate of their young lady, Lowry and Graham were no less perplexed about that of their beloved Lucy. The former had again and again waited on the sibyl, with whose wandering and visionary aspirations he was nightly taken; and having attended her by appointment early one morning, the following dialogue concluded their conversation:

"But I hae been thinkin', dear lucky, what's to come o' you, gin ye tak your death here,—for ye ken that maun come some time; an' there's naeboddy to tak care o' ye, to gie ye a drink, or haud your head, or to close your een, whan ye gang away."

"Fear not for me, honest lad, for I am resolved to die beneath the open eye of heaven, with my eyes open upon it, that I may feel the odours of paradise descending from it, and breathing their sweet influence over my soul; for there is a living animating spirit breathes over the open face of nature, of which mine forms an itein; and when I breathe it away at the last, it shall be into the pure elastic element."

Lowry was so struck with this, that he stepped aside, and exclaimed to himself, "Now, wha could suspect sic a woman as that for a witch? The thing's impossible! There's something heavenly about her! Breathe her soul into an element! I wonder what an element is! Aha, there's the dirdum!—Dear lucky, gin it be your will, what is an element?"

"Now, what do you think it is, honest Lumpy?"

"I'm rather in a dirdum; but I think it is a great muckle beast without joints." Then aside, "Hout, that canna be it neither, for how could she breathe her soul into a great unfarrant beast?"

"What is that you are muttering to yourself, fool? It is an elephant you are wrestling with. The elements are the constituent parts of nature. Fire is the primeval and governing one."

"Aih! gudeness preserve us! that's ten times waur than a muckle beast! Then she is a witch after a'; an' when she dies, she's gaun to breathe her soul into fire. That gars a' the hairs o' my head creep; I wish I were away. But dear, dear lucky, ye baena tauld me ought about Lucy as yet, or whether she be dead or living?"

"I have never seen her spirit. But death's safest to hide the crimes of a villain.—

There's villainy at the heart, young man;

There's blood upon the head;

But the worms that be would tread upon,

Shall lay him with the dead."

Lowry was little or nothing the wiser of this wild rhapsody, and went away to his work with a heavy heart. But that day one of the most singular incidents befel to him that ever happened to mortal man. Lowry was draining a meadow on the side of Acremoor Loch, and often wishing in his heart that Lucy's fate might be revealed to him one way or another, when, all at once, he felt a strange overpowering heat come over him, and on looking about to see from whence it proceeded, there was his mother standing close by his side. "Gudeness preserves us, mother!" cried Lowry; "whereaway are ye gaun? or what has brought you here?"

"O fie, Lowry, whaten questions are these to ask at your mother? Where can a mother gang, or where should a mother gang, but to her only son? Ye maybe thought I was dead, Lowry, but ye see I'm no dead."

"I see sae indeed, mother, an' glad am I to see you lookin' sae weel an' sae bien. But stand a wee bit farrer aff, an' it be your will, for there's a heat about ye that's like to skomfish me."

"Na, na, Lowry lad, ye're no sae easily skomfished; ye'll hae to stand a hantle mair heat than this yet. But tell me now, son, are you just gaun to delve and howk away a' your days there, an' never think o' revenging the death o' your dear sister?"

"Why, the truth is, mother, that that's rather a dirdum; for we canna discover, neither by witchery nor warlockry, what has come ower her, or wha to revenge her death on; or, my certy! but they wad get their dickens!"

"Dear Lowry, didna I tell ye lang syne that she was murdered an' sunk in the Acremoor Loch in a sackfu' o' stanes, an' that exactly opposite to the place where we stand?"

"Weel, mother, in the first place, I think I do mind o' you telling me this afore; but in the next place, as to where I am to find her, that's rather a dirdum, for ye ken twa things or twa places are always right opposite ane anither. Sae unless ye can gie me a third mark, I may fish in that great braid loch for my sister an' her sackfu' o' stanes for a tow-mont."

"Then, Lowry, do you see you willow-tree on the ither side o' the loch? you lang sma' tree that stands by itsell, bent i' the tap, and wantin' branches?"

"Aye, weel aneugh, mither."

"Then, exactly in a line between this spot, and you willow-tree, will you find the corpse o' your sister an' her lady, my other dear bairn, sunk in that loch wi' sackfu's o' stanes tied to their necks. Didna I tell you a' this afore, Lowry?"

"Aha, lucky, but I didna believe ye, for, d'ye ken, I never had muckle to lippen to your word a' my life,—for as for telling ane the even down truth, that never alnce cam into your head. I winna say that ye didna sometimes tell the truth, but then it was merely by chance; an' for that very reason, I'm a wee doubtful o' the story still, it is sae unnatural for a man to murder twa bonny young creatures, an' sink them into a loch, wi' a sackfu' o' stanes tied to their necks. Now, be sure o' what ye say, mother, for life and death depend on it. Did ye see them murdered an' sunk in that loch wi' your ain bodily an'?"

"Baith, baith, by your new laird's ain hands! He is the villain and the murderer!"

"Then, mother, off goes his head, an' on the clay dumpling—that's settled. Or how wad it do to rack his neck to him? But for mercy's sake, stand a wee bit farrer off, an' it be your will—for I declare there's a heat about you like a fiery furnace. Odsake, stand back, or I'll be baith suffocat an' roasted in five minutes."

"O Lowry, Lowry! my dear son Lowry!" exclaimed the old wife, clasping him round the neck, and smothering him with kisses of the most devouring heat. Lowry bellowed out most lustily, laying on both with feet and hands, and then added, "O! I declare she has downed me, the auld roodess, and smothered me, an' roasted me into the bargain! I'll never do mair good! Mither, where are you? Mither, what's become o' you? Hilloa, mither! where awa are ye gane? Gude forgie me, gin this disna ding a' things that ever happened in this world! This is beyond the comprehension o' man!"

Gentle reader, honest Lowry had all this time been sound asleep, with a burning sun beating on him. He had sat down on the edge of his drain to rest himself, and ponder on the loss of his sister, and, laying his broad shoulders back upon the flowery meadow, had fallen asleep, while in the meantime, the heat of the day had increased to such a pitch, that when he awoke from the struggle with his mother, his face and breast were all blistered, and the perspiration pouring from his ample sides like water. But the identity of his mother, and the reality of her personal presence, were so strongly impressed on his mind, and every thing having been so particularly related to him, he believed all as a real vision. He could work no more that day, but there he sat panting and conversing with himself in something like the following style:—

"Was there ever naught like my stupidity, no to remember a' the times that my mother was dead? an' yet that never ance cam into my head, although she gae me a hint about it. I saw her dee wi' my ain ee, saw her nailed in the coffin—aye, an' laid her head mysell in a deep grave, an' saw the mools heapit on her, an' the green sods aboon a'; an' yet never to remember that the grave separated her an' me—that the great valley o' the shadow o' death lay between us! Wow me, but there be mony strange things in nature! things that a body's comprehension canna fathom, if it should rax out its arms till they crack. It was my mother's spirit that spak to me, there can be nae doubts about that, an' it maun hae been my spirit, when I was in a dead sleep, that spak to her again; for spirits hae nae comprehension o' death. Let me now consider what's to be done, for I can work nae mair at my handiwork. She has tauld me that our new laird is a villain and a murderer. May I take this for gospel? Can I seriously believe this to be true? It is rather a dirdum that. Not that I think my mither's spirit wad come frae the ither world to tell me an' e'ndown lee; but then it may hae been mista'en. It strikes me that the spirit o' nae mortal erring creature can be infallible. They may see wrang wi' their mental een as easily as I may do wi' my mortal anes. They may hear wrang, an' they may judge wrang, for they canna be present everywhere, an' maun aften see an' hear at a distance. An' whether ane is warrantit in taking justice into his ain hands on sic information, is mair than I can compass.—I have it! I'll drag for the bodies, an' if I find them, I'll take the rest for grantit."

Lowry now began to settle his land-marks, by setting up a coil of sods on the place where he slept, but the willow-tree on the other side he could not discover. He then went and communicated the whole to Graham, who agreed at once that they ought to drag for the bodies, but not let any one know what they were about, or on what grounds they had proceeded.

The next morning they were out early with a boat and grappling irons; but the loch being broad and deep, they found that without discovering the willow-tree, it was a hopeless and endless task. But as soon as Sir Herbert rose and discovered, he sent express orders for them to come instantly ashore, which, when they did, he was exceedingly wroth with them, ordering all the boats to be chained up and secured with padlocks, and even threatened to fire on the first vagabonds he saw out on the lake disturbing his fisheries.

But this injunction proved only a new incentive to the young men to persevere; for they were now assured that all was not right, for the loch had hitherto been free to all the parish, and over it they had been accustomed to ferry their fuel, and all other necessities. The two friends spent the remainder of that day searching for the willow-tree among all the hedges and ditches on the south side of the lake; but willow-tree they could find none. Towards the evening they came to a single willow stem on the verge of the loch, a mere twig, not exceeding four feet in length, and as they passed it, Graham chanced to say carelessly, "There is a willow, but oh! it will be lang afore it be a tree!" Lowry turned round and looked eagerly at it. "That's it, that's it! That's the verra tree!" cried he. "How that should be the tree is rather a dir-dum; but things are a' gane ayont my comprehension now. Wow me, but a spirit's ee does magnify a thing terribly, for that willow was ten times as big when I saw it in my vision. Nae the less, it is the same, the very same, I ken it by its lang stalk without branches, an' its bend at the tap." There the two set up their landmark, and, the night being a summer night, and moonlight, they soon procured a boat, and began a-dragging in a line between the marks. They had not dragged ten minutes ere the grapple fixed in some movable body, which they began a-healing upward, with strange looks in each other's faces. Lowry at last stopped the windlass, and addressing his friend in a tremulous voice, said, "Wad it no be better to stop till we hae daylight, an' mae een to see this sight? I'm feared my heart canna stand it i' the moonlight. The thoughts o' seeing my dear sister's corpse a' riddled wi' the eels, an' disfigured, an' a sackfu' o' stanes tied to her neck, are like to put me beside myself."

"I hae something o' the same sort o' feeling," said Graham. "But I wadna like to bring out a' the folks in the morning merely on suspicion that this is a corpse, whereas it is maybe only a log o' wood."

"Weel, weel, if ye will bring it aboon I shall reel the windlass," said Lowry; "only ye're to allow me to turn my face the tither gate." On this arrangement they proceeded, until Graham was assured, by sensible demonstration, that it was a human carcass tied in a sack, and sunk with a weight! They then let it go, and tying the boat-bunker to the end of the rope for a buoy, went ashore, to consult what was next best to be done.

Early in the morning they had a number of their friends assembled at the side of the lake. But the late offence taken by the lord of the manor at the two friends, and his threat of firing upon any who should venture out on his fishing-ground, induced all the friends present to counsel the asking of his liberty. A deputation accordingly waited on Sir Herbert, who requested permission to drag the lake for some bodies which were suspected to have been sunk there. But without deigning any answer to the men, he, to their astonishment, that moment ordered out a body of his people, and at their head, hasted down to the side of the loch, driving the assembled friends off with blows and threats, and then left a guard of seven men with fire-arms, to guard the boats and the loch in general.

The two young men were now assured of the truth of the vision, but said nothing of it to their friends, who were all astonished at their laird's unreasonable conduct. Lowry and his friend were convinced of his heinous guilt, and determined not to give it up; but they knew not how to proceed, for there was no sheriff in the county, that office having been hereditary in their chief's family; so that if Sir Herbert was the real heir, he was likewise sheriff.

But it so happened that John Earl of Montrose, the king's viceroy for Scotland, was at that time in the vicinity, taking infeftment of some new grants of land, and he had likewise some of the principal official people of the country along with him. To him, therefore, the young men went, and told him all the story from the beginning, including Lucy's tale of the murder of their young lady. The Lord Viceroy was a good as well as great man. He had been a Lord of Session, Lord Chancellor of Scotland, and was now raised as high as a subject could be raised, being his sovereign's Viceroy, and acting by his authority. He was greatly taken with the young men's candour and simplicity, perceived that they were serious, and had too much discernment not to see that there was something wrong with this upstart; knowing, as he well did, the powerful and relentless enemy the late heiress had in Queen Elizabeth, and that the present possessor was her tool. It was probably on some previous knowledge of these events, that, at the very first, he entered strenuously into the enquiry; but when he asked the two friends who it was that told them where the bodies were deposited, they refused to tell, saying they were not at liberty to mention that.

Without pressing them farther, he accompanied the young men to Acremoor Castle, taking his official friends along with him. It may well be supposed that Sir Herbert was a little surprised by this unceremonious visit from the Lord Viceroy; he, however, put on a bold and hardy look, welcoming the party to his castle, and inviting them to alight and enter it, which they declined, till they saw the issue of the affair on which they had come. Montrose then asked him sternly his reasons for preventing the young man from searching for the body of his only sister, and the vassals for that of their lady? He answered, that it was all a pretence, in order to get opportunities to destroy the salmon; that he heard the rascals had been out by night, and he determined to check them in time. The Viceroy answered, that, by virtue of his authority, he not only granted warrant for the search, but had come with his friends to witness the issue, and examine the evidences. Sir Herbert bowed assent, and said, as long as his Highness was present, no depredation on his preserved fishing-ground could take place, only he requested him not to leave any such warrant behind him. He then furnished them with boats, but refused to accompany them himself on what he called such a frivolous expedition.

The Viceroy and his friends, however, went all out in several barges—for he had been too long a judge not to perceive the truth, though told to him in simple guise. Of course they at once brought up the one body, to which the buoy was attached, and found it to be that of a female, wrapped in a fine winding-sheet, and then put into a sack, with her head towards the bottom, and sunk with a large stone, and an iron ring in it. The stone was at once recognised by all the old vassals as one that had belonged to the castle dairy, but the identity of the body was uncertain. It was not greatly decayed, having been sunk among mud in the bottom of the lake; and all the stranger gentlemen thought it might have been recognised by intimate acquaintances. But it was manifest that a great uncertainty prevailed, as some thought it the body of their young lady, some that of Lucy, and more thought it neither. Even Lowry and Graham both hesitated, notwithstanding of the extraordinary information they had received, and its no less extraordinary accuracy.

The party continued to drag on, and at length actually fished up another female corpse, similarly disposed of in every respect, save that it was sunk by a leaden weight, which was likewise known to have been appended to the castle gate. The bodies were conveyed to a barn in the village, and all the inhabitants of the castle and its vicinity were summoned to attend on the instant, before the bodies were corroded by the action of the atmosphere, and the suspected murderer was obliged to attend, like a culprit, among the rest.

Strange as it may appear, though all the people suspected that the two bodies were those of their young lady and Lucy, not one of them would swear to the special identity of either. The Viceroy was fully convinced in his own mind that they were the bodies of the two young females. He made it clear that these two had been murdered at the castle about the time these ladies disappeared, and if no other person in the neighbourhood was missing, the presumption was strong that the bodies were either those of the mother and daughter, or those of the latter and her foster-sister. Nevertheless, for all this clear and explicit statement, not one would swear to the identity of either. The Viceroy then stated, that as no criminality attached to any one from all that he was able to elicit, nothing more remained to be done, but to give the bodies decent interment, and leave the murderers to the judgment of the Almighty. When he had proceeded thus far, Lowry stepped up and addressed him as follows:—

"My Lord, the maist part o' the fo'ks here think that these bodies are the bodies o' my sister and her young mistress; an' if ye wad swear us a', we wad swear to that purpose. But ye see, my Lord, death makes an awfu' change on the human face and frame, and waste and decay mair. But as ye hae gi'en up the murderer to the judgment o' Heaven, to the judgment o' Heaven I make appeal. There is an auld law o' nature, or rather o' Divine Providence, which I can depend on; and I humbly request that it may be tried: if these are the bodies o' my sister and young mistress, the murderer is among us. [At this word, Lowry lifted his eyes to one which he had no right to do.] Now, wad ye just order every ane present to touch these bodies, it wad gie a great satisfaction to my heart, an' the hearts o' mow mae than me."

The Viceroy smiled at the seriousness of the demand, but added, "If such a direct appeal to the justice of God can give satisfaction to the minds of friends and relatives, the process is an easy one." He then lifted up his hands, and prayed the Almighty to give a just judgment, and straight ordered that all present should pass between his friends and himself, arranged on each side, as witnesses that every one touched the bodies. Sir Herbert also ranked himself up among the gentlemen as one of the witnesses. The people passed, one by one, and touched the bodies; but they bled not. Lowry and Graham, who had touched first, stood looking on with apathy until the close, when the Viceroy, ordering them forward as witnesses, first touched the bodies himself, then his friends, one by one, touched them, and last of all, Sir Herbert approached. Lowry's eyes then gleamed with an unearthly ardour, from an internal assurance of Divine justice and retribution being instantly manifested, and clasping his hands together, he exclaimed, "Now, now, now!" Sir Herbert fixed on him a look of rage and indignation—went forward and touched both bodies—No—neither of them gushed out a bleeding, nor was there any supernatural appearance whatever.

Lowry's elated eye sunk, and his heart was humbled, but it was to the will of Providence, for he lifted both his hands, and said, "Well, it is past, and no more can be said! The will of the Lord be done! But as sure as there is a God in heaven, the murderer of these virgins shall not go down to his grave in peace, for their blood shall cry to their Creator from the ground, and his curse shall be upon the guilty heart for ever! They hae met wi' a cruel and untimely death; but be who they may, I'll lay them baith in my ain burial-place."

Every heart bled for Lowry and his friend, and every tongue was muttering curses, not loud, but deep, on their new laird, whom all the old vassals both suspected and detested. And no sooner had Montrose left that quarter to preside in the Parliament at Perth, than Sir Herbert's people began to shew symptoms, not only of dissatisfaction, but of open rebellion. Resolved to make an example of those most obnoxious to him, in order to strike others with terror, he warned seven tenants and feuars off the estate, against Friday next, Lowry and Alexander Graham's father being among the number.

The community were amazed at these tyrannical proceedings, so different from the kind treatment they had been accustomed to receive. Accordingly, they seemed, by some mutual assent, to regard the mandate with disdain, and made no motion of removal, either previous to, or on the appointed day. As if glad of such an opportunity of revenge, and of manifesting his power, down came

Sir Herbert with his proper officers, and ordered all the furniture of the devoted families to be thrown to the door, and if not removed before night, to be burnt. The men did as they were ordered; and this work of devastation went on from morning till towards the evening, the women crying, beseeching, and uttering anathemas on the usurper, as they called him. He regarded them not otherwise than to mock them, and superintended the work the whole day, encouraging the tardy and relenting officers.

But while the women and children were thus bewailing their hard lot, there appeared a dogged resignation among the men, who sauntered about in pairs, regarding the aggressor often with grim smiles, as of satisfaction, which inflamed him still the more. They probably knew what he little dreamed of, that there was then in preparation for him a catastrophe, which, if it had not been kept on record in the family annals, would not gain credit at this distance of time. It was the effect of one of those bursts of popular indignation against oppression, which is most apt to break out when they have no other redress; and in this case, the provocation was double, for they regarded their oppressor as likewise the murderer of their rightful heiress.

But the term of lording it over the trusty vassals of an ancient and noble stock was concluded. About seven o'clock in the evening of the 23d of July, 1602, a body of armed men rushed from a barn, which, it appeared, they had entered by a back door. Some of them had their visors down, others their faces blackened, and concerning their numbers, there were many differences of opinion. But the main facts were well authenticated. They instantly surrounded Sir Herbert, seized him, and ordered him to prepare for instant death. At that fearful injunction, the nature of the villain and craven became manifest. He fell on his knees, and cried out, "Mercy, mercy!" He prayed, he tore his hair, and wept, praying out like a maniac. He proffered free remission of all debts—all offences. He even proffered to leave Scotland, and renounce all claim on the estate. "We'll make shorter work w' such a cursed claim as yours," said they, and instantly put a running cord about his neck, and bore him on their arms into the barn, with ferocious alacrity, while he continued roaring out, "Murder, murder!" and "O mercy, mercy!" time about; but none pitied him, or came to the rescue. "Mercy!" cried they in derision; "such as you gave, so shall you have." With that, they threw the end of the rope over a high joist of the barn. A gigantic fellow, who seemed the leader of the gang, seized it; and wrapping it round both his hands, tightened it, and then asked his victim if he had no prayer to pray, and no confession to make?

"O yes, yes! I have, I have! I have a prayer to pray, and a confession to make," cried the wretch, glad to gain a little respite by any means, in hopes of some motion in his favour. "Grant me a reprieve, and I will confess all."

"Then in this world there is only one chance of a respite," said the gigantic chief, "which is, by confessing all that you know regarding the deaths of our young lady and her friend Lucy Lumsdaine."

"I will, I will!" cried he—"Only let me be heard before a tribunal of justice, and not be tried by masked assassins. This, however, I will confess, that my hands are guiltless of their blood."

"It is a lie!" said his accuser, fiercely; "and it is meet that such a ruffian go to hell with a lie on his tongue. Pull him up!"

"O no, no!" cried he in agony—"I tell you the truth. The hands of another assassin shed their blood. These hands are clean of it, as I shall answer at the tribunal above!" And so saying, he spread forth his hands towards heaven.

"It is a lie, I tell you, and a blasphemous one!" said the chief. "So either confess the whole truth, or here you go; for we know you for the Queen of England's agent, and guilty of their murder." So saying, he tightened the rope, and began to heave the guilty wretch from the ground.

"Stop, stop, master!" cried one; "perhaps he will yet confess the whole truth and live."

"Yes, yes! Hold, hold!" cried the culprit in the utmost desperation, seizing the rope with both hands, and dragging it down to slacken it; "I will, I will! I will confess all and live. Did you not say live, friend? I long only to live until brought to a fair trial, and I will confess all. I swear then, by all that is sacred, that I did not murder the maidens. But to save my own life, and at the express command of my sovereign, whom I dared not disobey, I connived at it. They were murdered, and I saw them sunk in the place from whence they were taken."

"Then the corpses could not bleed," observed one, "since he was not the actual murderer. This is wonderful! The judgment of Heaven still is just!"

"So is that of Eachan M'Farlane!" cried the gigantic chief, who held the farther end of the rope, and in a moment he had the victim dangling round and round in the air, five feet from the ground. Then there was a great hubbub, some crying one thing and some another, and some madly trying to pull him down again, which finished his existence almost instantaneously. They then fastened the end of the cord, and leaving him hanging, they marched away in a body, going over the Burrow Swire in the evening, as if men from another district.

This singular violence was very little looked into. There was little intermeddling between chief and vassal in those days; and, moreover, it was probably shrewdly guessed from what high and dangerous source the removing of the heiress proceeded. Lowry and Graham were seized next day, but shortly released, it having been proven at once that they were not present, having been both engaged in loading a cart with furniture at the time the outrage took place, and totally ignorant of what was going on; and it is a curious fact, that there never was one of the perpetrators discovered, nor was any one of that district particularly suspected. A M'Farlane there was not in it; and it has, therefore, been often hinted that the vassals had bargained with that wild clan for a body of men to come down and rid them of their upstart tyrant.

That very evening, as a number of the retainers were going to remove the body from the barn, who should they see but the Countess Dowager, their late young lady's mother, who had disappeared on the same night with her daughter, and whom they believed to have been murdered along with her; yet there she was standing at the door of the barn. True, there had been no confession made of her death, neither had it been revealed to Lowry in his vision. But she was missing with the rest, and the horror of the group may well be conceived when they beheld her standing watching the corpse of the murderer. She was recognised at once, and though she beckoned them onward, and moved forward slowly and majestically to meet them, this was a visitation they had not courage to abide, but retreated in a body to the castle. Still she advanced. It was the dusk of the evening, and as she approached the great front door that looked towards the lake, there were visages of dismay peeping from every window; and as the spectre entered the gate, there was a rush from the castle by the other entrance, which created a noise like thunder.

Great was the consternation that ensued; for from that moment no one durst enter the castle either by day or night, for there were wailings heard within it, and lights seen passing to and fro in the darkness of midnight. At length the old witch wife issued from her cot in the lin, and summoned Lowry and Graham, and several of the head families, to attend at the castle, and receive their Lady Dowager's commands, who was actually returned to her daughter's castle and estate, living, and in good health. But the warning, coming as it did from such an equivocal source, remained unattended to for a time, the people believing it was the Countess's spirit, not herself, till she shewed herself walking about publicly, and then the servants and retainers gathered to her, and obeyed her as in former times.

As she did not reveal to any one where she had been, so no one took it on him to enquire. But she told them that her grief and perplexity had never till then reached its height, for until the dying confession of the wretch whom she knew to be the accredited agent of a tigress, she had strong hopes that her daughter was alive. But that confession had changed her fondest hopes to the deepest sorrow; and she durst not set a foot in England while Queen Elizabeth lived, nor yet remain in Scotland, save in concealment, therefore she thought of proceeding to Flanders.

While things were in this confusion at the castle, who should make his appearance in the vicinity, but the identical horse-jockey who was known to have been the murderer of the young lady their mistress, and suspected likewise to have made away with poor Lucy, the only witness of his atrocities. The fellow now came in grand style, having livery servants attending him; and he was dispatching messengers backwards and forwards to England every day. He had even the effrontery to ride openly about, and make many enquiries of the state of affairs about the castle, supposing, as the vassals judged, that in his new and grand capacity he was not recognised. But his features had left among them an impression of horror not to be obliterated. Every one who had seen him on the former occasion, knew him, and none better than Alexander Graham.

A consultation was called of all the principal retainers, on which it appeared that every one suspected another English plot, but neither knew what it was, nor how to frustrate it. No one who has not heard the traditional story, or consulted the annals of that family, will guess what was resolved on at that meeting. Simply this, that they would go in a body and hang the English villain. The late event had been so much talked about, so much applauded, and so well kept, that hanging had become rather popular among these sturdy vassals. It was the order of the day; and accordingly that very night a party was made up, accoutred much as the former one, who proceeded to the stranger's hostel, which was not in the village at the castle, but in the larger one at the west end of the loch. There they made a simultaneous attack, demanding the English scoundrels to be delivered into their hands. But they had to do with better men in these English scoundrels than the other party had, and in all probability the attacking party was greatly inferior to the former one, for the Englishman at once, with many tremendous oaths and curses, prepared to defend himself against the whole mob, with no one to support him but his two livery servants. A stout battle ensued at the door, and ten times did the English hero drive them back almost single-handed, cursing them, meanwhile, for all the lousy cowardly assassins of their country gathered together, and swearing, moreover, to extirpate every soul of them; but at length rushing too far forward, he was surrounded, wounded, and taken. For all that, he never ceased laying about him and struggling to the last; and it was questioned if all the men there would have been able to have put the rope about his neck. They never would, without binding both his feet and hands, and neither of the pairs were very easily restrained.

They were dragging him away to a tree, when Habby Simpson, the landlord, arrived to the rescue, with a strong band of villagers, who drew up in front and opposed the assailants; and Habby told them that he would be security for the gentleman's appearance at any tribunal in the kingdom; but that before a stranger should be butchered in such a cowardly way, within his premises, he and his assistants would fight till the last drop of their blood. And, moreover, he requested them to remember, that men who appeared in masks were held as vagabonds, and that he and his friends were at liberty to shoot them all with perfect impunity.

"Why, but, honest Habby," said one, "ye perhaps dinna ken that this is the ruffian who murdered our young lady and Lucy Lumsdaine?"

"It is a lie, you scoundrel," cried the horse-dealer, with great indignation; "mine are the hands that never injured a woman, though I have risked my life often to save them. But mine is a tale that will not tell here. I appeal to your lady, and, backed by this mine host and his friends, I defy you."

The conspirators then insisted on taking him to the castle, but Habby Simpson would not trust him in their hands, but kept him, and became bound for him. The next day, David Dallas, the steward on the estate, came down to take the deposition; but the Englishman lost all patience at the accusation, and would do little else save curse and swear. He denied the murder of the virgins, with many horrid oaths, and proffered to produce them both alive if suffered to depart on his parole.

David replied, "That as for producing the virgins alive, after their murder had been confessed by his companion, with the rope about his neck,—after their bodies had both been found and buried, was what no Scottish judge would swallow; he doubted if even an English one would; and that it was natural for such a culprit to wish to be set at liberty; but for his part, he certainly knew of no man living who better deserved the gallows."

The Englishman then began an explanation, as well as his rage would let him; but his dialect was not quite intelligible to David Dallas, who could only smile at such a strange defence, the tenor of which was, that "he undertook the murder of the two young ladies to save them alive." The steward had no farther patience; so he ordered him to be manacled, conveyed to the castle, and chained in the dungeon. The Countess, after consulting with the steward and several others, entertained no doubt that this man was the murderer of her only daughter and Lucy. Indeed, as the evidence stood, it was impossible to believe otherwise. And it is therefore probable, that, before she left her country, she had resolved to give up the detested agent of a detested woman to popular vengeance, for shortly after, he was brought to the castle, at least in a few days, a great mob assembled and peremptorily demanded his life. So he was, as if by compulsion, given up to them, placed on a platform in front of the castle, the rope put about his neck, and a certain time allowed him to make a full confession. He began the same confused story about the Earl of Northumberland, and of his undertaking the murder of the two young ladies to save their lives; but his voice was often drowned by repeated hurrahs of derision. At length, as if driven to desperation, he began a hurraing louder than any of them, jumping on the platform as if gone mad, and shouting louder and louder, till, on looking around, they beheld a party coming up at full canter, their own young lady in front, and the young Lord Percy on her right, and Lucy on her left, who were now shouting out to save the brave fellow. The order was instantly obeyed; he was set at liberty, and, ere he left the platform, was invited to be the principal guest of the noble party in the castle.

So ends my tale; and it would perhaps be better to let it end here, without any explanation, as there is one circumstance, and one only, which I cannot explain. This brave Englishman's name was Henry Wilson. He had been for a number of years house-steward to the Earl of Northumberland, and heard daily that this great and royal heiress's name was a favourite theme with that ambitious family. On his lord's going up to court at London, Wilson was dismissed for some irregularities, which he took greatly to heart. And he being a man out of place, and probably a dissipated character, was applied to, among others, to make away with this dangerous heiress to two crowns. He agreed to it at once, promising, for a high reward, to be the principal agent, but determined, by some means or other, to save the young lady's life, as the sure means of ingratiating himself with his beloved and indulgent master. Fortune favoured him particularly on his gracious intent in the first instance; for, on the night when he had promised to bring the young lady, dead or alive, to his associates, there chanced to be the corpse of a French girl in the castle, newly dead and screwed in her coffin, and it was for her the new grave was made in the churchyard. That body he took to his associates, filling the coffin with rubbish; and the young lady he conveyed safe to Alnwick Castle. She being most anxious to have her foster-sister, Lucy, with her, and the latter proving a great stumbling-block to the new claimant, he undertook, on the promise of another reward, to make away with her also, and sink her in the loch beside her mistress. He so managed matters, that he received the reward, and deceived the villain a second time, conveying Lucy safe to her beloved mistress; but where he procured the second body that was sunk in the sack, is the only circumstance which I never heard explained. The presumptive heiress of two crowns was joyfully received, and most honourably treated by the Piercys, while young Lord Percy and she were privately betrothed to each other, while the indefatigable Henry Wilson was raised higher in his chief's favour than ever.

I must now add a suggestion of my own, of the certainty of which I have no doubt. It is, that the witch-wife was the Countess Dowager in deep disguise, remaining on the estate to watch and assist the progress of events. And I think, that in order to keep her people free of all blame or suspicion, that it was she who had engaged a sept of the McFarlanes to come down and cut off the intruding incendiary.

Now, although a small share of these incidents are traditionary, if any one suspects that the story is forged, out of malice to Queen Elizabeth, the greatest and vilest of her sex, let such turn to Lodge's Illustrations of British History, vol. ii. p. 123; ditto, vol. iii. p. 178; Pennant's London, p. 259; and see, also, Granger's Biographical History, and the Peerage of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 98, and State Trials, vol. i. p. 174, and such will be satisfied, that, had Elizabeth never been guilty of another act of cruelty during her long and illustrious reign, the treatment which that beautiful and accomplished lady received, was more than sufficient to have made the name of this sovereign to stink in the nostrils of all her sex, and every free subject of this empire.

LETTER FROM A LIBERAL WHIG.

TO CHRISTOPHER NORTH, ESQ.

SIR,—It is now several years since you honoured some lucubrations of mine with a place in your Magazine, under the designation (if I forget not, conferred by yourself) of "A Liberal Whig."

Times are since altered, and the terms "Whig" and "Tory" are now almost (as they ought to have been long since) forgotten, or lost in distinctions of more recent creation. Between the "Conservatives" and the "Radicals" of the present generation there exists a far wider difference, and of a far more vital character, than any that could have been fairly drawn between the professed principles, however at variance with each other, of their respective political ancestors. Yet, wide as is the apparent distance between them, it is found by experience not so great as to prevent their occasional coalition for the unworthy purpose of crushing, by their opposite and contending weights, those whose pride or whose misfortune it is to be placed between them. Among the number—I trust considerable enough for the purpose of self-preservation—of those who think with the latter class, I wish myself to be ranked; and, continuing of the same creed as that which I held when I formerly addressed you—a time, certainly, not more critical than the present—that a spirit of moderation and concession is alone capable of saving the country from a state of civil war, revolution, and anarchy, I cannot forbear entertaining the hope that you also may not be less disposed than you then were to make room in your Miscellany for the reflections of one, whom, though you may not always agree with him, you have flattered with the idea that you respect both his motives and his capacity.

The accompanying pages are chiefly devoted to the great subject of a Reform in Parliament—nor do they presume to offer any suggestions, either new or old, as to the shape which that measure is to assume, or the extent to which it is to be carried. Their object is the more humble one, of endeavouring to repress bootless alarms, and restrain wild and unreasonable expectations—to expose, at the same time, the wickedness of revolutionary agitators, and the madness of obstinate and uncompromising defenders.

The author is, at the same time, far from partaking in the absurd delusion, that Reform in Parliament is the only, or even the most important subject of political consideration; or that, when conceded to the utmost limits that any wise or moderate man can allow of its being carried, the discussion of those far greater points that remain behind will be assisted, or at all materially affected or influenced by it. Reform, or no Reform, the mighty and all-engrossing question of the actual relative condition and prosperity of the different classes of British society, is that which must and will be examined, and probed to the bottom; and if the suggestions of overweening Pride, or narrow Selfishness, are not alike removed from the consideration of it, dreadful indeed must be the consequence. The middle ranks, which form the largest and only healthy portion of that society, must be preserved and strengthened; and the immense, unnatural, and anti-Christian disparity between the worldly conditions of the highest and lowest greatly diminished, if we hope to escape the miserable alternative of all ranks and conditions being confounded together in one common ruin and subversion.

On this and other momentous points of actual politics, I may find occasion to intrude my speculations upon you hereafter: but at present I have only time to bring myself again to your recollection, by my old signature of METRODORUS.

NOTE.

[We were most happy to receive, again, a communication from our highly-esteemed correspondent, Metrodorus. Had it reached us in time, we should have given it a conspicuous place in our last Number. Before our present Number appears, the fate of the Three Bills will have been decided; but the opinions and sentiments expressed by this "Liberal Whig," will be read with interest, whatever may befall the measures now brought forward by his Majesty's Ministers. While it is needless for us to say that on some points, and those most important ones, we differ from him very essentially, still we feel assured that they are worthy the consideration of patriotic men of all parties.

C. N.]

CORRECTION, MELIORATION, REFORMATION, REVOLUTION.

Our present political condition is such as to demand some change. This is a proposition which nobody in his senses now ventures to deny. The nature and extent of the change demanded are the points upon which the only, and (it must be added) a very great, diversity of opinion exists; and, without attempting what is manifestly impossible, to reconcile such diversity, a well-wisher to the peace and prosperity of the country may nevertheless be not ill employed in endeavouring to bring men to some general understanding as to the use of those terms, which are necessary to the right expression of the opinions they respectively entertain. Much fallacy, much exaggeration, much animosity, much consequent mischief, may be avoided by such general understanding. Without it, men talk of they know not what, and listen to they know not what, and are liable to they know not what imputations or imputations from those who listen or talk to them.

Correction, Melioration, Reformation, Revolution. These four words will, it is apprehended, be found to comprehend the various forms and degrees of alteration which different persons propose, and in one or more of which all unite, since all admit that some alteration is necessary; and the first fallacy, or misunderstanding, which it seems desirable to prevent, is that which arises from the indiscriminate use of the word "Reform," as applied to each of these several modes of alteration. Now, if the word "Reform" is to be taken merely as synonymous with change, that is, with such change as would, in the opinion of the person using it, be an improvement of something already existing, there can be no objection to the word being so applied, provided all persons are agreed in so understanding it; and, in that case, we have only to distinguish the different degrees of Reform intended, by the use of some characteristic epithet, as moderate, radical, and so forth. But if the word "Reform" be understood more strictly, as meaning reformation, in its only proper sense, that of re-edification, re-construction, then a great proportion of those who now call themselves, and are (either in praise or reproach) called by others, "Reformers," will be found to have no right to the distinction; since, in the sense now spoken of, all alteration (even for the better) is not Reform, any more than (in justice it must be added) Reform is necessarily Revolution. To reform, in the sense now spoken of, implies that there is something which has been, or must be, previously subverted. To correct, implies only that there are certain existing defects which require to be removed—to meliorate or improve, only that there are some existing materials which may be rendered more useful—but to reform, implies that in the very original frame of constitution of that which it is sought to reform, there are defects too deeply seated, too radically inherent, to be removed, without the previous destruction of that something to which they are attached, or that the materials of which that something is composed, are so essentially bad as to be incapable of any improvement, or at least of such improvement as is judged to be necessary. Now, even in this sense, as has been already observed, and (to avoid misunderstanding) it is as well to repeat, reform is not necessarily revolution; and, to comprehend what is meant by this last proposition, it becomes requisite to settle what is, or ought to be, meant by the word "Revolution."

Now, in a physical or a moral sense, we, and all the rest of mankind, may be said not only to be constantly liable to revolution, but to be constantly undergoing the actual process. The earth and all its inhabitants are perpetually revolving on the earth's axis. The individual of to-day, is neither physically nor morally the individual of yesterday. He is not the same individual for an hour together. And the same may be said of the laws and constitution—the political essence—of every nation or society. To ascribe immutability, or even permanence, to any thing whatever of human origin, is (as we shall find occasion to repeat) a mere perversion of language.

Nevertheless, for the sake of dis-

inction, it is fit that some precise meaning should be attached to the word "revolution," when used in a political sense, as something different from, and more extensive than, any of the other forms of change to which human institutions are thus constantly liable. Revolution then, in this its more peculiar sense, may be said to denote a total change in the fundamental laws and institutions of a nation; an alteration of the acknowledged form, or virtual and essential character of its government; as, from an absolute to a limited monarchy, from a limited monarchy to a republic; or again, from despotism to oligarchy or aristocracy, and from either of these to democracy, or vice versa. Keeping this definition in view, the several changes, or many of them, through which the French nation passed, between the periods of the first meeting of the States-General, and the recall of the Bourbons, might each, with propriety, be marked as a distinct revolution. So the establishment of our English Commonwealth, after the death of Charles I., and so also the Restoration of Charles II., were each of them revolutions in the sense of the term now insisted on. Our Revolution (commonly so called) of 1688, and the memorable event which took place at Paris last July, to which the same appellation has also been given, would be improperly classed under that term, unless by assuming that by a succession of arbitrary acts in England, and by the promulgation of the fatal ordinances in France, the form of government in each country had been already previously changed from that of a limited to an absolute monarchy—which change was in itself a revolution, of however short a duration—and then the subsequent changes, to which only the term is usually given, would, with reference to what had already taken place, be more fitly designated as counter-revolutions respectively. A mere change of dynasty, in the person or family of the reigning sovereign, is not to be characterised as a revolution, unless accompanied by a change in the very frame of the government itself. Nor ought every change, even in the frame of the government, to be so designated, but only such as go to the extent of fundamental subversion and reconstruction. And thus the difference between Reform and Revolution, in the restricted sense, which it is now sought to assign to them respectively, consists mainly in this—that the former term is applicable to the process of subversion and reconstruction of certain parts of the political machine, the other to that of the machine itself, or of its chief component parts, together with that which forms the very principle or bond of union betwixt them.

If this definition be admitted, it should seem to follow that the only changes to which the state of Great Britain is liable, and to which the term revolution can properly be applied, are (as to its form of government) to an absolute monarchy on the one hand, or to a republic on the other: and (as to the fundamental nature of its constitution) from its present mixed character to that of pure despotism, or pure democracy—a pure aristocracy being a phantom of the imagination which can never have any actual existence, and aristocracy itself only an ingredient, by the greater or less admixture of which the power of the sovereign or of the people, or of both, may be more or less tempered, and changed from a pure or perfect, to a mixed or imperfect state of political essence.

To apply these remarks to the present state of society in this country.—It may be safely assumed that there is no political party existing, which has for its object, either avowed or real, such a revolution as consists in the establishment of an absolute monarchy or despotism, in place of our present institutions. The only object of a revolutionary party, (in the sense now attached to the word,) supposing any such to exist, must therefore be the establishment of a republic; and here it must be observed, in the first place, that there is a wide and most important difference between the entertainment of a mere abstract notion or opinion in favour of a republican as the best form of government, theoretically considered, and a design, or even an inclination, to substitute it in the room of that form of government which we now enjoy, taking into account the hazard of ultimate failure, the risk of establishing despotism instead of it, and the certainty of an intermediate state of disorganization, bloodshed, anarchy, and general misery, which must be passed through in order to the attainment of it. Those, therefore, who, preferring a republican form of government in the abstract, would yet scruple the means necessary to acquire it, are on no account to be set down as revolutionists, to whatever extent their views may carry them in the secondary light of reformers. Those, on the other hand, who, whatever may be their own opinions or ultimate object, yet, having the power and means of persuasion, urge on the ignorant and unthinking to acts of violence, depredation, and blood-guiltiness, by false or exaggerated statements of the evils of their present condition, and of the benefits to be derived to them from such a change as would be nothing less than a revolution, are themselves revolutionists in the truest, as well as by far the worst, sense of the term; and it is most devoutly to be prayed for by all well-wishers to society, that such men as these, while they are instigating their poor deluded victims to the commission of revolutionary outrage and insurrection, under the assurance that “the passage will be sharp but short” to the possession of that full beatitude which they hold out to them as the end of the struggle, are, in fact, digging for themselves a pitfall, into which they will, sooner or later, be plunged, amidst the loud and general execrations of those whose ruin they are thus attempting. With persons of this most unhappy description there is no reasoning. They are public enemies and delinquents of the highest order, and must be treated accordingly. But to those who, though guiltless as to intention of the black infamy of such horrible designs, are, nevertheless, through ignorance or disregard of consequences, exposed to the danger of weakly countenancing, or rashly participating in them, a few reflections may not inaptly be presented, with a view of inducing them to pause on the brink of the precipice, and to retrace their steps, if convinced of the folly of venturing farther.

And, first, as to this vision of a republic, by the excessive brightness of which their eyes are so dazzled as to make them blink the abyss which most certainly lies between them and the attainment of it, suppose the abyss overleapt, and the vision within their grasp—what have they gained in the shape either of national virtue, happiness or prosperity—the only substantial and general good to be hoped for from any political change whatever?—Greater equality in the distribution of wealth?—Greater facility in the pursuit of it?—A wider extension of political power and influence?—A more just appreciation, a more liberal remuneration, of talent?—More effectual security to property?—Greater impartiality in the administration of justice? Let them consider whether all these objects are not, in some degree at least, attainable at a cheaper rate of exchange than that which they meditate; and next, whether or not, in at least as great a degree as can be reasonably hoped for, even from payment of the price which they would offer for it. Let them consider whether a republican form of government, however excellent in theory, is one which is at all suited to the present state and condition of British society;—whether it is easy, or even possible, to effect such a change in that condition as would render it at all better suited to the same object;—whether, on the contrary, that condition is not such that, supposing a republic to be established to-day, it would stand a very good chance of being converted into an oligarchy or a military despotism to-morrow? If, in pursuing these reflections, they should condescend to admit the light of historical experience for their guide, the result is too evident—if that of political sagacity and foreknowledge, that result will still be the same, and the conclusion this—that a republican form of government is not adapted to the state of society in which we live, and consequently that, if established, it would have no chance whatever of permanence. Once more, to avert the possibility of misunderstanding, from the use of ambiguous language, let it be observed that, in speaking of a republican form of government, what is here meant is a democracy, on the broadest basis that can be imagined to be practicable—take, for example, the most popular of the United States of America for a model, and ingraft upon it any improvements that may be suggested for the sake of augmenting its popularity. It is now conceived, at least, that those who preach revolution to the subjects of Great Britain can have nothing short of this in their contemplation—this they must mean, if they mean any thing that is at all precise or definite. This, in short, or nothing but a mere word, is their boasted “greatest possible happiness” principle. Now, having said that the “greatest possible happiness,” as applied to a community, is a term of relative signification, depending on the actual constitution and habits of the community to which it is meant to apply it; and that, in this sense, the example of America is nothing to Great Britain, because we cannot imagine two conditions of society more widely different from each other than that of any one of the States composing the American Union at the time of the declaration of independence from that of Great Britain, either then or now—that (to say no more) there is between them this one important difference—that of the founders of American liberty having only had to create, whereas the would-be fathers of a British Republic must begin by destroying—having said thus much as to the project of a republic in the abstract, let us leave the question of its expediency or suitability to the peculiar circumstances of this country, and turn to that of its practicability. And here let it be remembered, that we are addressing ourselves to those who, though partisans of the abstract principle, would shrink from the horrors of the middle passage—that “sharp but short passage,” called anarchy, through which some of their guides are now honest enough to confess they may have to struggle to the attainment of it. Now, considering the amount of the sacrifices which must be required in order to the establishment of a democratical form of government in Great Britain, and which are no less than the previous demolition, not of the monarchy only, and its various ramifications and dependencies, but of the vast actual bulk of aristocratical wealth and privileges by which it is supported, who but a madman can so much as dream of the possibility of accomplishing such a transition without such a previous struggle?—and who (to push the argument one step farther)—who, that is not worse than a madman, will presume to assure the ignorant and unthinking, that the passage will be a “short” one, or that it will, with any degree of certainty, lead to the end contemplated?

Reform is not necessarily revolution.—This we have said and again repeat—the distinction cannot be too constantly kept in mind. But in the mouths of these humane assertors of the “sharp but short” horrors of the middle passage, they not only do mean the same thing, but, by the mode of reasoning employed in speaking of them, it is frequently rendered no easy task again to disunite them. “Popularize the government,” say they; “reform the representation on the broadest basis; and”—what then? why, then—“the people will be patient, or the mass of the people will rally round a constitution, whose frame is co-extensive with themselves, and whose vitals are organic of their wisdom and virtue.” Precious jargon, this, to be sure—and such as would have been well suited to the wildest days of French Jacobinism. To hear them uttered makes one for the moment imagine that the darkness of the middle passage, if not its accompanying horrors, has begun already—that the floodgates are already open, and the revolutionary torrent ready to burst in upon and overwhelm us. But let not these self-sufficient gentlemen deceive themselves, while they attempt to frighten others—let them not pride and bully themselves into imagining that such a state of things has actually arrived, as that, with the apprehension of which they seek to disturb the weak and drivelling aristocracy—those “thoughtless creatures,” who now look with such placid indifference at the cloud that is gathering round them, “black as their hearts, or dense as their stupidity!” The floodgates are opened certainly—but they are those only (Heaven be thanked!) of noise and nonsense, such as these good gentlemen are now self-convicted of being in the habit of uttering in their own chosen conclaves, but which, if they think to palm on the world at large as the sense of the people of England, or of any portion of that people worthy the name of a party, they only evince that their knowledge of the present state of society—their acquaintance with human nature in general—is about upon a level with their skill in the first rudiments of moral and political philosophy.

Neither is the British aristocracy—that “infatuated,” “domineering,” “blind,” “proud,” “selfish,” “timid,” “black-hearted,” “densely stupid,” part of the nation—that class of “tated people,” “admirer fools,” “stricken with mental blindness,” “thoughtless creatures who have no perceptions that ever extend beyond an effect,” “a degree only more decent than Nero,” (we select only a few of the more polite and appropriate epithets employed to designate it in about six or eight pages of an article in the last Westminster Review, already referred to.)—neither, we say, is the British aristocracy ready to concede to these modest reformers the boon so reasonably demanded—nor are they, (the reformers,) whatever they may pretend or fancy, in a situation to enforce the demand. The aristocracy will neither surrender its rights and privileges—its wealth and power—its “accursed domination”—without a struggle—nor are its opponents able to compel such surrender, either with or without one. If the question must be tried upon this issue, we are prepared for it—but we trust that the real and inherent good sense and virtue of the country will avert the trial—for bloody and fearful (we are ready to admit) it would be, although to be followed (as we are sure) by a result widely different from that which these good people anticipate.

There is one short passage in the article of the Review already so often referred to, which for its unsuspecting truth and simplicity, is worth all the falsehood androdomontade of the remainder—or, rather, as a set-off, will afford more than an equipoise against all the rest of its mischievous absurdity. It is that in which the writer, evidently writhing under the disappointment of his hopes to have witnessed a general insurrection of the manufacturing districts, attributes the failure to the accidental misfortune of the labourers, from whom so much was expected, having had at the time “full employment.”—“Had work failed,” he says, “when the peasantry were breaking out into tumult,”—how unlucky that it did not fail!—“who that knows the materials for combustion, can fail to tremble at the bare thought of what would have been the consequence?” So, then, that a supply of work at this critical period did not fail the peasantry, is the cause that those “who know the materials for combustion,” did fail to tremble. This, it must be admitted, is prettily expressed—but, not to waste time in admiring the mere beauties of expression, let us attend to what follows—“It has so happened, by a most curious dispensation, that the very example that has fired the minds of the manufacturing population, has, through its effects, stayed their action. The troubles of France and Belgium have thrown them out of the European market. England has had a great proportion of their orders, and our manufacturers have been sufficiently, if not amply, employed. The activity of their hands has checked the impulses of their minds, but the spring will not lose its force because it is pent.”

What is precisely intended by the metaphor of a spring not losing its force because it is pent, as applied to the present position of the manufacturing classes, need not be asked too curiously, because the real merit of the passage consists in the previous confession. So, then, it seems, the oppressed, tortured, enslaved, but brave and indignant mass of the British populace is by no means inclined to perform the virtuous action of rising against their blind and stupid rulers, and hurling them to the earth, unless under the influence of immediate distress and starvation. We fully believe it; and we fully believe, also, that that unlucky absence of immediate distress and starvation, to which alone the writer ascribes it that we are not already revolutionized (or popularized, as his phrase is) to his heart's content, and to which he affixes the term “curious dispensation,” is, in fact, nothing more or less than the ordinary course of events, under the administration of the Divine Providence, acting on general principles, without reference to the partial or distorted views of things which are sometimes taken by short-sighted mortals, and more especially so when under the influence of some prevailing passion or prejudice. The Manchester manufacturers, though excited, no doubt, by the contagious examples of France and Belgium, are nevertheless quiet, because they are not distressed; and the reason why they are not distressed, is that the manufacturers of France and Belgium are distressed—that, too, in consequence of the very events which have excited the enthusiasm of our manufacturers, who, but for the unlucky circumstance that they are not in distress, would ere now (so says, at least, this exquisite reasoner) have broken out into open rebellion. But is it not always thus? When has there been, in the history of the world, or when will there be, a period that distress has not somewhere existed, or will not always somewhere exist? or that distress, where it exists, is not attended by discontent? or that discontent, unless repressed by some principle of counteraction, does not break out into overt acts of tumult or of rebellion? But the merit of the confession is this, that the people are not to be so excited except by actual distress, and by distress only. No! The harangues of Mr Cobbett—the ravings of the Westminster Reviewer—all will not do. They may, indeed, occasion some Swing letters, some mischievous and criminal burnings, some riots, and a few executions; but, all they can do, they cannot stir up a rebellion, still less bring about a revolution, unless they have distress—not partial and occasional only—not such only as has existed ever since the world began, and will probably never cease to exist so long as the world endures—but deep, general, lasting distress, and such as is irremovable, except by means of some convulsion as great and general as itself. It is to a state of distress like this, and to nothing less, that they look for the success of their hopes and machinations; and they imagine that they go some way towards the accomplishment, by falsely representing that it exists, and, still more falsely, that it is caused by the present form of government and the vices of its administration. On such gross misstatement and perversion of facts do they rely as their only chance of victory; and by the frequent and full exposure of their egregious fallacies we may best hope to defeat them.

England, to the utter dismay and discomfiture of these admirers of "sharp but short passages," is not prepared to follow the examples of France and Belgium. Why? Because their cases are wholly dissimilar—because what was right or pardonable in the latter instances would be not barely wrong, but even monstrous, in the former. The late revolution (if so it may be called) in France, was necessitated by the previous attempt at revolution on the part of the government. Its aim was to preserve, not to overthrow the constitution by law established. That of Belgium was an insurrection to shake off a foreign yoke, imposed, not in right of conquest, (a position which generally commands respect, even if it does not ensure obedience,) but at the mere arbitrary will of a congress of states, self-empowered to regulate the future destinies of Europe. In both cases, the price paid for the assertion even of justice has been, and continues to be, enormous—besides the blood spilt, and the immediate misery inflicted, the consequent loss (as we have already seen) of commercial credit, the pressure of manufacturing distress, and (above all) the unsettled state of the government, and the dread of further convulsion. Now, what is there in our political condition or circumstances to call for, or justify, the incurring of similar penalties? We cannot complain of national independence invaded, of public liberty infringed, or of a constitution trampled upon and violated. It may be fit and reasonable that some additional privileges be conceded, some fresh securities provided; but we have the means and the prospect of obtaining them legally and peaceably, without resistance or bloodshed, without anarchy, and without revolution.

But it may be answered that all this is gratuitously to impute revolutionary projects to those who are preaching nothing more than reform. We deny the truth of this answer, and appeal to the language already quoted, which, we contend, is the language of revolution, and nothing else. A reform ushered in by the false vituperation of all existing authorities, and avowedly to be founded on their demolition, is nothing else but a revolution, and to be brought about at no expense short of anarchy and destruction. The downfall of the aristocracy is the thing called for; and, to justify the call, every false accusation that malevolence can invent, and ignorance swallow, is heaped on the head of the devoted order. "Popularize the government—reform the representation on the broadest basis." If this be not revolution, there is no meaning in language. Yet even then we are told, that, in so doing, we shall but "show the beginning of a better order of things—the commencement of a curative process." That is, to cure a diseased limb, begin with amputation—a right recipe in extreme cases—but the people of England will perhaps even yet be satisfied to try a milder regimen.

That we labour under abuses that require to be corrected, defects in the constitution which require to be supplied, and imperfections to be amended, nobody now pretends to doubt; but "the curative process" as to many of these matters has already begun, and, as to others, only requires to be clearly pointed out, in order to its commencement, nobody but a revolutionist, in the garb of reformer, will affect to deny. The venerable fabric of our laws has already undergone considerable repairs and alterations to render it more suitable to the exigencies of modern use. Much more still requires to be done, in order to make it as cheap and easily accessible to the mass of the community as the mass of the community has a right to expect, but that more is in a fair train of accomplishment, and needs not a revolutionary impulse to accelerate its progress. The government expenditure has already been greatly reduced, and there is no apparent indisposition to be charged to the account, either of the present or of the late Ministry, to reduce it still further within the narrowest limits that are consistent with the national honour and dignity. The true principles of political economy are even now, perhaps, but just beginning to be developed; but, so far as they are comprehended, there appears no indisposition to act upon them; on the contrary, it seems as if there were greater danger of reducing them to action before their consequences have been sufficiently weighed and ascertained. Whatever may be said of the selfishness of the aristocracy, there is no want of alacrity on their part to concur in, or even to originate, measures seemingly at variance with their interests—we say seemingly, because, in point of fact, there is no such thing as a separate interest in any branch of a community. What is most for the benefit of the whole body, is most for the benefit of every one of its members: and this truth is now generally acknowledged, and, wherever its application is clearly demonstrated, put in practice. What is now asserted of the aristocracy, applies, with perhaps even greater force, to the clergy, whose acts of charity, patience, and self-denial, under the flagrant attacks of unjust accusation and extortion that have lately been practised against them, is deserving of praise only not less exalted than that which the generally exemplary tenor of their lives and conduct demands.

This is not all, however. The temper and spirit of the times—the circumstances of the world at large—and the example of the more immediately surrounding nations—are such as to demand, not the correction and amendment only, but also the reformation (in the true sense of the term already noticed) of some of our existing establishments. A legislative assembly, based on the system of real, and not what is called virtual, representation, may now be considered as the indispensable requisite of a country pretending to free institutions; and England has too long held the first rank among nations in respect of liberty, to be content with a secondary place in the list, and to be kept without the enjoyment of that which constitutes the leading article of every constitutional charter. In order to the possession of this essential requisite, it is necessary that some existing rights and privileges be previously abolished—and this necessity it is which gives to the measure in question a character beyond that of mere correction and amendment, and entitles it specifically to the name of reform. That somewhat more of the popular ingredient may safely be admitted into the representation thus reformed, it is not meant to deny; but, at the same time, the aristocracy must have preserved to it the full share of influence to which it is fairly and constitutionally entitled; or it is revolution, not reform, that is conceded, and a republic that is introduced, in the disguise of a popularized monarchy.

A reform, such as has been now said to be actually wanted, there is no doubt as to the intention of the present government to concede. The only possible obstruction to such a concession, will arise from the vain attempts of a revolutionary party to obtain by force, more than the country at large is prepared either to demand or receive.

Rave as wildly as they may—talk as much at random as they will, about “the aristocracy having had their long and disastrous day, and its now being the time of the Demos,” the organs of that party will probably not obtain any one of those nostrums which they so loudly proclaim to be indispensable. They will not obtain universal suffrage; but they may expect, and will (unless the opportunity is lost by their own fault) doubtless receive as wide an extension of the elective franchise as is compatible with the exclusion of that portion of the community which, from the circumstances of age, sex, or humble condition, it is fit to presume, generally speaking, is incapable of exercising a sound and independent discretion in the choice of a representative. They will not obtain annual parliaments, nor any renewal of them so frequent as to be judged inconsistent with the great object of regularity and stability in the operations of government. They will probably not obtain that most highly wanted of all expedients, election by ballot; because it may not be thought necessary or advisable to restrict the free and open intercourse between the elector and the candidate; to destroy the honest and manly confidence of each in the other; to lessen the fair influence of rank, property, and intelligence; or to substitute in its place the ascendancy of a hireling press, or of seditious demagogues. But, in the room of these dangerous, or, at best, doubtful expedients, they will gain wholesome laws for the lessening of the wasteful and demoralizing expense, and mischievously protracted time of elections, for the eradication of bribery, and the prevention of undue interference; and they will gain (what is of more importance than all the rest) the practical recognition of the great principle of reform, which, when once established, may be gradually extended, with safety, to objects beyond the limits within which it is thought expedient at first to confine it. If, in consequence of their refusing to be satisfied with concessions such as these, and pertinaciously insisting on more, the government should be forced to retract, and the nation frustrated of its now sanguine expectations, on their heads be the consequence. Let it be civil war or rebellion, it will be of their raising, and the precious fruits will also be theirs—short-lived, it is confidently hoped that it may prove, but to meet with a far different termination from that which they pretend to anticipate; alike fatal, perhaps, to the expectations now formed by good men, but not equally destructive of the reputation and dignity of Great Britain, or of her rank in the scale of nations.

Not to part, however, without a few words of remonstrance to the upholders of what has been absurdly, and by a fatal misnomer, styled "the conservative system"—that, namely, which stands self-opposed to the demands made by the loud voice of the age, in a tone which it is madness to defy, and the excess of imbecility to pretend to turn a deaf ear to. Let these grave and hardy assertors of impossibilities hold themselves out as long as they please, to the admiration of one another, as being

"The only faithful found

Among the faithless,"

they still require to be taught what every child learns in his first lesson, whether of religion or morals, that it is not for weak creatures like men to talk of the immutability of any human affairs, however at one time happy or prosperous—that it is in vain to struggle with the tide of Time—and that it is the part of a wise man to watch the course of events—and to cease from resistance as soon as, by the sure prognostics derived from experience, he perceives that to resist would be to risk the occurrence of evils greater than any that can be produced by timely and prudent concession.

Presumptuous was the wish so patriotically conceived, and so repeatedly extolled, of that pious churchman, who exclaimed, with reference to the constitution of his native country, now no more existing as an Independent state, "Esto perpetua!" The ancients, indeed, to secure what might be humanly termed a perpetuity to their laws and edicts, had them graven on brass. But what is the perpetuity even of brass itself, when opposed to the irresistible advance of Time? Even in the very infancy of the world, this question might have been answered, as it was, some few thousand years after its creation, by Old Simonides:

"Who said

—uph. —

What the Lydian sage* has told?

Who will dare

To compare

Works of man, that fleeting are,

With the smooth perennial flow

Of swift rivers, or the glow

Of the eternal sun, or light

Of the golden orb of night?

Spring renews

The floweret's hue;

With his sweet refreshing dew;

Ocean wide

Bids his tide

With returning current glide

The sculptured tomb is but a toy

Man may fashion, man destroy—

Eternity in stone or brass?

Tis, go! who said it was an ass."

SINGULAR PASSAGE IN THE LIFE OF THE LATE HENRY HARRIS, DOCTOR IN DIVINITY.

COMMUNICATED BY THE REV. T. S., HIS FRIEND AND EXECUTOR.

IN order that the extraordinary circumstance which I am about to relate, may meet with the credit it deserves, I think it necessary to premise, that my reverend friend, among whose papers I find it recorded, was, in his lifetime, ever esteemed as a man of good plain understanding, strict veracity, and unimpeached morals—by no means of a nervous temperament, or one likely to assign undue weight to any occurrence out of the common course of events, merely because his reflections might not, at the moment, afford him a ready solution of its difficulties. On the truth of his narrative, as far as he was personally concerned, no one who knew him would hesitate to place the most implicit reliance. His history is briefly this:—He had married early in life, and was a widower at the age of thirty-nine, with an only daughter, who had then arrived at puberty, and was just married to a near connexion of my own. The sudden death of her husband, occasioned by a fall from his horse, only three days after her confinement, was abruptly communicated to Mrs S— by a thoughtless girl, who saw her master brought lifeless into the house, and, with all that inexplicable anxiety to be the first to tell bad news, so common among the lower orders, rushed at once into the sick-room with her intelligence. The shock was too severe; and, though the young widow survived the fatal event several months, yet she gradually sunk under the blow, and expired, leaving a boy, not a twelve-month old, to the care of his maternal grandfather. My poor friend was sadly shaken by this melancholy catastrophe; time, however, and a strong religious feeling, succeeded at length in moderating the poignancy of his grief—a consummation much advanced by his infant charge, who now succeeded, as it were by inheritance, to the place in his affections left vacant by his daughter's decease. Frederick S— grew up to be a fine lad; his person and features were decidedly handsome, still there was, as I remember, an unpleasant expression in his countenance, and an air of reserve, attributed, by the few persons who called occasionally at the vicarage, to the retired life led by his grandfather, and the little opportunity he had, in consequence, of mixing in the society of his equals in age and intellect. Brought up entirely at home, his progress in the common branches of education was, without any great display of precocity, rather in advance of the generality of boys of his own standing; partly owing, perhaps, to the turn which even his amusements took from the first. His sole associate was the son of the village apothecary, a boy about two years older than himself, whose father, being really clever in his profession, and a good operative chemist, had constructed for himself a small laboratory, in which, as he was fond of children, the two boys spent a great portion of their leisure time, witnessing many of those little experiments so attractive to youth, and in time aspiring to imitate what they admired.

In such society, it is not surprising that Frederick S— should imbibe a strong taste for the science which formed his principal amusement; or that, when, in process of time, it became necessary to choose his walk in life, a profession so intimately connected with his favourite pursuit, as that of medicine, should be eagerly selected. No opposition was offered by my friend, who, knowing that the greater part of his own income would expire with his life, and that the remainder would prove an insufficient resource to his grandchild, was only anxious that he should follow such a path as should secure him that moderate and respectable competency which is, perhaps, more conducive to real happiness than a more elevated or wealthy station. Frederick was, accordingly, at the proper age, matriculated at Oxford, with the view of studying the higher branches of medicine, a few months after his friend, John W—, had proceeded to Leyden, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the practice of surgery, in the hospitals and lecture-rooms attached to that university. The boyish intimacy of their younger days did not, as is frequently the case, yield to separation; on the contrary, a close correspondence was kept up between them. Dr Harris was even prevailed upon to allow Frederick to take a trip to Holland to see his friend; and John returned the visit to Frederick at Oxford. Satisfactory as, for some time, were the accounts of the general course of Frederick S—'s studies, by degrees rumours of a less pleasant nature reached the ears of some of his friends; to the vicarage, however, I have reason to believe, they never penetrated. The good old Doctor was too well beloved in the parish for any one voluntarily to give him pain; and, after all, nothing beyond whispers and surmises had reached X—, when the worthy vicar was surprised, on a sudden, by a request from his grandchild, that he might be permitted to take his name off the books of the university, and proceed to finish his education in conjunction with his friend W— at Leyden. Such a proposal, made, too, at a time when the period for his graduating could not be far distant, both surprised and grieved the Doctor: he combated the design with more perseverance than he had ever been known to exert in opposition to any declared wish of his darling boy before, but, as usual, gave way when more strongly pressed, from sheer inability to persist in a refusal which seemed to give so much pain to Frederick, especially when the latter, with more energy than was quite becoming their relative situations, expressed his positive determination of not returning to Oxford, whatever might be the result of his grandfather's decision. My friend, his mind perhaps a little weakened by a short, but severe nervous attack, which he had scarcely recovered from, at length yielded a reluctant consent, and Frederick quitted England. It was not, till some months had elapsed after his departure, that I had reason to suspect, that the eager desire of availing himself of opportunities for study abroad, not afforded him at home, was not the sole, or even the principal, reason which had drawn Frederick so abruptly from his Alma Mater. A chance visit to the university, and a conversation with a senior fellow belonging to his late college, convinced me of this; still I found it impossible to extract from the latter the precise nature of his offence. That he had given way to most culpable indulgences, I had before heard hinted; and, when I recollected, how he had been at once launched from a state of what might be well called seclusion, into a world where so many enticements were lying in wait to allure, with liberty, example, every thing, to tempt him from the straight road, regret, I frankly own, was more the predominant feeling in my mind than either surprise or condemnation. But here was evidently something more than mere ordinary excess—some act of profligacy, perhaps of a deeper stain, which had induced his superiors, who, at first, had been loud in his praises, to desire him to withdraw himself quietly, but for ever; and such an intimation, I found, had, in fact, been conveyed to him, from an authority which it was impossible to resist. Seeing that my informant was determined not to be explicit, I did not press for a disclosure which, if made, would, in all probability, only have given me pain, and that the rather, as my old friend the Doctor had recently obtained a valuable living from Lord M—, only a few miles distant from the market-town in which I resided, where he now was, amusing himself in putting his grounds into order, ornamenting his house, and getting every thing ready against his grandson's expected visit in the following autumn. October came, and with it came Frederick: he rode over more than once to see me, sometimes accompanied by the Doctor, between whom and myself a recent domestic loss on my part had drawn the chords of sympathy still closer.

More than two years had flown on in this way, in which Frederick S— had as many times made temporary visits to his native country. The time was fast approaching when he was expected to return, and finally take up his residence in England, when the sudden illness of a near relative obliged me to take a journey into Lancashire, my old friend, who had himself a curate, kindly offering to take up his quarters at my parsonage, and superintend the concerns of my parish till my return. Alas! when I saw him next, he was on the bed of death.

My absence was necessarily prolonged much beyond what I had anticipated. A letter, with a foreign postmark, had, I afterwards found, been brought over from his own house to my venerable substitute in the interval, and, barely giving himself time to transfer the charge he had undertaken to a neighbouring clergyman, he had hurried off at once to Leyden. His arrival there was, however, too late. Frederick was dead, killed in a duel, occasioned, it was said, by no ordinary provocation on his part, although the flight of his antagonist had added to the mystery which enveloped its origin. The long journey, its melancholy termination, and the complete overthrow of all my poor friend's earthly hopes, were too much for him. He appeared, too—as I was informed by the proprietor of the house in which I found him, when his summons at length had brought me to his bedside—to have received some sudden and unaccountable shock, which even the death of his grandson was inadequate to explain. There was, indeed, a wildness in his fast-glazing eye, which mingled strangely with the glance of satisfaction thrown upon me as he pressed my hand; he endeavoured to raise himself, and would have spoken, but fell back in the effort, and closed his eyes for ever. I buried him there, by the side of the object of his more than parental affection, in a foreign land.

It is from the papers that I discovered in his travelling-case that I submit the following extracts, without, however, presuming to advance an opinion on the strange circumstances which they detail, or even as to the connexion which some may fancy they discover between different parts of them.

The first was evidently written at my own house, and bears date August the 15th, 18—, about three weeks after my own departure for Preston.

It begins thus—

“Tuesday, August 15.—Poor girl! I forget who it is that says, ‘the real ills of life are light in comparison with fancied evils;’ and certainly the scene I have just witnessed goes some way towards establishing the truth of the hypothesis. Among the afflictions which flesh is heir to, a diseased imagination is far from being the lightest, even when considered separately, and without taking into the account those bodily pains and sufferings which, so close is the connexion between mind and matter, are but too frequently attendant upon any disorder of the fancy. Seldom has my interest been more powerfully excited than by poor Mary G—. Her age, her appearance, her pale, melancholy features, the very contour of her countenance, all conspired to remind me, but too forcibly, of one who, waking or sleeping, is never long absent from my thoughts—but enough of this.

“A fine morning had succeeded one of the most tempestuous nights I ever remember, and I was just sitting down to a substantial breakfast, which the care of my friend S—’s housekeeper, kind-hearted Madam Janet, had prepared for me, when I was interrupted by a summons to the sick-bed of a young parishioner whom I had frequently seen in my walks, and had remarked for the regularity of her attendance at divine worship. Mary G— is the elder of two daughters, residing with their mother, the widow of an attorney, who, dying suddenly in the prime of life, left his family but slenderly provided for. A strict though not parsimonious economy has, however, enabled them to live with an appearance of respectability and comfort; and from the personal attractions which both the girls possess, their mother is evidently not without hopes of seeing one at least of them advantageously settled in life. As far as poor Mary is concerned, I fear she is doomed to inevitable disappointment, as I am much mistaken if consumption has not laid its wasting finger upon her; while this last recurrence, of what I cannot but believe to be a most formidable epileptic attack, threatens to shake out, with even added velocity, the little sand that may yet remain within the hour-glass of time. Her very delusion, too, is of such a nature as, by adding to bodily illness the agitation of superstitious terror, can scarcely fail to accelerate the catastrophe, which I think I see fast approaching.

Before I was introduced into the sick-room, her sister, who had been watching my arrival from the window, took me into their little parlour, and, after the usual civilities, began to prepare me for the visit I was about to pay. Her countenance was marked at once with trouble and alarm, and in a low tone of voice, which some internal emotion, rather than the fear of disturbing the invalid in a distant room, had subdued almost to a whisper, informed me that my presence was become necessary, not more as a clergyman than a magistrate; that the disorder with which her sister had, during the night, been so suddenly and unaccountably seized, was one of no common kind, but attended with circumstances which, coupled with the declarations of the sufferer, took it out of all ordinary calculations, and, to use her own expression, that 'malice was at the bottom of it.' Naturally supposing that these insinuations were intended to intimidate the partaking of some deleterious substance on the part of the invalid, I enquired what reason she had for supposing, in the first place, that anything of a poisonous nature had been administered at all; and, secondly, what possible incitement any human being could have for the perpetration of so foul a deed towards so innocent and unoffending an individual? Her answer considerably relieved the apprehensions I had begun to entertain lest the poor girl should, from some unknown cause, have herself been attempting to rush uncalled into the presence of her Creator; at the same time, it surprised me not a little by its apparent want of rationality and common sense. She had no reason to believe, she said, that her sister had taken poison, or that any attempt upon her life had been made, or was, perhaps, contemplated, but that 'still malice was at work,' the malice of villains or fiends, or of both combined; that no cause purely natural would suffice to account for the state in which her sister had been now twice placed, or for the dreadful sufferings she had undergone while in that state, and that she was determined the whole affair should undergo a thorough investigation. Seeing that the poor girl was now herself labouring under a great degree of excitement, I did not think it necessary to enter at that moment into a discussion upon the absurdity of her opinion, but applied myself to the tranquillizing her mind by assurances of a proper enquiry, and then drew her attention to the symptoms of the indisposition, and the way in which it had first made its appearance.

"The violence of the storm last night had, I found, induced the whole of the family to sit up far beyond their usual hour, till, wearied out at length, and, as their mother observed, 'tired of burning fire and candle to no purpose,' they retired to their several chambers. The sisters occupied the same room; Elizabeth was already at their humble toilet, and had commenced the arrangement of her hair for the night, when her attention was at once drawn from her employment, by a half smothered shriek and exclamation from her sister, who, in her delicate state of health, had found waking up two flights of stairs, perhaps a little more quickly than usual, an exertion, to recover from which she had seated herself in a large arm-chair. Turning hastily at the sound, she perceived Mary deadly pale, grasping, as it were convulsively, each arm of the chair which supported her, and bending forward in the attitude of listening: her lips were trembling and bloodless, cold drops of perspiration stood upon her forehead, and in an instant after, exclaiming in a piercing tone, 'Hark! they are calling me again! it is—it is the same voice! Oh no! no!—Oh my God! save me, Betsey,—hold me—save me!' she fell forwards upon the floor. Elizabeth flew to her assistance, raised her, and by her cries brought both her mother, who had not yet got into bed, and their only servant girl, to her aid. The latter was dispatched at once for medical help, but, from the appearance of the sufferer, it was much to be feared that she would soon be beyond the reach of art. Her agonized parent and sister succeeded in bearing her between them and placing her on the bed: a faint and intermittent pulsation was for a while perceptible, but in a few moments a general shudder shook the whole body; the pulse ceased, the eyes became fixed and glassy, the jaw dropped, a cold clamminess usurped the place of the genial warmth of life. Before Mr I—— arrived, every thing announced that dissolution had taken place, and that the freed spirit had quitted its mortal tenement.

"The appearance of the surgeon confirmed their worst apprehensions; a vein was opened, but the blood refused to flow, and Mr I—— pronounced that the vital spark was indeed extinguished. The poor mother, whose attachment to her children was perhaps the more powerful, as they were the sole relatives or connexions she had in the world, was overwhelmed with a grief amounting almost to frenzy; it was with difficulty that she was removed to her own room, by the united strength of her daughter and medical adviser. Nearly an hour had elapsed, in the endeavour at calming her transports; they had succeeded, however, to a certain extent, and Mr I—— had taken his leave, when Elizabeth, re-entering the bedchamber in which her sister lay, in order to pay the last sad duties to her corpse, was horror-struck at seeing a rosy stream of blood running down the side of the counterpane to the floor. Her exclamation brought the girl again to her side, when it was perceived, to their astonishment, that the sanguine stream proceeded from the arm of the body, which was now manifesting signs of returning life. The half-frantic mother flew to the room, and it was with difficulty that they could prevent her, in her agitation, from so acting as to extinguish for ever the hope which had begun to rise in their bosoms. A long-drawn sigh, amounting almost to a groan, followed by several convulsive gaspings, was the prelude to the restoration of the animal functions in poor Mary; a shriek, almost preternaturally loud, considering her state of exhaustion, succeeded; but she did recover, and with the help of restoratives, was well enough towards morning to express a strong desire that I should be sent for,—a desire the more readily complied with, inasmuch as the strange expressions and declarations she had made since her restoration to consciousness, had filled her sister with the most horrible suspicions. The nature of these suspicions was such as would at any other time, perhaps, have raised a smile upon my lips; but the distress, and even agony of the poor girl, as she half hinted and half expressed them, were such as entirely to preclude every sensation at all approaching to mirth. Without endeavouring, therefore, to combat ideas, evidently too strongly impressed upon her mind at the moment to admit of present refutation, I merely used a few encouraging words, and requested her to precede me to the sick-chamber.

"The invalid was lying on the outside of the bed, partly dressed, and wearing a white dimity wrapping-gown, the colour of which corresponded but too well with the deadly paleness of her complexion. Her cheek was wan and sunken, giving an extraordinary prominence to her eye, which gleamed with a lustrous brilliancy not unfrequently characteristic of the aberration of intellect. I took her hand; it was chill and clammy, the pulse feeble and intermittent, and the general debility of her frame was such, that I would fain have persuaded her to defer any conversation which, in her present state, she might not be equal to support. Her positive assurance that, until she had disburdened herself of what she called her 'dreadful secret,' she could know no rest either of mind or body, at length induced me to comply with her wish, opposition to which, in her then frame of mind, might perhaps be attended with even worse effects than its indulgence. I bowed acquiescence, and in a low and faltering voice, with frequent interruptions, occasioned by her weakness, she gave me the following singular account of the sensations which she averred had been experienced by her during her trance:—

" 'This, sir,' she began, 'is not the first time that the cruelty of others has, for what purpose I am unable to conjecture, put me to a degree of torture which I can compare to no suffering, either of body or mind, which I have ever before experienced. On a former occasion I was willing to believe it the mere effect of a hideous dream, or what is vulgarly termed the nightmare; but this repetition, and the circumstances under which I was last summoned, at a time too when I had not even composed myself to rest, fatally convinced me of the reality of what I have seen and suffered.

"This is no time for concealments of any kind. It is now more than a twelvemonth since I was in the habit of occasionally encountering in my walks a young man of prepossessing appearance and gentlemanly deportment: he was always alone, generally reading, but I could not be long in doubt that these rencontres, which became every week more frequent, were not the effect of accident, or that his attention, when we did meet, was less directed to his book than to my sister and myself. He even seemed to wish to address us, and I have no doubt would have taken some other opportunity of doing so, had not one been afforded him by a strange dog attacking us, one Sunday morning, in our way to church, which he beat off, and made use of this little service to promote an acquaintance. His name, he said, was Francis Somers, and that he was on a visit to a relation of the same name, resident a few miles from X—. He gave us to understand that he was himself studying surgery with the view to a medical appointment in one of the colonies. You are not to suppose, sir, that he had entered thus into his concerns at the first interview; it was not till our acquaintance had ripened, and he had visited our house more than once with my mother's sanction, that these particulars were elicited. He never disguised, from the first, that an attachment to myself was his object originally in introducing himself to our notice; as his prospects were comparatively flattering, my mother did not raise any impediment to his attentions, and I own I received them with pleasure.

"Days and weeks elapsed, and although the distance at which his relation resided, prevented the possibility of an uninterrupted intercourse, yet neither was it so great as to preclude his frequent visits. The interval of a day, or at most of two, was all that intervened, and these temporary absences certainly did not decrease the pleasure of the meetings with which they terminated. At length a pensive expression began to exhibit itself upon his countenance, and I could not but remark that at every visit he became more abstracted and reserved. The eye of affection is not slow to detect any symptom of uneasiness in a quarter dear to it. I spoke to him, questioned him on the subject; his answer was evasive, and I said no more. My mother too, however, had marked the same appearance of melancholy, and pressed him more strongly. He at length admitted that his spirits were depressed, and that their depression was caused by the necessity of an early though but a temporary separation. His uncle, and only friend, he said, had long insisted on his spending some months on the Continent, with the view of completing his professional education, and that the time was now fast approaching when it would be necessary for him to commence his journey. A look made the enquiry which my tongue refused to utter. "Yes, dearest Mary," was his reply, "I have communicated our attachment to him, partially at least, and though I dare not say that the intimation was received as I could have wished, yet I have, perhaps, on the whole, no fair reason to be dissatisfied with his reply.

"The completion of my studies, and my settlement in the world, must, my uncle told me, be the first consideration; when these material points were achieved, he should not interfere with any arrangement that might be found essential to my happiness; at the same time he has positively refused to sanction any engagement at present, which may, he says, have a tendency to divert my attention from those studies, on the due prosecution of which my future situation in life must depend. A compromise between love and duty was eventually wrung from me, though reluctantly; I have pledged myself to proceed immediately to my destination abroad, with a full understanding that on my return, a twelvemonth hence, no obstacles shall be thrown in the way of what are, I trust, our mutual wishes."

"I will not attempt to describe the feelings with which I received this communication, nor will it be necessary to say any thing of what passed at the few interviews which took place before Francis quitted X——. The evening immediately previous to that of his departure he passed in this house, and before we separated, renewed his protestations of an unchangeable affection, requiring a similar assurance from me in return. I did not hesitate to make it. "Be satisfied, my dear Francis," said I, "that no diminution in the regard I have avowed can ever take place, and, though absent in body, my heart and soul will still be with you."—"Swear this," he cried, with a suddenness and energy which surprised, and rather startled me; "promise that you will be with me in spirit, at least, when I am far away." I gave him my hand, but that was not sufficient. "One of these dark shining ringlets, my dear Mary," said he, "as a pledge that you will not forget your vow!" I suffered him to take the scissors from my work-box, and to sever a lock of my hair, which he placed in his bosom. The next day he was pursuing his journey, and the waves were already bearing him from England.

"I had letters from him repeatedly during the first three months of his absence; they spoke of his health, his prospects, and of his love, but by degrees the intervals between each arrival became longer, and I fancied I perceived some falling off from that warmth of expression which at first characterised his communications.

"One night I had retired to rest, rather later than usual, having sat by the bedside, reading and comparing his last brief note with some of his earlier letters, and endeavouring to convince myself that my apprehensions of his fickleness were unfounded, when an undefinable sensation of restlessness and anxiety seized upon me. I cannot compare it to any thing I had ever experienced before; my pulse fluttered, my heart beat with a quickness and violence which alarmed me, and a strange tremour shook my whole frame. I retired hastily to bed, in hopes of getting rid of so unpleasant a sensation, but in vain; a vague apprehension of I knew not what, occupied my mind, and vainly did I endeavour to shake it off. I can compare my feelings to nothing but those which we sometimes experience when about to undertake a long and unpleasant journey, leaving those we love behind us. More than once did I raise myself in my bed, and listen, fancying that I heard myself called, and on each of those occasions the fluttering of my heart increased. Twice I was on the point of calling to my sister, who then slept in an adjoining room, but she had gone to bed indisposed, and an unwillingness to disturb either her or my mother, checked me; the large clock in the room below at this moment began to strike the hour of twelve. I distinctly heard its vibrations, but ere its sounds had ceased, a burning heat, as if a hot iron had been applied to my temple, was succeeded by a dizziness, a swoon, a total loss of consciousness as to where or in what situation I was.

"A pain, violent, sharp, and piercing, as though my whole frame were lacerated by some keen-edged weapon, roused me from this stupor,—but where was I? Every thing was strange around me—a shadowy dimness rendered every object indistinct and uncertain; methought, however, that I was seated in a large antique high-backed chair, several of which were near, their tall black carved frames and seats interwoven with a lattice work of cane. The apartment in which I sat was of moderate dimensions, and from its sloping roof, seemed to be the upper story of the edifice, a fact confirmed by the moon shining without, in full effulgence, on a large round tower, which its light rendered plainly visible through the open casement, and the summit of which seemed but little superior in elevation to the room I occupied. Rather to the right, and in the distance, the spire of some cathedral, or lofty church, was visible, while sundry gable ends, and tops of houses, told me I was in the midst of a populous, but unknown city.

"The apartment itself had something strange in its appearance; and in the character of its furniture and appurtenances bore little or no resemblance to any I had ever seen before. The fireplace was large and wide, with a pair of what are sometimes called andirons, betwixt which wood was the principal, if not the only fuel consumed within its recess; a huge fire was now blazing in it, the light from which rendered visible the remotest parts of the chamber. Over a lofty old-fashioned mantelpiece, carved heavily in imitation of fruits and flowers, hung a half-length portrait of a gentleman in a dark coloured foreign habit, with a peaked beard and mustaches, one hand resting upon a table, the other supporting a sort of baton, or short military staff, the summit of which was surmounted by a silver dove. Several antique chairs, similar in appearance to those already mentioned, surrounded a massive oaken table, the length of which much exceeded its width. At the lower end of this piece of furniture, stood the chair I occupied; on the upper, was placed a small chafing dish, filled with burning coals, and darting forth occasionally long flashes of various coloured fire, the brilliance of which made itself visible, even above the strong illumination emitted from the chimney. Two huge black japanned cabinets, with claw feet, reflecting from their polished surfaces the effulgence of the flame, were placed one on each side the casement window to which I have alluded, and with a few shelves loaded with books, many of which were also strewn in disorder on the floor, completed the list of the furniture in the apartment. Some strange looking instrument, of unknown form and purpose, lay on the table near the chafing dish, on the other side of which a miniature portrait of myself hung, reflected by a small oval mirror in a dark coloured frame, while a large open volume, traced with strange characters, of the colour of blood, lay in front; a goblet, containing a few drops of liquid of the same ensanguined hue, was by its side.

"But of the objects which I have endeavoured to describe, none arrested my attention so forcibly as two others. These were the figures of two young men, in the prime of life, only separated from me by the table. They were dressed alike, each in a long flowing gown, made of some sad coloured stuff, and confined at the waist by a crimson girdle; one of them, the shorter of the two, was occupied in feeding the embers of the chafing dish with a resinous powder, which produced and maintained a brilliant but flickering blaze, to the action of which his companion was exposing a long lock of dark chestnut hair, that shrank and shrivelled as it approached the flame. But, oh God! that hair, and the form of him who held it! that face! those features! not for one instant could I entertain a doubt it was He! Francis! the lock he grasped was mine, the very pledge of affection I had given him, and still, as it partially encountered the fire, a burning heat seemed to scorch the temple from which it had been taken, conveying a torturing sensation that affected my very brain.

"How shall I proceed—but no, it is impossible, not even to you, sir, can I—dare I—recount the proceedings of that unhallowed night of horror and of shame. Were my life extended to a term commensurate with that of the Patriarchs of old, never could its detestable, its damning pollution be effaced from my remembrance; and, oh! above all, never could I forget the diabolical glee which sparkled in the eyes of my fiendish tormentors, as they witnessed the worse than useless struggles of their miserable victim. Oh! why was it not permitted me to take refuge in unconsciousness—nay, in death itself, from the abominations of which I was compelled to be, not only a witness, but a partaker? But it is enough, sir; I will not further shock your nature by dwelling longer on a scene, the full horrors of which, words, if I even dared employ any, would be inadequate to express; suffice it to say, that after being subjected to it, how long I know not, but certainly for more than an hour, a noise from below seemed to alarm my persecutors; a pause ensued, the lights were extinguished, and, as the sound of a footstep ascending a staircase became more distinct, my forehead felt again the excruciating sensation of heat, as the embers, kindling into a momentary flame, betrayed another portion of the ringlet consuming in the blaze. Fresh agonies succeeded, not less severe, and of a similar description to those which had seized upon me at first. Oblivion again followed, and, on being at length restored to consciousness, I found myself as you see me now, faint and exhausted, weakened in every limb, and every fibre quivering with agitation. My groans soon brought my sister to my aid; it was long before I could summon resolution to confide even to her the dreadful secret, and when I had done so, her strongest efforts were not wanting to persuade me that I had been labouring under a severe attack of nightmare. I ceased to argue, but I was not convinced; the whole scene was then too present, too awfully real, to permit me to doubt the character of the transaction; and if, when a few days had elapsed, the hopelessness of imparting to others the conviction I entertained myself, produced in me an apparent acquiescence with that opinion, I have never been the less satisfied that no cause reducible to the known laws of nature, occasioned my sufferings on that hellish evening. Whether that firm belief might have eventually yielded to time, whether I might at length have been brought to consider all that had passed, and the circumstances which I could never cease to remember, as a mere phantasm, the offspring of a heated imagination, acting upon an enfeebled body, last night would have dispelled the flattering illusion—last night—last night was the whole horrible scene acted over again:—The place—the actors—the whole infernal apparatus were the same;—the same insults, the same torments, the same brutalities—all were renewed, save that the period of my agony was not so prolonged.—I became sensible to an incision in my arm, though the hand that made it was not visible; at the same moment, my persecutors paused; they were manifestly disconcerted, and the companion of him whose name shall never more pass my lips, muttered something to his abettor in evident agitation; the formula of an oath of horrible import was dictated to me in terms fearfully distinct. I refused it unhesitatingly; again and again was it proposed, with menaces I tremble to think on—but I refused;—the same sound was heard—interruption was evidently apprehended,—the same ceremony was hastily repeated, and I again found myself released, lying on my own bed with my mother, and my sister weeping over me. Oh, God! oh, God! when and how is this to end? When will my spirit be left in peace? Where, or with whom shall I find refuge?

“It is impossible to convey any adequate idea of the emotions with which this unhappy girl’s narrative affected me. It must not be supposed that her story was delivered in the same continuous and uninterrupted strain in which I have transcribed its substance. On the contrary, it was not without frequent intervals, of longer or shorter duration, that her account was brought to a conclusion: indeed, many passages of her strange dream were not without the greatest difficulty and reluctance communicated at all. My task was no easy one; never, in the course of a long life spent in the active duties of my Christian calling, never had I been summoned to such a conference before.

“To the half avowed and palliated confession of committed guilt, I had, often listened, and pointed out the only road to secure its forgiveness. I had succeeded in cheering the spirit of despondency, and sometimes even in calming the ravings of despair; but here I had a different enemy to combat, an ineradicable prejudice to encounter, evidently backed by no common share of superstition, and confirmed by the mental weakness attendant upon severe bodily pain. To argue the sufferer out of an opinion so rooted, was a hopeless attempt. I did, however, essay it: I spoke to her of the strong and mysterious connexion maintained between our waking images, and those which haunt us in our dreams, and more especially during that morbid oppression commonly called nightmare. I was even enabled to adduce myself as a strong and living instance of the excess to which fancy sometimes carries her freaks on these occasions; and by an odd coincidence, the impression made upon my own mind, which I adduced as an example, bore no slight resemblance to her own. I stated to her, that on my recovery from the fit of epilepsy, which had attacked me about two years since, just before my grandson Frederick left Oxford, it was with the greatest difficulty I could persuade myself that I had not visited him during the interval in his room at Brazenose, and even conversed both with himself and his friend W—, seated in his arm-chair, and gazing through the window full upon the statue of Cain, as it stands in the centre of the quadrangle. I told her of the pain I underwent both at the commencement and termination of my attack, of the extreme lassitude that succeeded; but my efforts were all in vain: she listened to me, indeed, with an interest almost breathless, especially when I informed her of my having actually experienced the burning sensation in the brain alluded to, no doubt strong attendant symptoms of this peculiar affection, and a proof of the identity of the complaint; but I could plainly perceive that I failed entirely in shaking the rooted opinion which possessed her, that her spirit had, by some nefarious and unhallowed means, been actually subtracted for a time from its earthly tenement."

The next extract which I shall give from my old friend's memorandum, is dated August 24th, more than a week subsequent to his first visit at Mrs G—'s. He appears, from his papers, to have visited the poor young woman more than once during the interval, and to have afforded her those spiritual consolations which no one was more capable of communicating. His patient, for so in a religious sense she may well be termed, had been sinking under the agitation she had experienced; and the constant dread she was under of similar sufferings, operated so strongly on a frame already enervated, that life at length seemed to hang only by a thread. His papers go on to say,

"I have just seen poor Mary G—, I fear for the last time. Nature is evidently quite worn out, she is aware that she is dying, and looks forward to the termination of her existence here, not only with resignation, but with joy. It is clear that her dream, or what she persists in calling her 'subtraction,' has much to do with this. For the last three days, her behaviour has been altered; she has avoided conversing on the subject of her delusion, and seems to wish that I should consider her as a convert to my view of her case. This may perhaps be partly owing to the flippancies of her medical attendant upon the subject, for Mr I— has, somehow or other, got an inkling that she has been much agitated by a dream, and thinks to laugh off the impression, in my opinion injudiciously; but though a skilful and a kindhearted, he is a young man, and of a disposition, perhaps, rather too mercurial for the chamber of a nervous invalid. Her manner has since been much more reserved to both of us: in my case probably because she suspects me of betraying her secret."

"August 26th.—Mary G— is yet alive, but sinking fast; her cordiality towards me has returned since her sister confessed yesterday that she had herself told Mr I— that his patient's mind 'had been affected by a terrible vision.' I am evidently restored to her confidence. She asked me this morning, with much earnestness, 'What I believed to be the state of departed spirits during the interval between dissolution and the final day of account?' And whether I thought they would be safe in another world from the influence of wicked persons employing an agency more than human? 'Poor child!—One cannot mistake the still prevailing bias of her mind—Poor child!'"

"August 27th.—It is nearly over, she is sinking rapidly, but quietly and without pain. I have just administered to her the sacred elements, of which her mother partook. Elizabeth declined doing the same; she cannot, she says, yet bring herself to forgive the villain who has destroyed her sister. It is singular that she, a young woman of good plain sense in ordinary matters, should so easily adopt, and so pertinaciously retain, a superstition so puerile and ridiculous. This must be matter of future conversation between us; at present, with the form of the dying girl before her eyes, it were vain to argue with her. The mother, I find, has written to young Somers, stating the dangerous situation of his affianced wife; indignant, as she justly is, at his long silence. It is fortunate that she has no knowledge of the suspicions entertained by her daughter. I have seen her letter, it is addressed to Mr Fran-cia Somers, in the Hogewoert, at Leyden, a fellow-student, then, of Frederick's.—I must remember to enquire if he is acquainted with this young man."

Mary G——, it appears, died the same night. Before her departure, she repeated to my friend the singular story she had before told him, without any material variation from the detail she had formerly given. To the last she persisted in believing that her unworthy lover had practised upon her by forbidden arts. She once more described the apartment with great minuteness, and even the person of Francis's alleged companion, who was, she said, about the middle height, hard featured, with a rather remarkable scar upon his left cheek, extending in a transverse direction from below the eye to the nose. Several pages of my reverend friend's manuscript are filled with reflections upon this extraordinary confession, which, joined with its melancholy termination, seems to have produced no common effect upon him. He alludes to more than one subsequent discussion with the surviving sister, and piques himself on having made some progress in convincing her of the folly of her theory respecting the origin and nature of the illness itself.

His memoranda on this, and other subjects, are continued till about the middle of September, when a break ensues, occasioned, no doubt, by the unwelcome news of his grandson's dangerous state, which induced him to set out forthwith for Holland. His arrival at Leyden, was, as I have already said, too late. Frederick S—— had expired, after thirty hours intense suffering, from a wound received in a duel with a brother student. The cause of quarrel was variously related; but, according to his landlord's version, it had originated in some silly dispute about a dream of his antagonist's, who had been the challenger. Such, at least, was the account given to him, as he said, by Frederick's friend and fellow lodger, W——, who had acted as second on the occasion, thus acquitting himself of an obligation of the same kind, due to the deceased, whose services he had put in requisition about a year before, on a similar occasion, when he had himself been severely wounded in the face.

From the same authority, I learned that my poor friend was much affected on finding that his arrival had been deferred too long. Every attention was shewn him by the proprietor of the house, a respectable tradesman, and a chamber was prepared for his accommodation; the books, and few effects of his deceased grandson, were delivered over to him, duly inventoried, and, late as it was in the evening when he reached Leyden, he insisted on being conducted to the apartments which Frederick had occupied, there to indulge the first ebullitions of his sorrow, before he retired to his own. Madame Muller, accordingly, led the way to an upper room, which, being situated at the top of the house, had been, from its privacy and distance from the street, selected by Frederick as his study. The Doctor entered, and, taking the lamp from his conductress, motioned to be left alone. His implied wish was, of course, complied with; and nearly two hours had elapsed before his kind-hearted hostess reascended, in the hope of prevailing upon him to return with her, and partake of that refreshment which he had in the first instance peremptorily declined. Her application for admission was unnoticed; she repeated it more than once, without success; then, becoming somewhat alarmed at the continued silence, opened the door, and perceived her new inmate stretched on the floor, in a fainting fit. Restoratives were instantly administered, and prompt medical aid succeeded at length in restoring him to consciousness. But his mind had received a shock, from which, during the few weeks he survived, it never entirely recovered. His thoughts wandered perpetually; and though, from the very slight acquaintance which his hosts held with the English language, the greater part of what fell from him remained unknown, yet enough was understood to induce them to believe that something more than the mere death of his grandson had contributed thus to paralyze his faculties.

When his situation was first discovered, a small miniature was found tightly grasped in his right hand. It had been the property of Frederick and had more than once been seen by the Müllers in his possession. To this the patient made continued reference, and would not suffer it one moment from his sight: it was in his hand when he expired. At my request, it was produced to me. The portrait was that of a young woman, in an English morning dress, whose pleasing and regular features, with their mild and somewhat pensive expression, were not, I thought, altogether unknown to me. Her age was apparently about twenty. A profusion of dark chestnut hair was arranged in the Madonna style, above a brow of unsullied whiteness, a single ringlet depending on the left side. A glossy lock of the same colour, and evidently belonging to the original, appeared beneath a small crystal, inlaid in the back of the picture which was plainly set in gold, and bore in a cypher the letters M.G., with the date 18—. From the inspection of this portrait, I could at the time collect nothing, nor from that of the Doctor himself, which also I found the next morning in Frederick's desk, accompanied by two separate portions of hair. One of them was a lock, short and deeply tinged with grey, and had been taken, I have little doubt, from the head of my old friend himself; the other corresponded in colour and appearance with that at the back of the miniature. It was not till a few days had elapsed, and I had seen the worthy Doctor's remains quietly consigned to the narrow house, that, while arranging his papers previous to my intended return upon the morrow, I encountered the narrative I have already transcribed. The name of the unfortunate young woman connected with it forcibly arrested my attention. I recollected it immediately as one belonging to a parishioner of my own, and at once recognised the original of the female portrait as its owner.

I rose not from the perusal of his very singular statement till I had gone through the whole of it. It was late, and the rays of the single lamp by which I was reading, did but very faintly illumine the remoter parts of the room in which I sat. The brilliancy of an unclouded November moon, then some twelve nights old, and shining full into the apartment, did much towards remedying the defect. My thoughts filled with the melancholy details I had read, I rose and walked to the window. The beautiful planet rode high in the firmament, and gave to the snowy roofs of the houses, and the pendant icicles, all the sparkling radiance of clustering gems. The stillness of the scene harmonized well with the state of my feelings. I threw open the casement and looked abroad. Far below me, the waters of the principal canal shone like a mirror in the moonlight. To the left rose the Burcht, a huge round tower, of remarkable appearance, pierced with embrasures at its summit; while, a little to the right, and in the distance, the spire and pinnacles of the cathedral of Leyden rose in all their majesty, presenting a coup d'œil of surpassing, though simple beauty. To a spectator of calm, unoccupied mind, the scene would have been delightful. On me it acted with an electric effect. I turned hastily to survey the apartment in which I had been sitting. It was the one designated as the study of the late Frederick S—. The sides of the room were covered with dark wainscot; the spacious fireplace opposite to me, with its polished audirons, was surmounted by a large old-fashioned mantelpiece, heavily carved in the Dutch style with fruits and flowers; above it frowned a portrait, in a Vandyke dress, with peaked beard and mustaches; one hand of the figure rested on a table, while the other bore a marshal's staff, surmounted with a silver dove; and either my imagination, already heated by the scene, deceived me, or a smile, as of malicious triumph curled the lip and glared in the cold leaden eye, that seemed fixed upon my own. The heavy, antique, cane-backed chairs, the large oaken table, the bookshelves, the scattered volumes—all, all were there; while, to complete the picture, to my right and left, as, half breathless, I leaned my back against the casement, rose on each side a tall, dark, ebony cabinet, in whose polished sides the single lamp upon the table alone reflected as in a mirror.

What am I to think? Can it be that the story I have been reading was written by my poor friend here, and under the influence of delirium?

Impossible! Besides, they all assure me, that, from the fatal night of his arrival, he never left his bed—never put pen to paper. His very directions to have me summoned from England were verbally given, during one of those few and brief intervals in which reason seemed partially to resume her sway. Can it then be possible that —? W—? where is he, who alone may be able to throw light on this horrible mystery? No one knows. He absconded, it seems, immediately after the duel. No trace of him exists, nor, after repeated and anxious enquiries, can I find that any student has ever been known in the University of Leyden by the name of Francis Somers.

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.”

ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

NO. IV.

THE NATIONAL GUARD.

“I AM surprised,” said Condorcet to Lafayette, upon seeing him enter the room in the uniform of a private of the National Guard of Paris, of which he had so recently been the commander,—“I am surprised at seeing you, General, in that dress.”—“Not at all,” replied Lafayette, “I was tired of obeying, and wished to command, and therefore I laid down my general’s commission, and took a musket on my shoulder.”—“Gnarus,” says Tacitus, “bellis civilibus, plus militibus quam ducibus licere.” It is curious to observe how, in the most remote ages, popular license produces effects so precisely similar.

Of the numerous delusions which have overspread the world in such profusion during the last nine months, there is none so extraordinary and so dangerous as the opinion incessantly inculcated by the revolutionary press, that the noblest virtue in regular soldiers is to prove themselves traitors to their oaths, and that a national guard is the only safe and constitutional force to whom arms can be intrusted. The troops of the line, whose revolt decided the three days in July in favour of the revolutionary party, have been the subject of the most extravagant eulogium from the liberal press throughout Europe; and even in this country, the government journals have not hesitated to condemn, in no measured terms, the Royal Guard, merely because they adhered, amidst a nation’s treason, to their honour and their oaths.

Hitherto it has been held the first duty of soldiers to adhere with implicit devotion to that fidelity which is the foundation of military duties. Treason to his colours has been considered as foul a blot on the soldier’s scutcheon as cowardice in the field. Even in the most republican states, this principle of military subordination has been felt to be the vital principle of national strength. It was during the rigorous days of Roman discipline, that their legions conquered the world; and the decline of the empire began at the time that the Prætorian Guards veered with the mutable populace, and sold the empire for a gratuity to themselves. Albeit placed in power by the insurrection of the people, no men knew better than the French republican leaders that their salvation depended on crushing the military insubordination to which they had owed their elevation. When the Parisian levies began to evince the mutinous spirit in the camp at St Menehould, in Champagne, which they had imbibed during the license of the capital, Dumourier drew them up in the centre of his intrenchments, and shewing them a powerful line of cavalry in front, with their sabres drawn, ready to charge, and a stern array of artillery and cannoneers in rear, with their matches in their hands, soon convinced the most licentious that the boasted independence of the soldier must yield to the dangers of actual warfare.* “The armed force,” said

* Mém. de Dumourier, III. 172.

Carnot, "is essentially obedient;" and in all his commands, that great man incessantly inculcated upon his soldiers the absolute necessity of implicit submission to the power which employed them.* When the recreant Constable de Bourbon, at the head of a victorious squadron of Spanish cavalry, approached the spot where the rear-guard, under the Chevalier Bayard, was covering the retreat of the French army in the Valley of Aosta, he found him seated, mortally wounded, under a tree, with his eyes fixed on the cross which formed the hilt of his sword. Bourbon began to express pity for his fate. "Pity not me," said the high-minded Chevalier, "pity those who fight against their king, their country, and their oath."

These generous feelings, common alike to republican antiquity and modern chivalry, have disappeared during the fumes of the French Revolution. The soldier who is now honoured, is not he who keeps, but he who violates his oath; the rewards of valour showered, not upon those who defend, but those who overturn the government; the incense of popular applause offered, not at the altar of fidelity, but at that of treason. Honours, rewards, promotion, and adulation, have been lavished on the troops of the line, who overthrew the government of Charles X. in July last, while the Royal Guard, who adhered to the fortune of the falling monarch with exemplary fidelity, have been reduced to beg their bread from the bounty of strangers in a foreign land. A subscription has recently been opened in London for the most destitute of those defenders of royalty; but the government journals have stigmatized, as "highly dangerous," any indication of sympathy with their fidelity or their misfortunes.†

If these ancient ideas of honour, however, are to be exploded, they have at least gone out of fashion in good company. The National Guard who took up arms to overthrow the throne, have not been long in destroying the altar. During the revolt of February, 1831, the Cross, the emblem of salvation, was taken down from all the steeples in Paris by the citizen soldiers, and the image of our Saviour effaced, by their orders, from every church within its bounds! The two principles stand and fall together. The Chevalier, without fear and without reproach, died in obedience to his oath, with his eyes fixed on the Cross; the National Guard lived in triumph, while their comrades bore down the venerated emblem from the towers of Notre Dame.

"I can discover no other reason for the uniform progress of the republic," says Cicero, "but the constant sense of religion which has actuated its members. In numbers the Spaniards excel us—in military ardour, the Gauls—in hardihood and obstinacy, the Germans; but in veneration to the gods, and fidelity to their oaths, the Roman people exceed any nation that ever existed." We shall see whether the present times are destined to form an exception from these principles; whether treason and infidelity are to tear the fabric in modern, which fidelity and religion constructed in ancient times.

The extreme peril of such principles renders the enquiry interesting.—What have been the effects of military treachery in times past? Has it aided the cause of virtue, strengthened the principles of freedom, contributed to the prosperity of mankind? Or has it unhinged the fabric of society, blasted the cause of liberty, blighted the happiness of the people?

The first great instance of military treachery occurred in the revolt of the French Guards in June, 1789. That unparalleled event immediately brought on the Revolution. The fatal example rapidly spread to the other troops brought up to assuage the capital, and the King, deprived of the support of his own troops, was soon compelled to submit to the insurgents. It was these soldiers, not the mob of Paris, who stormed the Bastille; all the efforts of the populace were unavailing till those regular troops occupied the adjoining houses, and supported tumultuary enthusiasm by military skill.

Extravagant were the eulogiums, boundless the gratitude, great the rewards, which were showered down on the Gardes Françaises for this shameful act of treachery. Never were men the subjects of such extraordinary adulation. Wine and women, gambling and intoxication, flattery and bribes, were furnished in abundance. And what was the consequence? The ancient honour of the Guards of France, of those guards who saved the Body Guards at Fontenoy, and inherited a line of centuries of splendour, perished without redemption on that fatal occasion. Tarnished in reputation, disunited in opinion, humbled in character, the regiment fell to pieces from a sense of its own shame; the early leader of the Revolution, its exploits never were heard of through all the career of glory which followed; and the first act of their revolt against their sovereign was the last of their long and renowned existence.

Nor were the consequences of this unexampled detection less dangerous to France than to the soldiers who were guilty of it. The insubordination, license, and extravagance of revolt were fatal to military discipline, and brought France to the brink of ruin. The disaffected soldiers, as has been observed in all ages, were intrepid only against their own sovereign. When they were brought to meet the armies of Prussia and Austria, they all took to flight; and on one occasion, by the admission of Dumourier himself, ten thousand regular soldiers fled from one thousand five hundred Prussian hussars. A little more energy and ability in the allied commanders would have then destroyed the revolutionary government.

Notwithstanding all the enthusiasm of the people, the weakness of insubordination continued to paralyze all the efforts of the republican armies. France was again invaded, and brought to the brink of ruin in 1793, and the tide was then, for the first time, turned, when the iron rule of the mob began, and the terrific grasp of Carnot and Robespierre extinguished all those principles of military license which had so much been the subject of eulogium at the commencement of the Revolution.

Did this abandonment of military duty serve the cause of freedom, or increase the prosperity of France? Did it establish liberty on a secure basis, or call down the blessings of posterity? It led immediately to all the anguish and suffering of the Revolution—the murder of the King—the anarchy of the kingdom—the reign of terror—the despotism of Napoleon. They forgot their loyalty amidst the glitter of prostitution and the fumes of intoxication; their successors were brought back to it by the iron rule of the committees of public safety: they revolted against the beneficent sway of a reforming monarch: they brought on their country a tyranny, which the pencil of Tacitus would hardly be able to portray.

The revolt of the Spanish troops at the Isle of Leon, in 1819, was the next great example of military defection. What have been its consequences? Has Spain improved in freedom—risen in character—augmented in wealth, since that glorious insurrection? It raised up, for a few years, the phantom of a constitutional throne, ephemeral as the dynasties of the East, pestilential as the breath of contagion. Spain was rapidly subjugated when it rested on such defenders—treason blasted their efforts, and the nation, which had gloriously resisted for six years the formidable legions of Napoleon, sunk under the first attack of an inexperienced army of invaders led by a Bourbon Prince. Since that time, to what a deplorable condition has Spain been reduced! Depressed by domestic tyranny, destitute of foreign influence—the ridicule and scorn of Europe—this once great power has almost been blotted from the book of nations.

Portugal, Naples, and Piedmont, all had military Revolutions about the same time. Have they improved the character, bettered the condition, extended the freedom, of these countries? They have, on the contrary, established constitutions, whose failure and absurdity have brought the cause of freedom itself into dispute. The valiant revellers against the Neapolitan throne, fled at the first sight of the Austrian battalions; and the free institutions of Piedmont and Portugal, without foreign aggression, have all fallen from their own inherent weakness. All these premature attempts to introduce freedom by military revolt, have failed; and sterner despotism succeeded, from the moral reaction consequent on their disappearance.

Great part of the armies in South America revolted from the Spanish throne, and success has crowned their endeavours. What has been the consequence? Anarchy, confusion, and military confiscation—the rule of bayonets instead of that of mitres—suffering, dilapidation, and ruin, which have caused even the leaden yoke of the Castilian monarch to be regretted.

At length the glorious days of July arrived, and the declaration of the whole regular troops of the line in Paris against the government, at once decided the contest in favour of the populace. Never was more extravagant praise bestowed on any body of men, than on the soldiers who had been guilty of this act of treason. It is worth while, therefore, to examine what have been its effects, and whether the cause of freedom has really been benefited in France by the aid of treachery.

The French nation has got quit of a priest-ridden imbecile race of monarchs; men whose principles were arbitrary, habits indolent, intellects weak; who possessed the inclination, but wanted the capacity, to restrain the liberty of their people.

They have terminated a pacific era, during which the country made unexampled progress in wealth, industry, and prosperity; during which many of the wounds of the Revolution were closed, and new channels of opulence opened; during which the principles of real freedom struck deeply their roots, and the industrious habits were extensively spread, which can alone afford security for their continuance.

They have begun, instead, the career of anarchy and popular tyranny. Industry has been paralyzed, credit suspended, prosperity blighted. Commercial undertakings have ceased, distrust succeeded to confidence—despair to hope—the victims of the Revolution have disappeared, and the poor who gained it, are destitute of bread.

They have begun again the career of Republican ambition and foreign aggression; they aim openly at revolutionizing other countries, and they are unable to maintain the government they have established in their own. The Conscription is again rending asunder the affections of private life; the fountains of domestic happiness are closed; and war, with its excitements and its dangers, is again rousing the energies of its population. In the shock of contending factions, liberty is fast expiring. The imbecility of Polignac has been succeeded by the energy of Soult—the arbitrary principles of feeble priests is about to yield to the unbending despotism of energetic Republicans.

By the confession of the journals who support the Revolution, its advantages are all to come; bitter and unpalatable have been its fruits to this hour. The three per cents have fallen from 80 to 50; 12,000 workmen, without bread, are maintained on the public works; great part of the banks and mercantile houses are bankrupt; Lafitte himself is barely solvent; the opulent classes are rapidly leaving the capital; no one expends his fortune; universal distrust and apprehension have dried up the sources of industry.

The government, blown about with every wind of doctrine, is wholly unable to prevent the downward progress of the Revolution. As usual in public convulsions, the audacious, the reckless, the desperate, are pressing forward to the front ranks, and the moderate and rational sinking into obscurity. The Doctrinaires were subverted by the tumults in October; their successors by the crisis in December; the last ministers, by the explosion in February. Without authority, power, or influence, the throne is rapidly falling into contempt; the private virtues and firm character of the King, are unable to stem the swelling flood of democracy.

Impelled by revolutionary ambition into foreign war, the government of France, whether republican or monarchical, must inevitably become despotic. If the allies succeed, the Bourbons will be restored at the point of the bayonet. If the republicans are victorious, military despotism will speedily be established. The victorious legions will not surrender the authority they have won.

A second successful commander will, under the name of Consul Dictator or Emperor, re-establish the empire of the sword. After drenching Europe with blood, democratic ambition will find itself mastered by the power it has produced; victorious or vanquished, it will prove fatal to its parent freedom.

Such have been the fruits of military treachery in France.

Does Belgium afford a more flattering prospect to the advocates of military defection? Has treason, pestilential and blasting elsewhere, there brought forth the sweet and lasting fruits of peace, tranquillity, and industry? Is the independence of Flanders as secure, its commerce as flourishing, its people as contented, its agriculture as prosperous, its poor as well fed, as under the hateful reign of the Orange dynasty? By the admission of the advocates of Revolution, according to the statement of M. Potter himself, they have gained only anarchy and wretchedness, "discord within, contempt without—the intrigues of kings—the divisions of faction—the apathy of despair."

Effects so uniform, consequences so unvarying, must spring from some common cause. Victorious or vanquished, military treachery has proved fatal to every state where it has prevailed: it has everywhere blighted industry, shaken credit, destroyed freedom. Liberty has never suffered so much as from the rude and sacrilegious hands of such defenders.

"It must constantly be understood, and it is not sufficiently recollected," said Guizot in the Chamber of Deputies on the 3d of February, 1831, "that freedom is never in such danger as after a successful revolution. Habits cannot be conceived so much at variance with the protection of the people as the excitation, ambition, and misrule, which arise from their first triumph." These were the words of the republican minister established in office by the revolt in July; after he had been driven from the helm by the increasing vigour of the democratic faction to which he owed his elevation.

If the matter be considered coolly, it must at once appear that freedom never can be purchased by the revolt of soldiers; and that the military treachery which is so much the object of eulogium, is more dangerous to the liberty which has excited it, than to any other human interest.

Freedom consists in the coercion of each class by the jealousies and exertions of the others. The crown is watched by the people, the aristocracy by the crown, the populace by the aristocracy. It is the jealousy and efforts of these different interests to keep each other within due bounds, which form the balance of power indispensable to civil liberty. Without such an equilibrium, one or other of the constituent bodies must be crushed, and the ascendancy of the other rendered subversive of general freedom.

But when an established government is overturned by a revolt of its own soldiers, the event occurs which is of all others the most fatal to public liberty, viz. the destruction of subsisting power by an armed and limited class in the state. The bayonet becomes thenceforward the irresistible argument of the dominant body, and liberty, exterminated by its own defenders, sinks in the struggle which was created in her name.

It is quite in vain to expect that men of reckless and licentious habits, like the majority of soldiers in every country, will quietly resign the supreme authority after having won it at the peril of their lives. Individuals sometimes may make such a sacrifice—large bodies never have, and never will. The Prætorian Guards of Rome, and the Janizaries of Constantinople, have often revolted against the reigning power, and bestowed the throne on their own favourite; but it was never found that general freedom was improved by the result, or that individuals were better defended against oppression after it than before.

Freedom cannot be established in a day by the successful issue of a single revolt.—Its growth is as slow as that of industry in the individual: its preservation dependent on the establishment of regular habits, and the maintenance of a courageous spirit in the people. Nothing can be so destructive to these habits as a successful revolt of the soldiery. The ambition which it awakens, the sudden elevation which it confers, the power which it lodges in armed and inexperienced hands, are, of all things, the most fatal to the sober, patient and unobtrusive habits, which are the parent of real freedom. The industry, frugality, and moderation of pacific life appear intolerable to men who are dazzled by the glittering prospect of revolutionary triumph.

A successful insurrection in the army lodges supreme authority at once in an armed force. No power capable of counteracting it remains. The majesty of the throne, the sense of duty, the sanctity of an oath, the awe of the legislature, have all been set at naught. The energy of the citizens has never been developed, because the revolt of the soldiers terminated the contest before their support was required. The struggle has depended entirely between the throne and the army: the interest of the state can never be promoted by the victory of either of these contending parties.

This is the circumstance which must always render treason in the army destructive to lasting freedom. It terminates the struggle at once, before any impulse has been communicated to the unarmed citizens, or they have acquired the vigour and military prowess which is alone capable of controlling them. The people merely change masters; instead of the king and his ministers, they get the general and his officers. The rule of the sovereign is looked back to with bitter regret, when men have tasted of the severity of military license, and experienced the rigour of military execution. Whereas, during the vicissitudes of a civil war, the energy of all classes is brought into action, and the chance of obtaining ultimate freedom, improved by the very difficulty with which it has been won. The British constitution, the gradual result of repeated contests between the crown and the people, has subsisted unimpaired for centuries—the French, effected at once by the treachery of the army, has been as short-lived as the popularity of its authors. There is no royal road to freedom any more than to geometry; it is by patient exertion and progressive additions to their influence, that freedom is acquired by nations not less than eminence by individuals.

What then, it may be asked, are soldiers to do when a sovereign like

Charles X. promulgates ordinances subversive of public freedom? Are they to make themselves the willing instrument in enslaving their fellow-citizens? We answer, Certainly; if they have any regard for the ultimate maintenance of their liberty. If illegal measures have been adopted, let them be repealed by the civil authorities; but never let the soldiers take the initiative in attempting their overthrow. The interests of liberty require this as indispensably as those of order. Nothing short of an unanimous declaration of the national will by the higher classes, should lead to a defection from loyalty on the part of its sworn defenders.

In former times, no doubt, many examples have occurred of the incipient efforts of freedom being entirely extinguished by military execution; but no such catastrophe need be apprehended in countries where the press is established; the Republicans themselves have everywhere proclaimed this truth. The opinions and interests of the many must prevail where their voice is heard. The only thing to be feared for them is from their own passions. The only danger to liberty in such circumstances is from its own defenders; the violence to be apprehended is not that of the throne, but of the populace.

No stronger proof of this can be imagined than has been furnished by the recent revolution in France and Belgium. The revolt of the soldier at once established the rule of the mob in these countries, and put an end, for a long time at least, to every hope of freedom. What security is there afforded for property, life, or character? Confessedly none; every thing is determined by the bayonet of the National Guard and army; neither the throne nor the people can withstand them. Freedom was as little confirmed by their revolt, as at Constantinople by an insurrection of the Janizaries.

Liberty in France was endangered for the moment by the ordinances of the Bourbons: it has been destroyed by the insurrection planned to overthrow them. Freedom, supported as it then was, by an energetic and democratic press, and a republican population, ran no risk of permanent injury from the intrigues of the court. A priest-ridden monarch, guided by imbecile ministers, could never have subjugated an ardent, high-spirited, and democratic people.

But the danger is very different from the energy of the Republicans, and the ambition of the soldiers. Marshal Soult and his bayonets are not so easily dealt with as Prince Polignac and his Jesuits. The feeble monarchy of Louis XVI. was overturned with ease: the terrible Committee of Public Safety, the despotic Directory, the energetic sway of Napoleon, ruled the Revolution, and crushed freedom, even in its wildest fits. Three days' insurrection destroyed the feeble government of Charles. A revolt ten times more formidable was crushed with ease by the military power of the Convention.

Had the soldiers not revolted in July, what would have been the consequence? The insurrection in Paris, crushed by a garrison of 12,000 men, would have speedily sunk. A new Chamber, convoked on the basis of the royal ordinance, would have thrown the Ministers into a minority in the Chamber of Deputies, and by them the obnoxious measure would have been repealed. If there is any truth in the growing influence of public opinion, so uniformly maintained by liberal writers, this must have been the result. No representatives chosen by any electors in France, could have withstood the odium which supporting the measures of the court would have produced. Thus liberty would have been secured without exciting the tempest which threatens its own overthrow. Public credit, private confidence, general prosperity, would have been maintained; the peace of the world preserved; the habits conducive to a state of national freedom engendered.

What have been the consequences of the boasted treachery of the troops of the line in July? The excitation of revolutionary hopes; the rousing of democratic ambition; a ferment in society; the abandonment of useful industry; the government of the mob; the arming of France; the suspension of pacific enterprise. A general war must ensue. Europe will be drenched with blood, and whatever be the result, it will be equally fatal to the cause of freedom. If the aristocracy prevail, it will be the government of the sword; if the populace, of the guillotine.

A civil war in France would have been far more serviceable to the cause of real liberty, than the sudden destruction of the government by the revolt of the army. In many periods of history, freedom has emerged from the collision of different classes in society, in none from military insubordination.

If Charles I. had possessed a regular army, and it had betrayed its trust on the first breaking out of the great Rebellion, would the result have been as favourable to the cause of liberty, as the long contest which ensued? Nothing can be clearer than that it would not. No greater consequences would have followed such a revolt, than any of the insurrections of the barons against the princes of York and Lancaster. A revolution so easily achieved, would as easily have been abandoned: liberty would never have been gained, because the trials had not been endured by which it is to be won. The only security for its continuance is to be found in the energy and courage of the citizens: it is not by witnessing the destruction of government by a mutinous soldiery, that these habits are to be acquired.

Soldiers, therefore, who adhere to their honour and their oaths, are in reality the best friends of the cause of freedom. They prevent the struggle for its maintenance from being converted into a mortal combat, in which the victory of either party must prove fatal to the very object for which they are contending. They prevent the love of independence from being transformed into the spirit of insubordination, and the efforts of freedom blasted by the violence of popular, or the irresistible weight of military ambition. They turn the spirit of liberty into a pacific channel; and averting it from that direction where it falls under the rule of violence, retain it in that where wisdom and foresight duly regulate its movements.

The institution of a National Guard, of which so much is now said, is not less the subject of delusion, than the boasted treachery of regular soldiers.

Citizen soldiers are most valuable additions to the force of a regular army, and when actuated by a common and patriotic feeling, they are capable of rendering most effective service to the state. The landwehr of Prussia, and the volunteers of Russia, sufficiently demonstrated that truth during the campaigns of 1812 and 1813.

They are a valuable force also for preserving domestic tranquillity up to a certain point, when little real peril is to be encountered, and a display of moral opinion is of more weight than the exertion of military prowess. But they are a force that cannot be relied on during the shades of opinion which take place in a revolution, and still less in the perilous strife which follows the actual collision of one class of the State with another. This has been completely demonstrated during both the French Revolutions.

The National Guard of Paris was first embodied on the 20th July 1789, a week after the capture of the Bastille. During the first fervour of the revolutionary ardour, and before the strife of faction had brought the opposite parties into actual contest, they frequently rendered effective service to the cause of order. On more than one occasion, headed by Lafayette, they dispersed seditious assemblages, and once, in June 1792, were brought to fire upon the Jacobins in the Champ de Mars. But whenever matters approached a crisis, when the want and suffering consequent on a revolution had brought forward angry bodies of workmen from the Faubourg; when the question was not one of turning out to parade, but of fighting an exasperated multitude, they uniformly failed.

The citizen soldiers, headed by Lafayette, were under arms in great force on the 5th October, 1789, when a furious rabble marched to Versailles, broke into and plundered the palace, attempted to murder the Queen, and brought the Royal Family in captivity to Paris, preceded by the heads of their faithful Body Guards. They refused for five hours to listen to the entreaties of their commander to march to protect the palace of the King against that atrocious insult; and when they did go, were too irresolute to prevent the violence which followed.

They stood by on 20th June, 1792, when a vociferous rabble broke into the hall of the Assembly, threatening the obnoxious deputies with instant death; when they rushed into the Palace of the Tuilleries, pushed their pikes at the breast of Louis, placed the Cap of Liberty on his head, and brought the Royal Family and the monarchy into imminent danger.

They assembled at the sound of the général, when the Fauxbourgs rose in revolt on the 10th August, and their dense battalions, plentifully supported by cavalry and artillery, accumulated in great force round the Tuilleries. But division, irresolution, and timidity, paralyzed their ranks. First the Gendarmerie deserted to the assailants; then the cannoniers unloaded their guns; several battalions next joined the insurgents, and the few that remained faithful were so completely paralyzed by the general defection of their comrades, that they were unable to render any effective support to the Swiss Guard. From amidst a forest of citizen bayonets, the monarch was dragged a captive to the Temple, and the government of France yielded up to a sanguinary rabble. Seven thousand National Guards, on that day, yielded up their sovereign to a despicable rabble; as many hundred faithful regular soldiers would have established his throne, and prevented the Reign of Terror.

When Lafayette, indignant at the atrocities of the Jacobins, repaired to Paris from the army, and assigned a rendezvous at his house, in the evening of June 27, 1792, to the National Guard, of which he had so lately been the popular commander, in order to march against the Jacobin club, only thirty men obeyed the summons. The immense majority evinced a fatal apathy, and surrendered up their country, without a struggle, to the empire of the Jacobins.

When Louis, Marie Antoinette, and the Princess Elizabeth, were successively led out to the scaffold; when the brave and virtuous Madame Roland became the victim of the freedom she had worshipped; when Vergniaud and the illustrious leaders of the Gironde were brought to the block; when Danton and Camille Desmoulins were destroyed by the mob whom they had excited, the National Guard lined the streets, and attended the cars to the guillotine.

When the executions rose to 150 daily; when the shopkeepers closed their windows, to avoid witnessing the dismal spectacles of the long procession which was approaching the scaffold; when a ditch was dug to convey the blood of the victims to the Seine; when France groaned under tyranny, unequalled since the beginning of the world, 40,000 National Guards, with arms in their hands, looked on in silent observation of the mournful spectacle.

When indignant nature revolted at the cruelty; when, by a generous union, the members of all sides in the Assembly united, the power of the tyrants was shaken; when Robespierre was declared hors la loi, and the general was beat to summon the citizen soldiers to make a last effort in behalf not only of their country, but of their own existence, only 2,000 obeyed the summons! Thirty-seven thousand five hundred declined to come forward in a contest for their lives, their families, and every thing that was dear to them. With this contemptible force was Robespierre besieged in the Hotel de Ville; and but for the fortunate and unforeseen defection of the cannoniers of the Fauxbourgs in the Place de Grève, the tyrants would have been successful, the Assembly destroyed, and the reign of the guillotine perpetuated on the earth.

When the reaction in favour of the victors, on the 9th Thermidor, had roused the Parisian population against the sanguinary rule of the Convention; when, encouraged by the contemptible force at the disposal of government, 40,000 of the National Guard assaulted 4000 regular soldiers, in position at the Tuilleries, on Oct. 31, 1795, Napoleon shewed what reliance could be placed on the citizen soldiers. With a few discharges of artillery, he checked the advance of the leading battalions, spread terror through their dense columns, and a revolt, which was expected to overthrow the tyranny of the delegates of the people, terminated by the establishment of military despotism.

When Augereau, on 4th Sept. 1797, at the command of the Directory, seized sixty of the popular leaders of the legislature; when the law of the sword began, and all the liberties of the Revolution were about to be sacrificed at the altar of military violence, the National Guard declined to move, and saw their fellow-citizens, the warmest supporters of their liberties, carried into captivity and exile, without attempting a movement in their behalf.

When Napoleon overthrew the government in 1800; when, like another Cromwell, he seized the fruits of another Revolution; when he marched his grenadiers into the council of Five Hundred, and made the stern rule of the sword succeed to the visions of enthusiastic freedom, the National Guard remained quiet spectators of the destruction of their country's liberties, and testified the same submission to the reign of military, which they had done to that of democratic violence.

The National Guard was re-organized in August, 1830, and their conduct since that time has been the subject of unmeasured eulogium from all the liberal Journals of Europe. The throne was established by their bayonets; the Citizen King has thrown himself upon their support; they were established in great force in every quarter of Paris, and the public tranquillity intrusted to their hands. History has a right to enquire what they have done to justify the high praises of their supporters, and how far the cause of order and rational liberty has gained by their exertions.

They had the history of the former Revolution clearly before their eyes; they knew well, by dear-bought experience, that when popular violence is once roused, it overthrows all the bulwarks both of order and freedom; they were supported by all the weight of government; they had every thing at stake, in keeping down the ferment of the people. With so many motives to vigorous action, what have they done?

They permitted an unruly mob of 30,000 persons to assemble round the Palace of Louis Philip, on October 25, 1880, and so completely shatter his infant authority, that he was obliged to dismiss the able and philosophic Guizot, the greatest historian of France, and the whole cabinet of the Doctrinaires, from his councils, to make way for republican leaders of sterner mould, and better adapted to the increasing violence of the popular mind.

At the trial of Polignac, the whole National Guard of Paris and the departments in the neighbourhood, 70,000 strong, was assembled in the capital; and what was the proof which the government gave of confidence in their loyalty and efficiency in the cause of order? Albeit encamped, as Lafayette said, at the Luxembourg, amidst 20,000 National Guards, 4000 troops of the line, 3000 cavalry, and 40 pieces of artillery, the government did not venture to withdraw the state prisoners to Vincennes in daylight; and, but for the stratagem of Montalivet, in getting them secretly conveyed away in the middle of the night, in his own caleche, from the midst of that vast encampment of citizen soldiers, they would have been murdered in the street, within sight of that very supreme tribunal which had pronounced that sentence, and saved their lives.

At that critical moment, the cannoners of the National Guard, placed with their pieces at the Louvre, declared, that, if matters came to extremities, they would have turned their cannon against the government. Great part of the infantry, it was found, could not be relied on. The agitation occasioned by these events produced another change in the ministry, but no additional security to the throne.

In February last, the National Guard joined the populace in pillaging the palace of the Archbishop of Paris; and joining in the infernal cry against every species of religion, scaled every steeple in Paris, with sacrilegious hands tore down the cross from their summits, and disgraced their uniforms by effacing the image of our Saviour in all the churches in the metropolis. The apathy and irresolution of the National Guard in repressing the disorder of the populace on this occasion, was such as to call for a reproof even from the most ardent supporters of republican institutions. The consequence has been a third change of ministers in little more than six months.

The Paris Journals are daily full of the distress of the labouring classes, the stagnation of commercial enterprise, the want of confidence, and the disgraceful tumults which incessantly agitate the public mind, and have prevented the resumption of any industrial occupation. All this takes place in the midst, and under the eye of 55,000 National Guards.

History will record that the National Guard of France was instituted in 1789 for the consolidation of free institutions, and the preservation of public tranquillity.

That since its establishment, the government and prevailing institutions have been the subject of incessant change; that they have had in turn a constitutional monarchy, a fierce democracy, a sceptre of blood, a military constitution, a despotic consulate, an Imperial throne, a regulated monarchy, and a citizen king.

That during their guardianship, a greater number of lives have perished in civil war—a greater number of murders taken place on the scaffold—a greater extent of confiscation of fortune been inflicted—a greater quantity of wealth destroyed—a greater degree of violence exerted by the people—a greater sum of anguish endured—than in an equal extent of time and population, in any age or country since the beginning of the world.

That it has almost invariably failed at the decisive moment; that, instituted for the defence of property, it has connived at unheard-of spoliation; appointed for the preservation of order, its existence has been chiefly signalized by misrule; charged with the defence of life, it has permitted blood to flow in ceaseless torrents.

Nothing therefore can be more unfounded in fact, than the applause so generally bestowed on this popular institution considered as the sole or principal support of government.—It has been of value only as an auxiliary to the regular force; it is utterly unserviceable in the crisis of civil warfare; and is then only of real utility when some common patriotic feeling has sunk all minor shades of opinion in one general emotion.

It is impossible it ever should be otherwise—citizen soldiers are extremely serviceable when they are subjected to the bonds of discipline, and obedient to the orders of the supreme power. But when they take upon themselves to discuss the measures or form of government, and instead of obeying orders to canvass principles, there is an end not only of all efficiency in their force, but of all utility in their institution. Fifty thousand legislators, with bayonets in their hands, form a hopeless National Assembly.

This is the circumstance which, in every decisive crisis between the opposing parties, paralyzed the National Guard of Paris, and to the end of time will paralyze all volunteer troops in similar extremities: They shared in the opinions of their fellow-citizens; they were members of clubs, as well as the unarmed multitude; they were as ready to fight with each other, as with the supporters of anarchy. The battalions drawn from the Faubourg St Germain or the quarters of the Palais Royal, and the Chaussee d'Antio, were disposed to support the Monarchy; but those from the Faubourg St Antoine and St Marceau, were as determined to aid the cause of democracy; and in this divided state, the battalions of a democratic cast, from their superior numbers, acquired a fatal ascendancy.

The case would be the same in London if a similar crisis should arrive. The battalions from the Regent Park, Regent Street, Piccadilly, the West End, and all the opulent quarters, might be relied on to support the cause of order; but what could be expected from those raised in Wapping, Deptford, St Giles, Spitalfields, or all the innumerable lanes and alleys of the city, and its eastern suburbs? If the National Guard of London were 100,000 strong, at least 80,000 of them would, from their habits, inclinations, and connexions, side with the democratic party.

It is a fatal delusion to suppose that at all events, and in all circumstances, the National Guard would be inclined to support the cause of order, and prevent the depredation from which they would be first to suffer:—They unquestionably would be inclined to do so up to a certain point of danger, and as long as they believed that the ruling power in the state was likely to prove victorious. But no sooner does the danger become more urgent, no sooner does the government run the risk of defeat, than the National Guard is paralyzed from the very circumstance of its being in great part composed of men of property. The great capitalist is the most timid animal in existence; next comes the great shopkeeper, lastly the little tradesman. Their resolution is inversely as their wealth. In all ages, desperate daring valour has been found in the greatest degree amongst the lowest class of society. The multiplied enjoyments of life render men unwilling to incur the risk of losing them.

No sooner, therefore, does the democratic party appear likely to become victorious, than the shopkeepers of the National Guard begin to think only of extricating their private affairs from the general ruin. Sauve qui peut is then, if not the general cry, at least the general feeling. The merchant sees before him a dismal vista of sacked warehouses and burnt stores; the manufacturer, of insurgent workmen and suspended orders; the tradesman, of pillaged shops and ruined custom. Despairing of the commonwealth, they recur, as all men do in evident peril, to the unerring instinct of self-preservation; and, from the magnitude of their stake, fall under the influence of this apprehension long before it has reached the lower and more reckless classes of society.

Admirable, therefore, as an auxiliary to the regular force in case of peril from foreign invasion, a National Guard is not to be relied on during the perils and divisions of civil conflict. It always has, and always will fail in extremity, when a war of opinion agitates the state.

The only sure support of order in such unhappy circumstances is to be found in a numerous and honourable body of regular soldiers. Let not the sworn defender of order be tainted by the revolutionary maxim, that the duties of the citizen are superior to those of the soldier, and that nature formed them as men, before society made them warriors. The first duty of a soldier, the first principle of honour, is fidelity to the executive power. In crushing an insurrection of the populace in a mixed government, he is not enslaving his fellow-citizens; he is only turning the efforts of freedom into their proper channel, and preventing the contest of opinion from degenerating into that of force. Liberty has as much to hope from his success as tranquillity: nothing is so fatal to its establishment as the violence exerted for its extension. In this as in other instances, it is not lawful to do evil that good may come of it; and philosophy will at length discover, what reason and religion have long ago taught, that the only secure foundation for ultimate expedience, is the present discharge of duty.

TO MY CHILD.

I LOVE to gaze upon thy cheek
Of roseate hue, my Child;
I love to mark thy quick blue eye,
No sparkling and so wild;
To twine those sunny locks of thine,
And kiss thy forehead fair,
And see thy little hands held up
In sweet and guileless prayer.

Yes! bright and beautiful thou art,
And playful as the fawn,
That bounds, with footsteps light as air,
Across the dewy lawn;
And when the day is over,
And thy pleasant gambols done,
Thou'lt calmly sink to rest, nor think
Of ills beyond that sun.

Thou dream'st not of a Mother's cares,
Her anxious hopes, my Boy;
Thy skies are ever clear, thy thoughts
Are full of mirth and joy;
And nestled in a parent's arms,
Or seated on her knee,
List'ning to oft-told childish tales,
What's all the world to thee?

Moments of thoughtless innocence,
Why do ye fly so fast,
Leaving the weary heart to feel
Life's sweetest hours are past!
And flinging o'er the fairy land
That bloom'd, when ye were near
With light and loveliness, the mist
Of trouble, doubt, and fear.

Aye! rove, in all thine artlessness,
Along the verdant mead,
And gather wild-flowers, springing thick,
Beneath thine infant tread;
And take thy fill of blameless glee,
For soon 'twill pass away;
I, too, will leave my cares a while,
To watch thy merry play.

THE FATE OF THE DUKE DE BIRON.

FRANCIS Count of St Maurice, was born at Poitiers, in the year 1580. His father perished in battle before his eyes opened to the day, and his mother scarcely survived his birth a week. His patrimonial property had been wasted in the wars of the league, and his only inheritance was his father's sword, and a few trembling lines written by his dying mother to the famous Baron de Biron, with whom she was distantly connected by the ties of blood. A trinket or two, the remnant of all the jewels that had decked her on her bridal day, paid the expense of arraying the dead wife of the fallen soldier for the grave, and furnished a few masses for the repose of both their souls; and an old servant, who had seen her mistress blossom into woman's loveliness, and then so soon fade into the tomb, after beholding the last dread dear offices bestowed upon the cold clay, took up the unhappy fruit of departed love, and bore it in her arms, on foot, to the only one on whom it seemed to have a claim. Biron, though stern, rude, and selfish, did not resist the demand. Ambition had not yet hardened his heart wholly, nor poisoned the pure stream of his affections; and gazing on the infant for a moment, he declared it was a lovely child, and wondrous like his cousin. He would make a soldier of the brat, he said, and he gave liberal orders for its care and tending. The child grew up, and the slight unmeaning features of the infant were moulded by time's hand—as ready to perfect as to destroy—into the face of as fair a boy as ever the eye beheld. Biron often saw and sported with the child, and its bold, sweet, and fearless mood, tempered by all the graces of youth and innocence, won upon the soldier's heart. He took a pride in his education, made him his page and his companion, led him early to the battle-field, and inured him almost from infancy to danger and to arms.

Although occasionally fond of softer occupations—of music—of reading, and the dance, the young Count of St Maurice loved the profession in which he was trained.

Quick-sighted and talented, brave as a lion, and firm as a rock, he rose in his profession, and obtained several of those posts which, together with the liberality of his benefactor, enabled him, in some degree, to maintain the rank which had come down to him without the fortune to support it. Attaching himself more and more to Biron every year, he followed him in all his campaigns and expeditions, and paid him back, by many a service and many a care, the kindness he had shewn him in his infancy. So that twice had he saved the Marshal's life, and twice, by his active vigilance, had he enabled his leader to defeat the enemy, before he himself had reached the age of eighteen.

Gradually, however, a change came over the mind of Marshal Biron. Henry IV., his too good master, became firmly seated on the throne of France, and Biron, attributing all the king's success to his own support, thought no recompense sufficient for his services, no honours high enough for his merit and his deeds. Henry was any thing but ungrateful, and though, in fact, he owed his throne to his birth, and to his own right hand, more than to any man on earth, he, nevertheless, loaded Marshal Biron with all the honours in his power to bestow. He was created a Duke and Peer of France, High Admiral, and Lieutenant-General of the king's armies; and many a post of distinction and emolument, raised his revenues and his dignity together. But still he was not satisfied: pride, ambition, and discontent, took possession of his heart; and he meditated schemes of elevating himself, till the insanity of ambition led him to thoughts of treason. His manners, too, grew morose and haughty: he was reserved and distant to those he had formerly favoured, and his household became cold and stately.

At the same time, a change, but a very different change, had taken place in the bosom of the young St Maurice; and to explain what that change was, a fact must be mentioned, which is in itself a key to all the new feelings, and the new thoughts, the new speculations, and the new hopes, which entered into the bosom of the young, but fortuneless Count, about the end of the year 1600. About eight years before that period, there had been added to the family of the Duke de Biron a young niece, of about nine years old, a lively gentle girl, with bright fair hair and soft blue eyes, and pretty childish features, that had no look but that of innocence, when they were in repose, but which occasionally took a glance of bright, happy eagerness, with which we might suppose an angel gazing on the completion of some bright and mighty work. In her childhood, she played with the young St Maurice, till they loved each other as children love; and just at that age when such things become dangerous to a young girl's heart, fluttering between infancy and womanhood, the Duke de Biron was ordered to Brussels on the arrangements of the peace, and taking St Maurice with him, he sent Mademoiselle de la Roche sur Matne to a convent, which she thought very hard, for her father and mother were both dead, and all that she loved on earth the Duke carried away with him.

St Maurice was left behind at Brussels to terminate some business which Marshal Biron had not concluded, and when, after some lapse of time, he returned to France, and joined the Duke at the Citadel of Bourg, where that nobleman commanded for the King, he found Marie de la Roche no longer the same being he had left her. The bud had at once burst forth into a flower, and a flower of most transcendent loveliness. The form which his arm had encircled a thousand times, in boyish sport, had changed in the whole tone of its beauty. Every line, every movement, breathed a different spirit, and woke a different feeling. The features too, though soft as infancy, had lost the roundness of infancy, and in the still innocent imploring eyes, which yet called up all the memory of the past, there was an eloquent glance beaming from a woman's heart, in which childhood was outshone. The young Count felt no alteration in herself, but was dazzled and surprised with the change in her, and felt a sudden diffidence take possession of him, which the first warm unchanged welcome could hardly dispel. She seemed scarce to dream that there was a difference, for the time that she had spent in the convent was an unfilled blank, which afforded scarce a circumstance to mark the passage of a brief two years. The Duke de Biron received his young follower with rough kindness, but there were always various causes which kept him more from the society of St Maurice than formerly. There were many strangers about him, some of whom were Italians, and St Maurice saw that much private business was transacted, from a knowledge of which he was purposely excluded. The Duke would take long, and almost solitary rides, or go upon distant expeditions, to visit the different posts under his government, and then, instead of commanding at once the young soldier's company, he left him to escort Mademoiselle de la Roche to this fair sight, or that beautiful view. In the pride and selfishness of his heart, he never dreamed it possible that the poor and friendless Count of St Maurice would dare to love the niece of the great Duke de Biron, or that Marie de la Roche would ever feel towards him in any other way than as the dependent follower of her uncle. But he knew not human nature. Mademoiselle de la Roche leaned upon the arm of St Maurice as they strayed through the beautiful scenery near Bourg, or yielded her light form to his grasp, as he lifted her on horseback, or listened to him while he told of battles and dangers when he had followed her uncle to the field, or gazed upon his flashing features and speaking eye while he spoke of great deeds, till her heart beat almost to pain whenever his step sounded along the corridors, and her veins thrilled at the slightest touch of his hand. St Maurice, too, for months plunged blindly into the vortex before him. He thought not—he hesitated not at the consequences. But one feeling, one emotion, one passion filled his bosom,—annihilated foresight, prudence, reflection altogether,—took possession of heart and brain, and left the only object for his mind's conception—love!

It went on silently in the bosom of each; they spoke not what was in their hearts; they hardly dared to look in each other's eyes for fear the secret should find too eloquent a voice; and yet they each felt and knew, that loving, they were beloved. They could not but know it, for, constantly together, there were a thousand voiceless unconscious modes of expression, which told again and again a tale that was but too dear to the heart of each. And yet there is something in the strong confirmation of language which each required for the full satisfaction of their mutual hopes, and there are moments when passion will have voice. Such a moment came to them. They were alone; the sun had just sunk, and the few grey minutes of the twilight were speeding on irrevocable wings. There was no eye to see, no ear to hear, and their love was at length spoken.

They had felt it—they had known it long; but the moment it was uttered—its hopelessness—its perfect hopelessness—seemed suddenly to flash upon their minds, and they stood gazing on each other in awe and fear, like the First Two, when they had tasted the fatal fruit of the knowledge of good and evil. But the never-to-be-recalled words had been breathed, and there was a dread and a hope and a tenderness, mingled with every glance. They turned upon one another.

Still the Duke de Biron did not see, for his mind was so deeply engrossed with the schemes of his mad ambition, and the selfishness of his pride, that nothing else rested in his thoughts for a moment. Messengers were coming and going between him and the Duke of Savoy, a known enemy to France, and whenever he spoke with St Maurice, it was in terms of anger towards the good king Henry IV., and of praise and pleasure towards the cold hearted monarch of Spain. Often, too, he would apparently strive to sound the disposition of his young follower, and would throw him into company with men of more art and cunning than himself, who would speak of the destruction of the Bourbon line as necessary for the good of France and the tranquillity of Europe, and insinuate that a time might be at hand when such a sacrifice would be completed. St Maurice frowned, and was silent when the design was covered, as often happened, with much art, and boldly spoke his mind against traitors when the treason was apparent.

At length one day he was called to the presence of the Duke, whom he found alone. "Come hither, St Maurice," said his friend; "I have brought you up, young Count, from your infancy to your manhood—I have been your friend in fair days and foul—I taught you the duty of a soldier, and the duty of an officer—I have raised you higher than any other man in France could do, or would do—and now tell me—whether do you love best Henry of Bearn or me?"

"Your words, my lord," replied St Maurice, "taught me in early years to love the King, and your actions taught me to love yourself, but the honour of a French noble teaches me to love my duty, and that joins ever with my love towards my King."

"Ha!" exclaimed Biron, his dark brow burning, "must you teach me what is duty?—Begone, ungrateful boy!—leave me—thus, like the man in the fable, we nourish serpents in our bosom, that will one day sting us—begone, I say!"—St Maurice turned to quit the cabinet, with feelings of sorrow and indignation in his heart. But grief to see his benefactor thus standing on the brink of dishonour and destruction, overcame all personal feeling, and he paused, exclaiming, "Oh! my lord, my lord! Beware how you bring certain ruin on your own head ———." But remonstrance only called up wrath. Biron lost all command over himself. He stamped with his heavy boot till the chamber rang; he bade St Maurice quit his presence and his dwelling; he stripped him, with a word, of all the posts and employments which he had conferred upon him, and bade him, ere two days were over, leave the castle of Bourg, and go forth from his family a beggar as he had entered it. Nor alone, in his rash passion, did he content himself with venting his wrath upon his young follower, but he dropped words against the monarch and the state, which left his treasonable practices beyond a doubt.

The young Count heard as little as possible, but hurried from the presence of a man whom pride and anger had frenzied, and hastening to his chamber, he paused but to ponder over all the painful circumstances of his own situation. Nothing was before him but despair, and his brain whirled round and round with that vague wild confusion of painful ideas, which no corporeal agony can equal. The predominant thought, however, the idea that rose up with more and more frightful prominence every moment, was the necessity of parting from her he loved—and of parting for ever, without one hope, without one expectation to soothe the long cold blank of absence. He could have borne the unjust and cutting unkindness of the Duke—he could have borne the loss of fortune, and the prospect of that hard fierce struggle which the world requires of men who would rise above their original lot—he could have borne the reverse of state and station, comfort, and fortune, without a murmur or a sigh, but to lose the object in which all the ardent feelings of an ardent heart had been concentrated, was more, far more than he could bear. Thus he pondered for near an hour, letting the bitter stream of thought flow on, while every moment added some new drop of sorrow, as reflection shewed him more and more the utter hopelessness of all his prospects.

The setting out of a large train from before his window, first roused him from his painful dream, and, though he knew not why, he felt relieved when he beheld the Duke de Biron himself lead the way, caparisoned as for a journey. The next moment found him beside Mademoiselle de la Roche. Her eyes were full of tears, and he instantly concluded she had heard his fate, but it was not so. She was weeping, she said, because her uncle had come to her apartments angry on some account, and had harshly commanded her back to her convent the next day; and as she told her lover, she wept more and more. But when he in turn related the Duke's anger with him, and his commands to quit the citadel—when he told her all the destitution of his situation—and his hopelessness of winning her when all his fortune on the earth was his sword and a thousand crowns, Marie de la Roche wept no more, but drying her bright eyes, she put her hand in his, saying, "St Maurice, we will go together! We love each other, and nobody in the world cares aught about us—my uncle casts us both off—but my inheritance must sooner or later be mine, and we will take our lot together!"

Such words, spoken by such lips, were far more than a lover's heart could resist. Had he been absent when that scheme was proposed—had he not seen her—had he not held her hand in his—had her eyes not looked upon him, he might have thought of difficulties, and prudence, and danger, and uncomfot to her. But now her very look lighted up hope in his heart, and he would not let fear or doubt for a single instant shadow the rekindled beams. He exacted but one thing—she should bring him no fortune. The Duke de Biron should never say that he had wedded his niece for her wealth—if she would sacrifice all, and share his fate, he feared not that with his name and with his sword, and her love to inspire him, he should find fortune in some distant land. Marie doubted not either, and willingly agreed to risk herself with him upon the wide unknown ocean of events. It seemed as if all circumstances combined to enable them more easily to make the trial. The Duke de Biron had gone to Fontainebleau, boldly to meet the generous master he had determined to betray, and the old chaplain of the citadel, whose life St Maurice had saved at the battle of Vitry, after many an entreaty, consented to unite him that very night to his young sweet bride. Their horses were to be prepared in the grey of the morning, before the sun had risen, and they doubted not that a few hours would take them over the frontier, beyond the danger of pursuit.

The castle was suffered to sink into repose, and all was still, but at midnight a solitary taper lighted the altar of the chapel, and St Maurice soon pressed Marie to his heart as his wife. In silence he led her forth, while the priest followed with trembling steps, fearful lest the slightest footfall should awaken notice and suspicion; but all remained tranquil —the lights in the chapel were extinguished, and the chaplain retreated in peace to his apartment.

There was scarcely a beam in the eastern sky when St Maurice glided forth to see if the horses were prepared. He paused and listened—there was a noise below, and he thought he heard coming steps along some of the more distant corridors. A long passage separated him from his own chamber, and he feared to be seen returning to that of Marie, for he might be obliged at once to proclaim his marriage, lest her fair fame should be injured, and he therefore determined to hasten forward, and strive to gain his own part of the building. He strode onward like light, but at the top of the staircase a firm hand was laid upon his shoulder, and a loud voice demanded "Who are you?" St Maurice paused, undetermined whether to resist and still try to shake off the person who stopped him, or to declare himself at once; but the dim outline of several other figures against a window beyond, shewed him that opposition was vain, and he replied, "I am the Count of St Maurice; why do you stop me, sir?"

"In the King's name, I arrest you, Count of St Maurice," replied the voice, "give me your sword."

"In the King's name, or in the Marshal de Biron's, gentlemen?" demanded St Maurice, somewhat bitterly. "You jest with me, gentlemen; my lord the Duke I may have offended, but the King never."

"I said in the King's name, young gentleman," replied the other gravely, taking the sword, which St Maurice yielded. "You, sirs," he continued, turning to those who stood near, "guard this prisoner closely, while I seek for the Baron de Lux."

St Maurice was detained for a few minutes in the corridor, and then bade to prepare to journey to Fontainebleau. The whole castle was now in confusion, and all the principal officers of Marshal Biron, the Count found, were, like himself, under arrest. At his earnest entreaty, the Count de Belin, who commanded the party of royal troops, permitted him to take leave of her he had so lately wedded, though only in his presence. Marie de la Roche sur Marue was drowned in tears, but alarm for her uncle's safety easily accounted for that, and the few low words of comfort and assurance which St Maurice spoke, betrayed not at all, the secret of their union. She suffered him to speak uninterrupted but by her sobs; but when he bent over her hand to raise it to his lips, with the formal courtesy of the day, all was forgotten but her love and her despair, and casting herself into his arms, she hid her eyes upon his shoulder, and wept with the bitter agonizing tears of unavailing love.

The old Count de Belin gently unclasped her arms, and removed St Maurice, who turned, and grasping his hand, said, with a meaning look, "Sir, you are a soldier and a gentleman—our confidence, I am sure, is safe?"

"Upon my honour," replied the officer, laying his hand upon his heart, and St Maurice was satisfied. He was soon after put on horseback, and conducted with several others to Fontainebleau, from whence he was immediately carried to Paris, and lodged in the Bastille. But it may be now time to turn to him whose weak ambition had brought ruin on his own head.

As is well known, the Duke de Biron, summoned by the King to his presence on clear information of his treason, proceeded at once to Fontainebleau, depending fully on the fidelity of the very man who had betrayed him, and entered the gardens in which Henry was walking, at the very moment when the monarch was declaring, that beyond all doubt he would not come. He advanced at once towards the King, and Henry, whose frank and generous heart would fain have believed him less guilty than he really was, embraced him according to his custom, saying, "You did well to come, Lord Duke, otherwise I should have gone to seek you;" and, taking him by the hand, he led him into another garden, where he could speak with him unobserved. There Henry at once, with the noble candour of a noble heart, told him that good information had been received, of his having carried on a long correspondence with the enemies of the state. "Speak the truth, my lord," he added; "tell me all, and, good faith, no one shall know it; the matter shall go no further, and all it shall cost you shall be a sincere repentance."

The Marshal replied, proudly, that he had nothing to confess, and that his purpose in coming, was to meet his accusers. There was a rudeness in his answer, which was not the boldness of innocence; and Henry, turning away, rejoined the court. Still Henry tried more than once during the day to win from the traitor one repentant word. He again and again solicited him to speak. He sent his friends to him, and his relations; and though urged by his council—before which full proofs of the Marshal's guilt had long been laid, and which had taken prompt measures, as we have seen, for securing his followers and dependents—still Henry's heart rebelled against his better judgment, and would not suffer him to order his arrest. "If this matter be tried, and proved against him," said the King, "justice must have its way, for the sake of public example; but I would fain avert the necessity." At length, even at midnight, Henry once more called his treacherous servant to his presence; and again begged him, for his own sake, to confess his fault. "Let me hear from your own mouth," said the monarch, "that which, with great sorrow, I have heard from too good authority; and on a frank acknowledgment, I promise to grant you pardon and kindness. Whatever crime you may have committed or meditated against my person, if you will but confess it, I will cover it over with the mantle of my protection, and forget it myself for ever."

"Sire!" replied the Marshal boldly, "I have nothing to say but what I have said. I did not come to your majesty to justify myself, but to beg you only to tell me my enemies, that I may seek justice against them, or render it to myself."

Henry turned away disgusted, and the Duke advanced through the door of the saloon into the antechambers beyond. At the door of that, however, which led out upon the staircase, he was met by the Count de Vitry, who, seizing his right hand in his own left, caught the hilt of Biron's sword with the other hand, exclaiming, "The King commands me to give an account of your person, sir. Yield me your sword."

Biron started, and a mortal paleness came over his face; for it would seem that he never dreamed for a moment, either that the monarch had accurate information of his treason, or would proceed to do justice against him. He suffered himself to be disarmed, however, and led to a secure apartment, where, after he had recovered from his first surprise, he passed the night in violent and intemperate language, injurious to his own cause, and indecent in itself. From thence he was conveyed to the Bastille, and his trial proceeded in with great rapidity. A thousand efforts were made to save him, by his friends and relations; and Henry was besieged, wherever he appeared, with tears and petitions. But the day of mercy had gone by; and the same monarch who had almost supplicated his rebellious subject to say one word that might save himself, now sternly declared that justice must take its course; and that whatever the law awarded, without fail should be put in execution.

In the meanwhile, St Maurice passed his time in bitter meditations, confined in a dull cell of the Bastille, which, though not absolutely a dungeon, contained nothing but one of those small narrow beds, whose very look was like that of the grave, a crucifix, and a missal. The hours and the days wore on, and he saw no one but the people who brought him his daily food, and a few persons passing occasionally across the inner court of the Bastille; so that solitude and sad thoughts traced every day deeper and deeper lines upon his heart, and upon his brow. He thought of her whom he loved—of what her situation was, and what it might be; and when that was too painful, he turned his mind to his own fate, and tried to look it calmly in the face, but still the image of Marie rose up in every scene, and reduced all the native resolution of his heart to woman's weakness.

He was thus one day cast heedlessly on his bed, when the door of his cell opened, and the jailer desired him to follow. St Maurice rose and obeyed, and a few minutes brought him to a larger chamber, which he was bade to enter. At the other side of the room there stood a middle-sized man, habited in a plain suit of rusty black velvet, with strong marked aquiline features, and grey hair and beard. His eye was keen and quick, his forehead broad and high, and there was something peculiar in the firm rooted attitude with which he stood, bending his eyes upon the open door. Even had St Maurice never seen him before, he could never have doubted that he was a King.

"Come hither, Sir Count," said Henry IV. abruptly, "and tell me all you know of this treason of the Duke de Biron. Tell me all, tell me true, and, by my faith, you shall have full pardon."

"Sire," replied St Maurice, "when my father died in the service of your majesty, and my mother left this world a few days after my birth, I was left a penniless orphan, for all our fortunes had been lost in your royal cause——" Henry knitted his brow—"I was a beggar," continued St Maurice, "and the Duke de Biron took pity on me—brought me up—led me to the field—protected—provided for me"——

"Hold! hold! hold!" cried the King. "Say no more! say no more—get you gone—yet stay—I seek not, sir, this unhappy man's death. Justice shall be done, but no more than justice—not severity. If you know any thing which can mitigate his offence, speak it boldly, and the King will thank you; any thing that may render his crime less black."

"I know little, Sire, of the Marshal's late conduct," replied the Count, "for in truth I have been less in his confidence than formerly; but this I know, and do believe, that he is one of those men to speak, aye, and to write, many base things in a hasty and a passionate mood, that he would be the last on earth to act."

Henry mused for a moment in silence, and then, without any farther observation, ordered St Maurice back again to his cell.

Another long week passed, and day after day grew more weary and horrible than the last. Each hour, each moment, added to anxiety, uncertainty, and expectation, already beyond endurance. The rising and the setting of the sun, the heavy passing away of the long and tardy minutes, the wide vague infinity through which apprehension and care had leave to roam, overwhelmed his mind, and shook even his corporeal strength. Each noise, each sound, made him start; and the very opening of his cell door brought with it some quick indistinct fear. It is said that those long accustomed to solitary confinement, get inured to the dead, blank vacancy of existence without action; lose hope, and fear, and thought, and care; and exist, but hardly can be said to live. But St Maurice had not yet had time to let one of the fresh pangs of his situation become lulled by the opiate of custom, and every moment of its endurance was a moment of new agony. He heard no tidings, he received no comfort, no hope, from any one. The very joys that he had known, and the love he valued most, became a torture to him; his own heart was a burden, and while the future was all dark and lowering, the past was full of regret, and prolific of apprehension.

At length one evening an unusual number of footsteps traversing the court below, called him from the bed on which he usually cast himself in prostrate despondency, and he beheld, from the small window of his cell, a number of people gathered together in the open space, of a quality which shewed at once that some great and formal act was about to take place within the walls of the prison. The Chancellor was there, and various judges and officers of the Parliament, and a number of the municipal body of Paris were on the spot, with clerks and sergeants, and the two chief prévôts. A small body of soldiers also guarded the different doors of the court, and on the side next to the garden was raised a scaffold, about five feet above the ground, at the foot of which a strong man in black stood, with two others of an inferior grade, examining the edge of a large heavy sword, which was suddenly put into the sheath on the sound of some voices at the other side of the court.

At that moment the Duke de Biron was brought in through the opposite door, accompanied by several of the officers of the prison. His dark swarthy countenance was not a shade paler than usual, and, with his hat and plume upon his head, he walked boldly forward with an erect and daring carriage; but as his eye first fell upon the scaffold, he paused a single instant, exclaiming, "Ha!" He then strode forward again, as if he had been marching against an enemy, and came to the foot of the ladder which led to the scaffold. There he paused and looked round him with furious and impatient eyes, as if he would fain have vented the wrath that was in his heart upon some of those around him.

"Sir Chancellor! Sir Chancellor!" he cried, "you have condemned a man more innocent than many you have suffered to escape, and that upon the evidence of two perjured villains. You have done injustice, sir, which you could have prevented, and you shall answer for it before God.—Yes, sir, before him to whose presence I summon you before a year pass over." Then turning to the commandant, he added, "Ah, Monsieur de Roissy, Monsieur de Roissy! had your father been alive, he would have aided me to quit this place. Fie! fie! is this a fate for one who has served his country as I have?"

"My lord duke," said the Chancellor, "you have heard the sentence of your peers, and it must now be executed. The King commands me to demand the insignia of that noble order to which you once belonged."

"There, sir, take it!" cried the duke, giving him his star and riband. "Tell the king, that, though he treat me thus, I have never broken one statute of the order to which my deeds in his service raised me.—Pshaw!" he continued, turning from the priests, who now pressed him to confess—"I make my confession aloud. All my words are my confession.—Still," he added, as his eye rested for a moment on the scaffold and all the awful preparation for his fate, "still I may as well think a while of where I am going."

He then spoke for a few minutes with the priest who stood by his side. His countenance grew calmer and graver; and after having received absolution and the sacrament, he looked for a brief space up towards the sky, then knelt down before the scaffold, and prayed for some time, while a dead silence was maintained around—you might have heard a feather fall. As he still knelt, the sun broke out, and shone calmly and sweetly over the whole array of death, while a bird in the neighbouring garden, wakened by the sunshine and the deep stillness, broke into a clear, shrill, joyful song, with the most painful music that ever struck the ear.

The prisoner started on his feet, and, after looking round for an instant, mounted the scaffold with the same bold step wherewith he had approached it. His eyes, however, still had in them that sort of wild, ferocious gleam, which they had exhibited ever since his arrest; and though he seemed to strive for calmness, and displayed not a touch of fear, yet there was an angry spirit in his tone as he addressed those around him. "I have wronged the King," he said sharply, "I have wronged the King. 'Tis better to acknowledge it. But that I ever sought his life, is a lie and perjury. Had I listened to evil counsel, he would have been dead ten years ago. Ah! my old friends and fellow-soldiers," he added, turning to the guards, "why will none of you fire your piece into my heart, instead of leaving me to the vile hands of this common butcher." And he pointed to the executioner. "Touch me not," he continued, seeing the other approach him with a handkerchief to bind his eyes—"Touch me not with those hellish fingers, or, by heavens, I will tear you limb from limb! Give me the handkerchief."

He then cast his hat away from him, and bound his own eyes—knelt—prayed again for a moment—rose suddenly up as the executioner was about to draw the sword—withdrew the covering from his sight—gazed wildly round him for an instant, and beckoned one of the officers to tie up his long hair under the handkerchief. This was immediately done, and his eyes being covered, he called out, "Haste! haste!"—"Repeat the In manus, my lord," said the executioner, taking the heavy sword, which had been hitherto concealed by the attendants.

Biron began to repeat the psalm of the dying—the blade glittered in the air—swayed round the head of the executioner; and before the eye could trace the blow which ended the earthly career of the unfortunate but guilty soldier, his head was severed at once from his body, and Biron was no more.

A feeling of intense and painful interest had kept St Maurice at the window till the moment that the unhappy soldier covered his own eyes with the handkerchief; but then a sensation of giddy sickness forced him away, and he cast himself down once more, with bitterer feelings than ever at his heart. The world seemed all a hell of cares and sorrows, and he could have died that moment with hardly a regret. After he had lain there for near two hours, he once more rose, and approached the window. The crowd were all gone, but the dark scaffold still remained, and the young soldier drew back again, saying to himself, "Who next? who next?" He lay down and tried to sleep, but his throbbing temples, and his heated blood, rendered the effort vain. Strange wild images rose up before his eyes. Fiends and foul shapes were grinning at him in the air. Fire seemed circling through his veins, and burning his heart; he talked, with no one to hear—he raved—he struggled—and then came a long term of perfect forgetfulness, at the end of which he woke as from a profound sleep.

He was weak as a child, and his ideas of the past were but faint and confused. The first thing, however, that returned to memory was the image of his cell, and he cast his heavy eyes around, in search of the bolts, and bars, and grated windows; but no such things were near. He was in a small but handsome room, with the open lattice admitting the breath of many flowers, and by his side sat an old and reverend dame, whom he had never seen before. A few faint but coherent words, and the light of intelligence re-awakened in his eye, shewed the nurse, for such she was, that the fever had left him, and going out of the chamber, she returned with a soldier-like man, whom St Maurice at once remembered as the old Count de Belin, who had arrested him at Bourg. Many words of comfort and solace were spoken by the old soldier, but St Maurice was forbidden to utter a word, or ask a question for several days. A physician, too, with a grave and solemn face, visited him twice each day, and gave manifold cautions and warnings as to his treatment, which the young gentleman began soon to think unnecessary, as the firm calm pulse of health grew fuller and fuller in his frame. At length one day, as he lay somewhat weary of restraint, the door opened, and Henry IV. himself stood by his bed-side. "Now, faith, my good young Count," said the Monarch, "I had a hearty mind to keep you to silence and thin bouillon for some days longer, to punish certain rash words spoken in the Bastille, casting a stigma upon royal gratitude for leaving faithful friends, who had lost all in our behalf, to poverty and want. But I have lately heard all your story, and more of it than you thought I ever would hear; and therefore, though I shall take care that there be no more reproaches against my gratitude, as a punishment for your crimes, I shall sell you as a slave for ever. Come hither, sweet taskmaster," he added, raising his voice, "and be sure you do all that woman can—and that is no small power—to tease this youth through all his life to come."

As the King spoke, the flutter of a woman's robe—the bright, dear eyes—the sweet, all-graceful form,—the bland, glad smile of her he loved, burst upon the young soldier's sight; and she, forgetting fear, timidity, the presence of royalty—all, all but love, sprung forward at once, and bedewed his bosom with her happy tears.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF SIR FRIZZLE PUMPKIN.*

CHAP. III.

You will not be surprised if I inform you, that after this recommendation from the general, I was received by the authorities at home with the highest consideration. I was courted and caressed as if I had been a perfect hero of romance. Among those who extended their patronage to me in the kindest and most gratifying manner, was the gallant old Marquis of Hardbottle. During my stay in England, which was limited to three weeks, I was almost a constant guest at his table. His family circle consisted at that time—as his sons were both abroad—of two lovely daughters; indeed, I may say, that at the period I speak of, now eight-and-twenty years ago, they were the most beautiful and fascinating women I had ever seen. Perhaps you may imagine that the superiority of their rank had something to do in bringing me to this judgment of their charms; but circumstances have since occurred, which, in my eyes at least, have deprived them of that superiority, and my opinion remains unchanged. Of the two, the Lady Annabella was my favourite. There was so much playful ease, at the same time so much delicate propriety, in whatever she said or did, that while she immediately attracted the affection, she as surely retained the admiration and esteem.

In this family I passed the happiest hours of my life. There was but one drawback to my felicity. The Marquis was an officer of the old school, and, next to being unflinching in the field, he ranked among the soldier's virtues the being unflinching over the bottle. He attached such importance to this accomplishment, that I plainly saw he estimated a man's courage and strength of nerve, in the exact ratio of his strength of stomach. To this failing of his lordship I made myself a martyr. In spite of my wound, which was now indeed nearly well, I felt myself irresistibly called upon to drink. Whether or not my behaviour in this respect was influenced by the Marquis's declaration, that he would consider it a personal insult for any gentleman to leave his table in a condition which enabled him to walk, I will not say,—but his lordship was known to be an inimitable shot, and, on occasions of that sort, seldom to be worse than his word. My mornings were happy,—or, if unhappy, only disturbed by my fears of the evening's debauch.

The drawing-room, and the fascinating society of the ladies, you will perhaps imagine, were a sufficient compensation for any sufferings. With me, indeed, it was so. Every time I was admitted into their presence, I found the Lady Annabella's influence gaining the ascendancy over my heart. I do not mean that the conquest she made of my affections was the result of her arts, or even her wishes.—Far from it. I saw, that even if fortune favoured me in future, as much as she had hitherto done, aye, if I raised myself to an equal rank with the object of my admiration, my suit would still be hopeless,—for though I perceived that her heart was untouched, I knew, alas! that her hand was engaged. The Honourable Henry Fitz D'Angle, heir to an immense fortune and dukedom, was her affianced husband, and I have often thought, since the period I mention, that it was little less than madness to yield to the delicious enchantment of those interviews and conversations, when I was aware that I was only nursing a flame, which, in all probability, would consume me. However, I found resistance to my passion impossible, and heart and soul, I gave myself up to the lovely and accomplished Lady Annabella. Our mornings were often employed in shopping: on these occasions, the Marchioness, out of consideration for my wound, allowed me a seat beside her in the carriage. Fitz D'Angle, who, though an intolerable puppy, was handsome in person, and a perfect horseman, usually accompanied us on a spirited Arabian. I shall not say, when, in order to shew his seat, he made the animal rear in the most terrific manner, how certain tremors ran through my heart, as I sat in momentary expectation that the charger, in its descent, would put its iron foot through the carriage window, and demolish my unfortunate head. I remarked, that during these displays, the lovely cheek of Lady Annabella never underwent the slightest change; and I confess, that without allowing myself to enquire into the cause, I rejoiced in perceiving her indifference. I shall not trouble you with lengthened details of the progress of my affection. You will imagine for yourself the effects which beauty and artless condescension naturally produced; and at the end of a fortnight, I was madly, miserably in love.

In the meantime, my favour with the Marquis continued undiminished. The opinion he first entertained of me luckily made him blind to any little appearances of so unheroical a feeling as fright; and the respect with which I treated so choleric and unrivalled a shot, was attributed to the deference I felt myself called upon to pay to his experience and fame. The hospitable orgies after dinner continued as immoderately as ever, and to me the most provoking part of the Marquis's peculiarity was, that no quantity of wine, however large, had the slightest effect upon his brain. Hour after hour, bottle after bottle, passed away—aid-de-camp after aid-de-camp dropt peacefully under the table, and still his lordship sat with his head as clear, and his eye as steady as ever, relating to us—those of us who could listen—the military and bacchanalian achievements of his youth, and ever and anon reminding us of our neglect, if the bottle by any chance hesitated for a moment in its rapid unvarying round. After a succession of these parties had accustomed us to each other, he addressed me one evening in the most friendly and confidential manner. "Pumpkin, I have a proposal to make to you." I bowed, and waited in expectation. "You see," he continued,—"D—me, Jack Hardy, are you going to keep the claret all night?—my aids-de-camp have a merry life—a very merry life!—Help yourself, Pumpkin—but somehow or other, I can't account for it at all—it is a very short one. About five months, I think, is the average.—Burton, how long has Pilpay been on the staff?"

"Three months, my lord," said Burton, "and two days."

"Is he going soon?"

"Not very, my lord. He'll be good for another fortnight. He'll see out the present case of liqueurs; but that's all."

"I feared as much: his hand has been unsteady in the morning since our week with the Enniskillens."

His lordship paused for a little, and I was in hopes the conversation was at an end; but he turned to me, and said, with the kindest air in the world, "There will be a vacancy, Captain Pumpkin, in my staff in the course of ten days or a fortnight. I fear by that time Pilpay's last glass will be drained, and I need not tell you how I shall be delighted if you will supply his place."

"Is Captain Pilpay, then, my lord, about to exchange?"

"Aye," said his lordship, "this world for a better, I hope—He was always a poor drinker—Will you pass the wine?—something went wrong with him, and he sunk from four bottles a-night to a paltry couple, so we can scarcely expect him to recover.—You will consider my proposal, and let me have your answer to-morrow. In the meantime, fill a bumper; for Burton, I see, is waiting for the wine."—It was a deathblow to my happiness! I looked at his lordship, who was smiling with the most friendly and benignant expression, as if he had been an assassin. What! after I had escaped the horrors of an engagement, was I to be murdered by a lingering death of three months and two days, under the pretence of hospitality and kindness? Better, far better, if I had died at the first view of the enemy; and, alas! I found it equally dangerous to decline the intended honour. There was no saying in what light his lordship might view my refusal. Tormented by these thoughts, the conversation around me passed unnoticed. I only saw before me a collection of murderers, and considered myself the victim of an atrocious conspiracy. I drank and drank, and strange as it may appear, the wine had less effect upon me than usual. The floods of most excellent claret seemed to fall cold upon my heart; and I sat quiet and unmoved, as if the exhilarating agency of the wine were entirely locked up for a season. The Marquis himself, I saw, or thought I saw, began to lose his usual steadiness; Burton seemed transformed into the red bronze statue of an ancient Bacchus, and I felt that I myself was the only perfectly unchanged and sober being in the room. Suddenly, however, there was a change. The wine, which had apparently been checked in its effects by the appalling communication of my being doomed to a certain and ignominious death, now rushed with the fury of a pent-up torrent into my brain, and, in a moment, I heard strange sounds, as of a battery of a thousand guns stunning my ears; troops of blood-stained soldiers, beyond all number numberless, seemed to mingle in the death-struggle before my eyes, and again the feelings of intensest fear took possession of my being; I shrieked and yelled like a maniac, as if in the midst of a tremendous mité, and faintly crying out—the only piece of Latin I had brought with me from school—“Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori,” I fell exhausted among the aids-de-camp and bottles which were huddled together under the table. Before, however, sinking into entire oblivion, I heard his lordship say, in a tone of admiration, to Burton, “The ruling passion strong in death. If he survives for six months, that fellow will die a field-marshal—Pass the bottle.”

When I awoke to a consciousness of my situation next morning, I found my feelings of apprehension by no means removed. No way of escape from the dreaded advancement presented itself to my ingenuity; and at length, with the recklessness of despair, I resolved to abide the chances; and sincerely did I pray, as you will readily believe, for the speedy and complete recovery of the unfortunate Pilpay. I presented myself to the Marchioness. Heavens! thought I, are the ladies also in the diabolical plot upon my life?—They congratulated me on the prospect of a prolonged acquaintance, and expressed, in the kindest terms, the interest they took in my future prospects. Gracious Powers! can such cold-hearted beings assume the appearance of so much cordiality and friendship? In three months and two days my earthly career would inevitably be finished, and they talked to me about my future prospects!!—Hypocrites!—I turned towards the Lady Annabella, who had not yet spoken. She held out her hand to me as I advanced. I took it and bent over it, almost fearing to hear the sound of her voice, lest it should be in the tone of congratulation,—but she said nothing—and in silence, and with a feeling of increased devotion, I bowed again, and let go her hand. That hour finally and for ever sealed my fate; it also, strange as it may appear,—for in spite of my natural timidity, I am somewhat sanguine in my temperament,—gave me hopes of ultimate success; and resolving to set every thing—you will forgive the pun—on the hazard of a die, I announced to the Marquis that I was prepared to succeed Captain Pilpay, in case of his decease.

There seemed now to be established a secret understanding between Lady Annabella and myself. It was friendship, delicate, considerate friendship, on her part, and yet it was so uniform and so evidently springing from the heart, that it was fully equal in tenderness and strength to many an ordinary-minded woman's love. Fitz D'Angle continued his visits regularly; but I suppose, from some undefined feeling of rivalry, there was a mutual dislike between us. I envied him, indeed, his situation, as acknowledged suitor to the most beautiful and fascinating of her sex; but jealousy itself could see no cause for regret in the manner in which he was treated by his mistress. Cold, formal, and apparently unfeeling, she scarcely seemed the same being when conversing with the conceited coxcomb, whom her family, and not herself, had chosen for her lord; and often I have seen her eyes wandering with the most listless expression, during his “bald disjointed chat,” and then suddenly fill, even to overflowing, with tears!—Gods! if I could have summoned one ounce of the courage of a man, I would have challenged the cold-hearted puppy, and freed the angelic mourner from his persecution. But no! I made the attempt to rouse my indignation in vain. Though my life I knew was limited to but three months and two days, I would not risk even that minute fraction of existence against the contemptible destroyer of my happiness.

I pass over the first week or two of my duty as aid-de-camp to the Marquis—for Pilpay, to my infinite dismay and astonishment, died on the very day the liqueur case was emptied. I pass over my fears at night, my enjoyments in the morning, and will tell you an incident which occurred when my span of life was reduced to only two months and sixteen days:—At that time there was a magnificent review in Hyde Park. The Marquis, with the whole of his glittering staff, proceeded to the ground. I must tell you, that at that period my horses—the quietest and gentlest animals I could procure,—were, unfortunately, unfit for service, and Fitz D’Angle, who had remarked, and as I suspected, ridiculed my inefficient horsemanship, had spitefully, and I firmly believe, with the purpose of getting me murdered, pressed me to make use of that very Arabian which had so frequently terrified me even with my hated rival upon its back. Afraid to accept his offer, and not knowing how to refuse, I mounted it in an agony of apprehension, and accompanied the Marquis, who luckily went at a footpace, to the field. The ladies, it was arranged, were to be driven by Fitz D’Angle, in his splendid new barouche; for among that individual’s other acquirements, his skill as a charioteer was not the least remarkable. The day was uncommonly fine, and thousands of the gayest and loveliest in the land were assembled to watch our manœuvres—and yet, as I rode slowly along that glittering line of rank and beauty, terrified as I was at the hideous danger of my situation on such a demoniacal horse, I took a sort of pride in reflecting that there were no eyes so bright, no lips so lovely, as those of that radiant creature on whom I—a poltroon and a coward—had dared to fix my affection. The Marquis, in the meantime, slowly continued his course, laughing and talking with his staff in the gayest humour imaginable. All his jokes—“and many a joke had he,” fell unmarked upon my ear;—at last, after looking at me for some time, during which I was afraid he was guessing a great deal too near the truth, he said, “How silent you are, Pumpkin—ha! but I see how it is—you fire-eaters hate such a bloodless shew as this—you must rein in, man, you must rein in.” At this time the animal I was on began to shew sundry signs of impatience, and bounced about in a manner which added in no slight degree to my uneasiness, and as only the last words of the Marquis reached me distinctly, I said, “Rein in? How can I, my lord, on such a prancing devil as this?” For the first time in my life I was taken for a wit. The laughter at this sally, as it was called, was long and loud, and I had the reputation of being as gay as my companions, when there was not a single individual in the crowd safely on his own legs, with whom at that moment I would not gladly have changed places. At last the evolutions began, and as the troops filed and counter-marched, advanced in double quick to the charge, and went through all the movements of a desperate and well-contested battle, my horse and myself seemed to lose our senses almost at the same moment—but from very different causes. It danced, it capered, it reared, it curveted, and till this hour it is a mystery to me how I retained my seat. I can only attribute it to a total inaction on my part. Passive as a lump of inanimate matter, I was probably balanced by my length of limb, but certain it is, that for a considerable time I attracted no particular observation. At last, as the artillery began to peal, there was a considerable movement among many of the horses on the ground which were unacquainted with the noise, amongst the rest my horse fairly got the command. He rushed with the speed of lightning from the group, where he had hitherto remained, and carried me, almost by this time unconscious of my situation, straight towards the artillery; by some means or other I still maintained my seat, and by a lucky twitch of the bridle, I turned him from coming into contact with the cannon. At that moment I saw coming towards me a barouche at a fearful rate; the driver of whom, even in the agony of that moment, I recognised as Fitz D'Angle, had lost all mastery over his horses, which were evidently hurrying on to destruction; I heard a scream louder and louder as I approached, and at length, with hands clenched in despair, and eyes shut in the overwhelming misery of approaching death, I felt a shock—I heard one wild shout of exultation from the multitudes on every side, and sunk insensible, I knew not where. When I came to myself, the old Marquis was bending over me with tears in his eyes—"Bless you, bless you," said the old man, as he saw I had in some degree recovered my consciousness, "you are the preserver of every thing I hold dear." With my usual prudence I remained perfectly silent, till I could gather something of what had occurred. On looking round, I saw at a little distance the cause of all my misery, the Arabian charger, lying dead; but the barouche, the ladies, and Fitz D'Angle, had totally disappeared. On getting up, I found myself only slightly bruised, with the exception of a considerable wound on my head. My cap had fallen off, and on putting my hand up to the spot of greatest pain, I found the blood issuing in rather a copious stream. I was shortly afterwards put into a carriage, and taken immediately to the residence of the Marquis. On arriving there, no words can paint the kindness with which I was received; the thanks of the Marchioness and the lady Julia were perfectly embarrassing, especially as I was ignorant of the precise manner in which I had deserved them. His lordship who had hurried as fast as possible from the review, now rushed in, and again, with his eyes overflowing with tears, seized me by both hands, and thanked me for my heroic devotion in the service of his family. "'Twas beautiful. My God! how you spanked off when you saw their danger! and that puppy Fitz D'Angle, too, d——, my boy, you served him quite right—you've floored him, nose, teeth, mustaches, and all—he'll never be able to smile and simper again as long as he lives."

"I hope, my lord," said I, "Mr Fitz D'Angle is not much hurt?"

"How the devil can you hope any such thing? The fellow would have murdered my wife and children with his confounded folly, if you had not arrested him just in time. 'Gad, you flew from your saddle with the force of a Congreve rocket, and dashed your head right into his face, bent him back as limber as an empty hayresack across the coach-box, and knocked three of his teeth down his throat, besides one that was picked up afterwards from his waistcoat pocket. You've killed his horse, though, and that was perhaps the most valuable animal of the two."

I now began to see how matters had occurred, and as I was very slightly hurt, I waited with some impatience for the approach of the Lady Annabella. All that day she never made her appearance. She sent frequently down to enquire if I was hurt, and my hopes, both by her non-appearance and by the manner in which the Marquis spoke of Fitz D'Angle, were raised to the highest pitch. That evening the Marquis himself excused me from all participation in their revels; and next morning—how I shall describe the scene!—the Lady Annabella met me in the breakfast parlour alone; she blushed in the most embarrassed manner, as, in a faltering voice, she offered me her thanks.

"Nothing," she said, "could be sufficient to shew her gratitude to her preserver—thanks were a very inadequate expression of what she felt."

"Believe me, Lady Annabella," I said, "I do not deserve such thanks. I was run away with at the moment,—I lost all command of—of——"

"Of your generous feelings," she interrupted, "when you saw us—I shudder at the recollection—hurried on to inevitable destruction."

I said no more; my attempts at fair dealing and ingenuousness were turned off by the grateful heart of that beautiful girl,—and on that day, in that hour, I ventured—to declare my passion, and as I saw a silent and blushing consent yielded to my suit, I caught her in my arms, trembling with emotion, and imprinted the first rapturous kiss on the red ruby lips of the present Lady Pumpkin.

Mr Fitz D'Angle, I must tell you, had been dismissed the day before, and in no courteous terms, by the choleric old Marquis; and this measure of her father, you may readily suppose from what I have told you, was by no means an unpleasant event to the Lady Annabella.

By the interest of the family, I was advanced rapidly in my profession, without drawing a sword—and the day which saw me Colonel of the — horse, also saw me the happiest of men, and son-in-law to the Marquis.

JOHNNE GRAINE'S ECKSPEDITION TILL HEVIN.

COMPILT BE MR HOGGE.

THERE wals ane carle, rychte worldly wyce,

Quha dyit without remeedde,
Yet fouchte his waie till Parradyce

Eftir that he wals deidde.
And the first soulle that he met there
Wals of ane mayden mylde and fayre,
Quha once hadde fallen into ane snayre,
Whilke led tille evil deidde.

"Och, Mrs Madam!" cryit Johnne Graime,

"I wondir mychtilye
How ledde of soche euil faime
Gatte into this countrye;
If soche als you get fotyng heirre,
Then ould John Graime hath cause tille feirre
He hath the wrong sowe by the eirre,
And sorre dismayit is hee.

"Is this ane plaice of blissitnesse,
Or is it ane plaice of woe,
Or is it ane plaice of myddil spaice
That lyes betwene the two?
For there's ane myldnesse in your mienne,
And blitheness in your brychte blue einne,
Whilk sertis sennil solde be seinne
Quhare wyckit demis do goe."

"Ocho, Johnne Graime! are you but there?"

Did you nere heirre of this,
That everilke plaice quhare spyrits fare
To them is plaice of bliss?
That men and wemyng, be Goddis mychte,
Were fraimit with spyritis bemyng brychte,
Stepping from darknesse into lychte,
Though sunke in synne's abyss.

"Ane thousande yeris or thousandis tenne,

Notte reckonit once can bee,
The immortyl spyrit rysis onne
To all eternitye.
It rysis onne, or more or lesse,
In knowledge and in happynesse,
Progressyng still to purer blisse,
That ende can nevyr se."

Johnne shoke his heidde, and prymmyt his mou,
 And clawit his lugge amayne,
 And sayis, "Fayre daine, if this be true,
 How comis it menne haif layne.
 In darknesse to theyre spyritis fraime,
 Theyre Makeris manage and his tyme,
 Quhille lychtenit be ane synnful daine,
 Quhan lychte canne profe no gayue?"

"Sothe it is ane plesaunt doctoryne
 For wyckit hertis I trowe,
 And sutis the lordly lybberdyne,
 And leddyis soche als you——"
 Then the fayre daine, with wytching wylle,
 Upraysit hir einne, withouten guylle,
 Flung backe hir lockis, and smyllit ane amylle,
 And sayis "How judgest thou?"

"Is it for saunteryng, sordid sotte,
 Ane hepcocrytick craiven,
 Saye quhais wyckit, and quhais notte,
 And wyddershynne with heaven?
 Do you not knowe in herte full welle,
 That if there is ane byrning helle,
 You do deserve the plaice yourselle,
 Als welle als any leevyng?"

"You judge like menue, and judge amysse
 Of sympil maydenis cryme,
 But through temptationis faddomlesse,
 You can notte se ane styne.
 Through darke and hidden snairis of synne,
 And warnyngis of the soulle withynne,
 The einne of mortal may not wyne,
 Within the boundis of tyme.

"But wolde you knowe quhat brochte mee heire
 To this calme worlde of thochte,
 It wals the sadde and sylente tierre,
 That sweite repentance brochte;
 Of all the thyngis on earthe that bee,
 Whilke God and angelis lofe to se,
 It is the hertes deippe agonye
 For soulle so deirlic bochte.

"'Tis that whilke bryngis the heauenlye blisse
 Downe lyke the mornyng dewe,
 On lost sheippe of the wildernesse,
 Its longyngis to renewe,
 Till the poore lambe that went astraye
 In vice's wyld and weitlesse waye,
 Is led als be ane heauenlye raye,
 The lychte of lyffe to view.

"And lette me telle you, auld Johnne Graime,
 Though heirre you seimme to bee,
 You haif through darknesse, floode, and flaine,
 Ane weiry weirde to dree,
 Unless you do at Goddis commande,
 Repente of all your synnes offe hande,
 Whilke in your haiteful natife lande
 Haif griefous beine to se.

"Ane glitter synner wals not borne
 In daille of fayre Scotlande:
 You knowe you stole Jock Laidleyis corne,
 And broke his herte and hande."
 And though menne knowit you were forsworne,
 Yet quhan his family selle forlorne,
 You treited theyre complaynte with scorne,
 And broke them from the lande.

"Och fie, Johnne Graime! you sordid slaife!
 It settis you welle to cracke;
 You cheititug, lying, scurfye knaife,
 Your herte is raiven blacke.
 Insteidde of ane progressife paice,
 In vertue, knowledge, and in graice,
 Thou art laggyng everilke daye and spaice,
 And feirfullie gone backe.

"And there's ane thraldom byding thee,
 Thyne herte can notte conceive,
 Worrit ane thousande yeris to bee,
 Without the leiste reprove.
 Tyme was—tyme is—but wille not bee,
 For quhan I passe from warnyng the,
 Ane angel with thyne dethis decre,
 The yettis of hevin shall leive."

"Alake!" sayis Johnne, "It grefis me sorre, *Shorte mercye I shall fynde,
 I thochte I had bein deidde before,
 But howe I can notte mynde.
 Moche to repentance I inclyne,
 And I colde praye and I colde whyne;
 But to gif backe quhat nowe is myne,
 To that I shalle not bynde."

Then Johnne knelit downe in hombil waye,
 Upon the swairde of Heaven,
 And prayit als loude als manne colde praye,
 That hee mochte bee forgiven.
 "Johnne!" cryit his wyffe, quha laie awaike,
 "Quhat horryd dynne is this you maik?
 Get uppe, aulde braying brocke, and take
 Some braith to ende this stevin."

"Whieht, wyffe!" sayis Johnne, "for I am deidde,
 And praying on the skie.
 Quhatis this? I knowe myne soulle is fledde,
 Or verry soone mooste fie;
 For there is ane angel on the waye;
 How lang hee talkis, I cannot saye;
 But or to-morrow, or to-daye,
 Poore auld Johane Graime mooste die;

"And, wyffe, we mooste repente for lyffe,
 And alle mennis goodis restore."—
 "The fende be there, then!" quod the wyffe—
 "Though theye were ten tymis morre.
 'Tis goode to keipe the grip one hoth,
 Either for lyffe, or yit for dethie,
 Repent and prayn while you haif braith,
 And all your synnis gif e'er.

" And take your chaunce lyke mony a shippe
 And mony a better manne."
 Johnne rose, and swore hee wolde restore;
 And syne begoude to banne
 All wyckit wyffis of bad intent,
 Quha wolde not lette theyre meune repente,
 Without theyre frowarde cursit consente,
 That helle mochte them trapanne.

Johnne lokit at all his yowes and kie,
 Orh, thaye were sayre to se,
 His golde he countit thre tymis bye,
 The telirre blyndit his ee;
 But still hee swore he wolde restorre,
 And blamit the wyffe, and wepht fulle sorre,
 Countyng his treasure o'er and o'er,
 And graunyng grefouslye.

They yermite and flaitte ane sommeris daye,
 Of quhat wals to hee donne,
 And juste als spredde the glomyng graye,
 Behynde the settingg sounne,
 The angel with the warrande raimo,
 Johnne felit his veetelis in ane flaine,
 Ghastlye hee stairit upon his daine,
 But language hee had none.

Hee galf ane shiver, and but one,
 And still his golde he eyt;
 Hee poyntit to it—galf ane grone—
 And als hee lyt hee dyt.
 The blasfe of that o'erpoweryng vyce,
 That deiddenyng craifyng was,
 That turnis the humain herte till ice,
 Unblessit, unsatisfit.

This carle was halted whyle he levit,
 I wept quhan hee wals gone,
 But quhair he wente, or how reclevit,
 To me wals notte maide knowne;
 But on this truth I can reelyne,
 That he's quhare mercy's rayis combyne,
 In better handis nor his or myne,
 Whilke meune wille notte disowne.

THE CORN LAW AND A FIXED DUTY.

THE Corn Law amply demonstrates that it is far more easy to change than improve; it is complained of by all sides. It was at any rate to produce steadiness of price, but it produces far greater fluctuations than the old laws; the free-traders abuse it as a monopoly, and the agriculturists assert it admits foreign corn almost free of duty. Improvement is again the cry, and as people in these days will neither learn from, nor regard experience, the matter is to be improved into a much more defective and injurious condition. The corn-growers in various quarters are intimating that a fixed duty would be preferable to the law, and in some are calling for one in lieu of it.

It seems certain that the question will undergo serious discussion before the end of the present Session of Parliament, and there is strong probability that early change is inevitable. On the one side Earl Grey has only asked that a new enquiry may be a little delayed, and the creed of his party may well justify alarm touching its results; on the other, Mr Courtenay, the late Vice-President of the Board of Trade, has avowed himself a friend to free trade in corn, and however insignificant he may be as an individual, his party connexion renders his avowal deserving of notice. The next great question will be found in the Corn Law, and in some points the latter is indefensible. All, therefore, who wish for such a change as will be beneficial, will do well to enquire rigidly before they give judgment; and the object of this Article is to assist them in such enquiry. Touching the off-hand people who oracularly pronounce, that because the law is injurious, a fixed duty would be faultless, we merely observe, we heartily wish agriculture were rid of all such advocates.

The questions to be solved are evidently these. What is the operation of the Corn Law in regard to price and importation? What would be the operation of a fixed duty in these matters? If certain ends be agreed on respecting price and importation, what would be the best means of attaining them? We shall look at them without reference to principle or system, and solely to discover fact. Whether agriculture ought to have protection, or none—whether one price is too high, or another is too low, are matters which we shall not notice.

Commencing with the first question. When the Corn Law was passed, we stated it gave a bounty on speculation, and would cause far greater fluctuations of prices than the old ones had done. This has been fully verified by experiment. With average crops this country barely produces as much corn as it consumes; if they be deficient even in but a slight degree, it must import. In consequence, a short supply of home-grown corn at spring, with the chance of bad weather, must, without a supply of foreign corn, raise prices, and it must raise them to that point which will bring the foreign corn into the market. Under the law, prices with full supply must sink to the point which will exclude foreign corn by means of heavy duty, and as they rise the duty falls. At the spring time of short supply, the importer has a certainty, that if he keep his corn in bond, he will be able to obtain for it a much higher price, and get it into the market at the lowest duty. He has on the quarter of wheat a certain bounty of from ten to fifteen shillings in price, and from twenty to twenty-five shillings in duty—in all, of from thirty to forty shillings secured to him for keeping his corn back, raising prices, and providing a field for speculation. If he have not the means of holding his corn until price reaches its height, he can as easily sell it in bond, as out of it.

At such a time it is foreseen that foreign corn will be admitted at a low duty, and in consequence the importer gives a price for it abroad which will not suffer it to be cleared at a high one; it then passes from one speculator to another in bond, until the last holder can only afford to clear it at the lowest. As it is thus practically prohibited from being cleared until duty falls to the lowest figure, speculators are incited to operate on home-grown corn, by the certainty that price must rise ten or fifteen shillings per quarter.

It necessarily follows that all the foreign corn imported in the year, is brought into the market in an overwhelming mass about harvest; the main part of that imported last year was cleared after harvest commenced. For some time after, the market overflows with excellent old foreign wheat, while new English is out of condition; the inevitable consequence is, English wheat sustains a fall of perhaps twenty shillings per quarter, and only the better qualities are saleable. This violent fall is only part of the evil: with an average price of 60s. very many farmers cannot obtain more than 45s. or 50s., and they can scarcely sell their wheat on any terms.

This heavy loss to the British producer is only partly a gain to the consumer. While the law forces the foreign corn up until it can only be afforded at a high price, it forces the British off at a glut price; the miller gains the latter on his own terms for mixing, therefore he gives more for the former, which is, to a large extent, held by a virtual monopoly. Wheat is made dear a little before and during harvest, when the generality of farmers have none to sell; and through this it is made, when they have their crop to dispose of, much cheaper to them than to the consumers. After harvest, when the average price of English is 56s., the consumers pay one of perhaps 66s. Thus the loss to the farmers is, in a great degree, a gain, not to the consumers, but to foreigners and speculators.

With an average crop, price continues low until spring, and then, if there be a prospect of another good one, the importer will not buy abroad save at low rates; he has the foreign growers at his mercy, because, in general, they must find a market in this country, or be without one. If abundant supply keep price down, he can bring foreign wheat into consumption, with a duty on it of 20s. or 25s., and still get nearly as much profit as he can do when the duty is only 1s. The fact is, it makes no great difference to him, on the whole, whether the duty be twenty shillings or one; if it be the higher sum, he, in effect, makes the foreign growers pay it; if it be the lower one, the difference is principally pocketed by such growers and speculators. As duty falls in this country, price rises abroad, and vice versa; therefore the difference of duty affects chiefly, not the importer, but the foreign producer and dealer.

In plentiful years, very large importations of wheat can be made with a duty of 25s. per quarter. A gazette price of 60s. or 61s. will admit of such an import as will speedily sink it several shillings. Nothing can be more erroneous than the idea that price will fall no farther than is necessary for making the duty a prohibition; if at 59s. it make the duty a prohibition, it must, in plentiful times, fall to 55s.

Many people argue that the Corn Law affords scarcely any protection, because it admits great part of the foreign wheat at a duty almost nominal. This is erroneous. If the duty were never lower than 10s., the foreign grower would obtain less for his wheat, and in general the British consumer would pay no more for it than he does at present; importation would be a little smaller, but the British farmer, save in years of great scarcity, would gain no higher prices of moment.

The present Corn Law, therefore, compels the average price of wheat to fluctuate between about 54s. and 75s.; with it, such price must, of necessity, fluctuate to this violent extent almost annually. Let us now enquire how a fixed duty would operate.

Two very different parties advocate one; the first consists of the professed friends of agriculture, who have not, as far as we know, stated what duty would please them. As we imagine they would require a high one, we will look first at one of 20s. At spring, with short supply and the chance of bad weather, there would be a certainty that price would rise greatly, if foreign wheat should be kept from consumption; the importer, of course, would have a large bounty, amply sufficient to be irresistible with him, on keeping his wheat back and raising prices; in addition, he could sell this wheat as readily in bond as out of it.

We have said a duty of 10s. per quarter would not much affect importation and price; one of 20s., however, would affect them greatly. With an average price of 72s., importation would be far larger under a duty of 10s. than under one of 20s.; probably 82s. would be requisite for gaining the same supply with the higher duty, which 72s. would gain with the lower one. Price must, of necessity, be higher or lower, as supply is smaller or larger. The certainty that England must import always, raises prices abroad, but at present the advance is lost by the Exchequer, and not paid by the consumer. With a fixed duty, all the addition made to price abroad would have to be added to it at home; in consequence, no considerable quantity of foreign wheat could be taken out of bond, or imported, until price should rise to perhaps 80s.

Thus, with a fixed duty of 20s., there would be about the same keeping of foreign wheat from consumption—speculation and advance of price—overflow of foreign, and sudden fall of English wheat, at the close of harvest—which are now witnessed. The main difference would be, wheat at the highest point would be several shillings per quarter dearer with the duty than it is with the existing law.

We have assumed, that, in plentiful moments, a duty of about 27s. is necessary for constituting a prohibition, when the average price is about 60s. Of course, to make a fixed duty of 20s. a prohibition, the average price must be 53s. We have said, that in such moments the average price must be several shillings below that which makes the duty a prohibition; the fixed duty in question would bring a very large quantity of foreign wheat into the market, with an average price of 36s., and it would sink this price to about 43s.

A fixed duty of 36s. would, therefore, compel the average price of wheat to fluctuate almost annually between 48s. and 60s.; in almost every year, this price would be nearly as low as the one sum, and as high as the other.

The other advocates of a fixed duty, who consist of the professed enemies of agriculture, call for one as low as possible. We will look at the one of 8s. With the present law, foreign corn may be bonded at any time; and there is generally a certainty, that, in some part of the year, it can be taken out of bond almost free from duty. In consequence, importation is as free, and about as extensive, as it would be if this corn were subject to neither law nor duty. At spring, therefore, short supply, &c., would have the effects, with a duty of 8s., or without one, which they now have. If a fixed duty of 8s. should have any operation, it would necessarily make foreign wheat several shillings dearer at harvest than the existing law makes it.

If, in plentiful times, a duty of 27s., with an average price of about 60s., be necessary to form a prohibition, it follows that a price of 41s. would be required for making a duty of 8s. a prohibition. In such times, an average price of 43s., with a fixed duty of 8s., would bring a very great quantity of foreign wheat into the market for consumption, and prices would sink to perhaps 36s. or 38s.

A fixed duty, therefore, of 8s. would compel the average price of wheat to fluctuate almost yearly between 88s. and 76s.

In years of scarcity, a fixed duty would make corn considerably dearer than the existing law makes it.

Thus, the assertions of the advocates of such a duty, that it would make the trade in corn less speculative, and price more steady, are the reverse of fact. Doubtlessly, in times of short supply, it would only offer a rise of price, as a bounty on speculation, while the law offers both a rise and a large reduction of duty; but it would ensure a greater rise than the law can do. At present, the duty is taken into account by both buyer and foreign seller; the fall in it is chiefly pocketed by the latter, and, in consequence, it is much the same to the former, in regard to speculation, as a fixed one would be. A fixed duty would make corn, in plentiful times, much cheaper, and in those of short supply, somewhat dearer than the law makes it; in consequence, it would give as great a bounty on speculation as is given by the law. Under the latter, a large part of the bounty is not felt in the market price, it is merely taken from the revenue; but the whole, with a fixed duty, would operate on price, and, of necessity, give it a much wider range than it now possesses. The variation of price allowed by the law, is about 20s. per quarter; but a fixed duty would allow one of from 30s. to 40s.

It is because the law admits foreign corn almost free from duty, that the agriculturists imagine it affords them little protection. The fact is, it does not so admit it, until their price rises much above what is called a remunerating one; and if this price should never rise above 60s., or 62s., it would be at it equal to a fixed duty of nearly 25s. In seasons of short supply, it acts as a prohibition, until the six weeks' average price rises to 73s., while, with the old laws, the prohibition ceased when this price reached 70s. Granting that foreign corn then enters the market nearly duty free, this is a loss to the revenue; but, in general, it makes little difference to the agriculturists; the certain rise of price is foreseen by foreign corn-growers and speculators, therefore the holder of the corn brings it into consumption at as great a cost to himself as he would do, if it were subject to a considerable fixed duty. A few shillings more or less in price, would have no material effect on importation. Compared with a fixed duty, in respect of protection, the law may give less than a duty would give, when the farmers have no corn to sell; but it gives far more than could be drawn from a duty when they want a market. Importation may be greater with it, than it would be with a duty, in times of short supply; but, in other times it is much less. We necessarily think the corn law infinitely preferable to a fixed duty; but still we wish to see in it great alterations, because it is obviously extremely defective.

All sides call for steadiness of price, and it is demonstrable that it can only be produced by steadiness of supply, with reference to demand. Of course, it can only exist in such a corn law as will, in the first place, exclude foreign corn when there is no deficiency; in the second, bring such corn into the market when there is deficiency; and, in the third, admit no more than demand requires. The present corn law does exactly the reverse, therefore it causes violent fluctuations of price.

We do not say whether the quarter of wheat ought to sell for thirty shillings, or sixty, but it is clear to all living men, that if the market be plentifully supplied with English at any price, the admission of a considerable quantity of foreign must of necessity cause that price to fall greatly. Taking the sum at 60s., it is manifest that when there is with it a full supply of English wheat, foreign must be excluded, or there can be no steadiness of price. A duty cannot be depended on for causing such exclusion; at one moment it will do it, and at another it will do the contrary. The corn law imposes one, and it operates in this manner; when there is a short supply of English wheat, it rigidly excludes foreign; but when the supply of English is good, it brings half a million of quarters of foreign into consumption. This, in the nature of things, must be its general operation, because a bounty is offered by short supply, on keeping foreign wheat from, and, by abundance, on forcing it into consumption.

What, then, can exclude foreign wheat when there is a sufficient supply of English at 60s.? Nothing but a legal prohibition. We are not saying that this would be better than a violently varying price; we merely maintain that there must be the one or the other, and that such prohibition can alone produce that exclusion, without which there cannot possibly be steadiness of price.

In the nature of things, price, save in years of scarcity, must generally be some shillings below that fixed on for suspending the prohibition. If, therefore, the farmer ought to have 60s. for his wheat, the prohibition must be in force so long as the price is not higher than from 60s. to 70s.

The next thing for securing steadiness of price must bring foreign corn into consumption when there is a deficiency; and it must bring no excess. The present law, at such a time, keeps this corn from consumption—produces high prices when they cannot benefit the generality of farmers—throws the whole importations of the year on the market at once, about harvest—makes these importations excessive—and binds the mass of farmers to losing prices, so long as they have corn to sell. In reality it compels the consumer to pay, on the average of the year, a considerably higher price than the British producer obtains, solely for the profit of speculators and foreigners; when he buys of the British farmer, corn is cheap; when he buys of the foreigner, it is dear.

When price rises to the point for suspending prohibition, the law ought evidently to take as much foreign corn out of bond as the market will bear. Suppose this point should be 66s., and the quantity 400,000 quarters; when the average price should rise to this sum, the law might command all bonded wheat to be cleared within a week, provided the quantity should not exceed that we have named; should the quantity be greater it might command the clearance of half, three-fourths, or any other proportion of it. In addition, it might prohibit the clearing of any more for a month or six weeks afterwards. In such case, speaking generally, when the average price should rise to 66s., as much foreign wheat would be brought into consumption as would not only prevent it from rising higher, but reduce it in a small degree; and the farmers would be protected from the glut which operates so perniciously against them for some months after harvest. The consumers would gain rather than lose; they would have wheat cheaper in summer, if they had it somewhat dearer in winter.

Whether the trade in corn ought to be free or the contrary—whether a legal prohibition up to a certain point is a more baleful thing than ruinous fluctuations of price—whether the quarter of wheat ought to sell for twenty shillings or eighty, are matters with which we have nothing to do. The question before us is—what will produce general steadiness of price? and in reply we say, nothing but a law which will prohibit foreign corn when there is abundance of British, and bring the former into the market when there is a deficiency of the latter, but only in such quantity as the market can sustain.

It is our conviction that, putting years of decided scarcity out of sight, a duty of eight or ten shillings per quarter on foreign wheat would raise the price very little to the consumer. The English market is the principal, and often the only one to which the foreign corn-growers and dealers can look; therefore they must take almost any price it will offer them. If their corn should only be admitted with an average price of 66s., a duty of 10s. would leave a price to the importer of 56s., and under it importations would be nearly as large as they now are. Should the law clear bonded wheat at 66s., this duty would fall almost wholly on the foreign producers in ordinary years.

The present system is in the highest degree false in principle. It forces foreign corn up to a high price in order to exempt it from duty, and then it throws all the advance on the consumer; it really taxes the latter for the purpose of robbing the Exchequer. The consumer and the Exchequer jointly lose from it nearly a pound per quarter. While most imported commodities are subject to heavy duties, which fall on British consumers, corn is admitted nearly free from them, although such duties on it would fall mainly on foreign producers. At the very least half a million per annum is lost in this manner to the revenue, and the loss causes corn to be dearer rather than cheaper to the community.

We, of course, conceive that foreign corn should be prohibited by law up to a certain price, and then admitted at a fixed duty of 8 or 10s. on wheat, and a proportionate one on other kinds of grain.

In years of decided scarcity the duty would be added to price, therefore in them government ought to have the power of suspending it.

It must be observed that the Corn Law has only been tried in years of short supply. Let the next two harvests be good ones, and it will bring a ruinous accumulation of foreign wheat into the market under a duty of 25s.

Our belief is that these changes in the law would in the first place ensure as much steadiness in the price of corn as the variation of seasons will admit of. Secondly, they would cause corn to be on the average of the year cheaper rather than dearer to the consumers. Thirdly, they would give better prices to the British producers. And fourthly, they would add a considerable sum to the revenue.

If we be in error, it is at any rate certain that those who wish to judge correctly of the question, must examine it as we have done. Yet who does so examine it? Do the landowners, and their scribes, who decide with so much ease and confidence that a fixed duty would be better than the law, assign any substantial reasons for their decision? No, they stand on the assertion—foreign corn is admitted almost free of duty, therefore the law yields no protection. It is evident enough that they imagine a fixed duty would add its amount to price in moments of short supply; and that they never bestow a thought touching what it would do in those of abundance. To make price higher when it is remunerative, they would make it lower when it is ruinous.

There is another set of agriculturists who declaim against taxes, and profess they would consent to a free trade in corn, if they could have them reduced sufficiently. Do these men support their doctrines by argument and calculation? They stand on assumptions which are manifestly groundless. They speak of poor-rates;—in a large part of England, these only form a tax of about a shilling per quarter on the corn sold; in other parts where they are heavy, wages are low in proportion, therefore the landowner gains in rent much of what he has to allow for poor-rates. If a farm in Sussex pay yearly fifty pounds more for poor-rates, and fifty pounds less for wages, than one of the same size in Yorkshire; such rates are really no greater a burden to the Sussex landowner, than they are to the Yorkshire one. It must be remembered, that the continental corn countries have what is equivalent to poor-rates.

Then these men clamour against the malt-duty. It is paid chiefly by the consumers, and what benefit could its abolition yield to the corn-growers, if coupled with the free import of foreign corn?

As to direct taxes, the land pays none of moment. Land in England is less burdened with them than it is in many continental states.

With regard to general taxes, other countries pay them as well as this; let us, therefore, assume, that on the average, the Englishman pays twice as much in taxes as the foreigner. It must be remembered, that many articles of dress, &c., are much cheaper here than they are abroad, and that this goes far towards balancing the difference against him in taxation. Let us farther assume that the agriculturists pay twenty millions of the annual taxes, and that their yearly sales of corn, cattle, wool, timber, &c., amount only to one hundred millions. In each case, they pay ten millions of taxes more than they ought to do, to be on a level with foreigners. This sum amounts to ten per cent on a sale of one hundred millions; therefore, taking the quarter of wheat at three pounds, they ought to obtain only six shillings more for it than foreigners, on account of difference in taxation. We believe that this greatly exceeds the truth, and that the advantages possessed by the Englishman over the foreigner in a market for animal food, butter, poultry, &c., fully cover such difference.

Amidst foreign agriculturists, the landowners draw very little revenue from their land; there are comparatively no farmers or other middlemen to be supported by it, and the standard of living is at the lowest point among the labourers: this is the difference which prevents British ones from competing with them.

It is not necessary for us to say that we are the friends of agriculture, but in fighting its battles we must look at truth and honesty. We cannot say it is oppressed with taxes, because we know it is not; instead of paying more than its share of them, it pays less. These men, in offering to give up its protection in exchange for a reduction of taxes, are advocating its ruin. This is not the only reason why we notice their conduct. Their preposterous outcry against taxes nurtures the spirit of disaffection and revolution, and it contemplates the spoliation of the public creditor.

Why do they so act? Because, forsooth! they must be liberal—they must not gainsay the economists—they must be so far enlightened as to admit that the doctrines of free trade are true in the abstract. For this they despise demonstration, promulgate the most gross errors, and render the cause they profess to support, indefensible.

Turning to the avowed enemies of agriculture, do they speak from careful and dispassionate investigation? They assert that the Corn Law is a monopoly which excludes foreign corn to rot where it is grown. This law has admitted all the surplus corn of other countries at much higher prices than free trade would have allowed; it has, therefore, given a greater stimulus to the production and import of foreign corn, than free trade would have given. They thus put forth a deliberate falsehood.

These people assert, farther, that foreign corn, bought by this country, must be paid for wholly with manufactures, and that by its exclusion, the export of the latter is prevented. As the law causes the price of foreign corn to be higher, and the import to be larger than they would be with free trade; it, of necessity, on their own doctrines, makes the export of manufactures greater than free trade would make it. Here they put forth another gross falsehood.

These men make it a fundamental principle, that variations in the price of corn must affect rent alone. In addition to the evidence of all history, the present state of England proves, that in their natural operation, they affect rent the least, and fall principally on the wages of husbandry labour. It is evident to all, that the landowners could now obtain the rents they received before the reduction in prices, of late years, and throw the reduction on such wages. These very men are practically confessing it, for instead of leaving rents to be regulated by the common laws of bargain, they bully and intimidate the landowners into a reduction of them. They here put forth another manifest falsehood.

What is their object? It is to mislead and inflame the ignorant.

There is another set of people who pretend to favour free trade in corn, not from hostility to agriculture, but for the sake of common good. Do they stand on enquiry and proof? No, with them, all is ignorant assertion—prohibition is wrong, no matter what may be its fruits; free trade is right, however ruinously it may operate; the object of legislation is to practise doctrine in contempt of consequence. They are utterly incapable of understanding the question, and they do not attempt it. They are sordid traders in place and creed, who take up any opinion which is calculated to promote their personal benefit.

And there is another set of men who despise investigation, because they are pledged. They voted for the Corn Law, they belong to the parties from which it emanated, therefore they pronounce it faultless. All the evils experienced under it, are produced by change of currency, bad seasons, or any cause, save its defects. To escape the confession of their own errors, they close their ears to argument, and insist that the most decisive demonstrations are false, and below notice.

Yet, it is self-evident to every human being, that if the regulations for the import of foreign corn be not framed upon comprehensive investigation, severe fact and accurate deduction, in total disregard of abstract doctrine and prejudice, they must operate most injuriously against the interests of manufactures, trade, and the empire at large, putting those of the agriculturists out of the question. If this truth be disregarded by all other men, it ought at least to be attended to by landowners and farmers: we, therefore, call on them to examine deeply and dispassionately, before they pledge themselves.

— Mode sumpta veste virih !
Hon.

Zooks ! I must woo the Muse to-day,
Though line before I'd never wrote !
" On what occasion ? " do you say ?
OUR DICK HAS GOT A LONG-TAIL'D COAT !!

Not a coatee, which soldiers wear
Button'd up high about the throat,
But easy, flowing, debonair,
In short a civil long-tail'd Coat.

A smarter you'll not find in town
Cut by Nugee, that Snip of note ;
A very quiet olive-brown
's the colour of Dick's long-tail'd Coat.

Gay jackets clothe the stately Pole,
The proud Hungarian, and the Croat,
Yet Esterhazy, on the whole,
Looks best when in a long-tail'd Coat.

Lord Byron most admired, we know,
The Albanian dress, or Suliote,
But then he died some years ago,
And never saw Dick's long-tail'd Coat.

Or, past all doubt, the Poet's theme
Had never been the " White Capote,"
Had he once view'd, in Fancy's dream,
The glories of Dick's long-tail'd Coat !

We also know on Highland kilt
Poor dear Glengary used to dote,
And had esteem'd it actual guilt
- I " the Gael " to wear a long-tail'd Coat.

No wonder 'twould his eyes annoy,
Monkbarns himself would never quote
" Sir Robert Sibbald," " Gordon," " Roy,"
Or " Stukely " for a long-tail'd Coat.

Jackets may do to ride a race,
Or row in, when one's in a boat ;
But, in the Boudoir, sure, for grace
There's nothing like Dick's long-tail'd Coat.

Of course, in climbing up a tree,
On terra-firma, or afloat,
To mount the giddy top-mast, he
Would doff awhile his long-tail'd Coat.

What makes you simper, then, and sneer ?
From out your own eye pull the mote !
A pretty thing for you to jeer !
Haven't you, too, got a long-tail'd Coat ?

Oh! "Dick's scarce old enough," you mean?
 Why, though too young to give a vote,
 Or make a will, yet, sure, Fifteen
 's a ripe age for a long-tail'd Coat.

What! would have him sport a chin
 Like Colonel Stanhope, or that goat
 O'Gorman Mahon, ere begin
 To figure in a long-tail'd Coat?

Suppose he goes to France—can he
 Sit down at any table d'hôte,
 With any sort of decency,
 Unless he's got a long-tail'd Coat?

Why Louis Philippe, Royal Cit,
 There soon may be a sans culotte;
 And Nugent's self must then admit
 The advantage of a long-tail'd Coat!

Things are not now as when, of yore,
 In Tower encircled by a moat,
 The lion-hearted chieftain wore
 A corselet for a long-tail'd Coat.

Then ample mail his form embraced,
 Not, like a weazel, or a stoat,
 "Cribb'd and confined" about the waist,
 And pinch'd in, like Dick's long-tail'd Coat;

With beamy spear, or biting axe,
 To right and left he thrust and smote—
 Ah! what a change! no sinewy thwacks
 Fall from a modern long-tail'd Coat!

For stalwart knights, a puny race
 In stays, with locks en papillote,
 While cuirass, cuisses, greaves give place,
 To silk-net Tights, and long-tail'd Coat!

Worse changes still! now, well-a-day!
 A few cant phrases learnt by rote
 Each beardless boob spouts away,
 A Solon, in a long-tail'd Coat!

Prates of "The march of intellect"—
 —"The schoolmaster," a Patriote
 So noble, who could ere suspect
 Had just put on a long-tail'd Coat?

Alack! Alack! that every thickskull'd lad must find an antidote
 For England's woes, because, like Dick,
 He has put on a long tail'd Coat!

But lo! my rhymes begin to fall,
 Nor can I longer time devote!
 Thus rhyme and time cut short the tale,
 The long tale of Dick's long-tail'd Coat!

PARLIAMENTARY SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

No. IV.

THE REFORM BILL.

SINCE the close of our last record of Parliamentary proceedings, the subjects discussed have been various and important; but as public attention is at present almost wholly devoted to the Reform Question, we shall content ourselves with a very brief notice of what preceded it, in order that we may dwell more at large upon the all-engrossing subject.

There was a discussion on the affairs of Belgium, in which Mr Hume displayed his accustomed freedom from the trammels of accurate statement and correct reasoning. Lord Palmerston spoke like a Whig Minister acting on Tory principles; and Sir Robert Peel shewed that the air of the opposition side of the House, had a marvellously bracing effect upon his powers as a parliamentary speaker—he put us in mind of “young Peel,” who won golden opinions some sixteen or seventeen years ago. A new measure, touching the Game Laws, was brought forward by Lord Althorpe, which is to be regretted, as the Game Laws require amendment, and my Lord Blunder is not the man to amend any thing. Mr Perceval brought forward his motion respecting a General Fast, and delivered a speech which we would advise every one who has the time to spare, to read in the Mirror of Parliament; as, not being suited to the taste of the newspaper reporters, it was contemptuously treated by their high mightinesses. Alderman Walthman proposed his “string of resolutions” respecting Imports and Exports. The worthy Alderman has a glimmering of a right notion in his head upon these matters, but his “string” was so dreadfully tangled and perplexed, that no living man could clearly perceive the thread of his argument. The quantity of value, and value of quantity, were so mixed up in his arithmetical calculations, that the honourable House, like Milton’s council of the fallen angels, could and rejected the “string” altogether. Burke, or some other worthy, makes obscurity an essential of the sublime; if this be true, the worthy Alderman possesses at least one quality towards making up sublimity of genius. Mr Hobhouse brought forward a measure to regulate the hours and mode of employment in cotton factories, which, as it happened to be recommended by the sound sense and humanity of its object, was consistently opposed by “the honourable Member for Middlesex,” as Mr Joseph Hume is now almost exclusively called, though the honest old Whig gentleman Mr Byng, his colleague, has been member, we believe, ever since the flood, or, at all events, since leather breeches were invented, which is no modern occurrence. That “huge pile” of national extravagance and architectural folly, or something worse than folly, Buckingham Palace, came under discussion. A committee was appointed, and if they do their duty, we shall hear more of this in due season. The Irish Union (O’Connell’s folly), and the alterations of the Budget (Althorpe’s folly), took up considerable time, and caused the taking down of many speeches. The Poor Laws were discussed for the eleven hundred and fifty-fifth time. Evesham Borough Distranchisement, of which we shall probably hear much again, and the Steam-boat Tax, of which we shall probably not hear much again, were both debated. Greek affairs were mentioned, upon which (incredible dictu!) Mr Hume could not keep silent. Our relations with Portugal were discussed in the House of Lords, and Lord Strangford incurred the high displeasure of Ministers, by shewing the palpable infraction of treaties which the precious budget scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer involved. In the same House, the details of a reform in the Court of Chancery, were stated by the Lord Chancellor Brougham. The rankness of the job at which this reform aims, begins now to be pretty well understood.

The learned lord must have had great reliance on the stolidity of the public, when he supposed that such barefaced cupidity of power and patronage would pass current for moderation and self-denial.

To return to the Commons—the Sugar Duties were discussed, and Charley Grant played the independent, and differed from his colleagues, while Sir James Graham bridled up like a pompous old lady, and talked big, and Sir Robert Peel feeling that the time was not yet come, refrained from turning out the Ministers by a division. The Army Estimates were brought forward, in which Sir Henry Hardinge exposed a tricky omission, to make the amount appear less than it really was; and the Navy Estimates also came before the House, when Sir James Graham, not having any thing to say for what he had done himself, attacked the financial arrangements of his predecessors. Lord Howick brought forward a bill for the Encouragement of Emigration, which is likely to repose in the silence of contempt; and lastly, and on the last of the month, Mr O'Connell once more exhibited himself as a poor shuffler, who, while he bullied in public, sued for mercy in private. We now come to the “absorbing question.”

In commencing a review of the debate on the bringing in of the Reform Bill, we must confess to some fear, that our theme will be wanting in the excitement that belongs to novelty, for so much has been said about it, both in and out of Parliament, and so few can have avoided giving some consideration to a subject so momentous, that the Reform debate seems already as a twice-told tale; but it is essential that our pages should bear record of so vitally important an event of contemporary history; and we really think there is still much to be said upon this “great argument,” ere it is thoroughly understood, and the rather, as a large quantity of the words spoken in Parliament, had but little application to the practical question, and served rather to bewilder than to convince.

In the metropolis, there did not appear to be that intense excitement of the populace regarding the bringing forward of the measure, which those at a distance may have calculated upon as probable, or believed to have existed, in consequence of the inflated descriptions of the journalists. It is usual, when questions of very great public interest are to be discussed, to find a restless crowd in the neighbourhood of the House, watching the arrival of the members, as though they could read in their countenances the part they were to take—and lingering about the walls as though the sound of the discussion could ooze through them; but, on the evening of the first of March, the numbers around the House were few, and of a description that made me wonder what interest they could take in an abstract political question, or why they should have taken that particular place to spend their idleness. Small groups of unwashed artificers were scattered here and there, in aprons and woollen jackets, who seemed as if they had just left their work to indulge in half an hour's political relaxation, while a few with long coats, which had long since bade adieu to their high and palmy state, and with faces which certainly did not indicate either prosperity or contentment, stood gazing on

But there was no bustle, no strife, nor no noise, which was the more remarkable, as a considerable part of the people in waiting were women. It is quite certain, however, that that class of the community who generally concern themselves in politics, looked forward with a longing curiosity and intense anxiety to this evening, which was well justified by the event. The government was known to have miserably failed in fulfilling the expectations which it had encouraged; and even the friendly member for Middlesex had, with his accustomed blandness, assured the Ministers, that of the three pledges under which they had obtained power they had failed to fulfil two, and the trial of the third was yet to come, in the Reform question—it was therefore known to be the last resort of the Ministry—the final card upon which their political existence was hazarded; but very few prognosticated the desperate boldness of the throw, which, in this extremity, they determined to make. The attendance of members was as great as it could be—the House would not have held more—and every place to which those not members of the House are allowed access, in order to hear the debates, was more than fully occupied.

At the hour of six, as punctual as the postman's bell, uprose the Lord John Russell, the mouthpiece of the British Cabinet, upon the subject of Reform. Never was a great subject intrusted to an orator of more miniature powers. He is to a great orator, what a little French musical box is to a cathedral organ. He seems to be wound up for his task—the spring is touched, and away he goes, tinkle, tinkle, with a voice like that of conscience, "still and small." He speaks like one repeating memoriter, a language of which he does not understand the meaning, and thus the most astounding announcements drop from his lips, in precisely the same tone, and with the same manner, as if he were moving "that the candles be now lighted"—to this, as well as to the incredible extravagance of some of the alterations which he announced, must be attributed the peals of laughter with which matters of such serious importance were occasionally received. After the usual commonplaces concerning his apprehension in entering upon so important a subject, and so forth, he ventured upon rather an extraordinary wish for a popular reformer, namely, that Earl Grey had a right, by some law of Parliament, to come into that House and explain his measure himself. Now we, who by no means pretend to such abhorrence of aristocratic influence in the House of Commons, as the noble member for Tavistock affects to entertain, could by no means endure this, and our gorge rises at the very imagination of such an interference of a peer, with the business of the people's house; but as boroughs lose their atrocity in the pure sight of Lord John Russell, when they chance to bear the fortunate names of Malton, Calne, or Tavistock, so the name of Earl Grey has a magic influence to make the sound of his patriotic Lord John-loving voice, agreeable, even were it thrust upon the independent House of Commons. The noble mover further stated, that Ministers wished to place themselves "between two parties"—an absurd wish, which, notwithstanding his Lordship's assertion, we are not inclined to believe. One of these parties, he accused of bigotry, the other of fanaticism; but the party to which the latter epithet was applied, have already, in a singular spirit of forgiveness, adopted the propositions of the noble lord as stepping-stones to enable them to cross the old-fashioned current of English feeling; and to arrive at the object of their bad desires. His lordship then proceeded to state some of the reasons which made Reform necessary; and the first was, that by the ancient constitution of this country, all the laws should be made by consent of the whole commonalty of England. To this argument, we may borrow a reply from the speech of Mr Macaulay, on a subsequent evening, who stated, that our ancestors might have made very wise laws for their own time, but we had a right to use the same privilege.

When the population was scanty, and the bulk of it were slaves, the possibility of obtaining the consent of all the free men may be conceived; but it is sheer absurdity to argue from the existence of a rule practicable at a very remote period, to the necessity of a change in order to its resumption now, unless it were shewn, first, that the old rule was preferable in principle to the modern one; and, secondly, that altered circumstances had not rendered it inapplicable to the present state of affairs. Now, this it would be impossible to shew, and, therefore, the comparison of the present mode of representation with that alleged to have existed in the earliest page of our history, is of no avail. But the truth is, that however flippantly and confidently Lord John Russell may talk about the origin and early history of Parliaments, there is nothing in our history more uncertain than their nature and the extent of their power. Blackstone says, that "the original or first institution of Parliaments is one of those matters which lie so far hidden in the dark ages of antiquity, that the tracing of it out is a thing equally difficult and uncertain," and how members were returned to the Michel-Synoth, or

Michel-Gemote, or Wittena-Gemote, of our Saxon ancestors, it would doubtless puzzle the learning even of Lord John Russell to ascertain. One thing, however, is certain, that this great council of the nation, the Communitas Regni Angliæ, has happily had within itself, like the other parts of our Constitution, the capability of adaptation to the wants, necessities, and circumstances of the nation, and has, consequently, frequently undergone changes. It is absurd to tell us, that we ought to go back to the system of representation in the time of the Saxon kings, merely because it was the system then, and it would be no less absurd to insist that no change in the circumstances of the country should induce us to alter the mode of representation now in existence. It does not follow, that because we condemn the proposed revolution, we therefore think the present system perfect. We believe the present system better adapted to the condition of the nation, than the one proposed would be, and we know that a violent change ought not to be hazarded, except for the sake of some great necessity, and obvious improvement. Those who talk to us of the efficacy of going back to the first principles of our representation, from which they say corruption has turned us aside, talk mere folly. These first principles were assumed for the period, and the practice has usefully changed, according to changing circumstances, and the alteration has, therefore, been gradual and almost imperceptible in its progress. Such is the manner of all useful change in states, whose institutions are originally founded in reason and in freedom, and any other is generally the result of popular frenzy, or individual guilt. In the simple days of good King Alfred, Parliaments were not summoned for "the dispatch of business," that is, to discuss regulations touching the taxes and the public debt—the Bank affairs—the East India affairs—the West India affairs, and a thousand other concerns of national moment, then lying unborn in the womb of time. In those days, the great council was ordained to "meet twice in the year, or oftener, if need be, to treat of the government of God's people, how they should keep themselves from sin, should live in quiet, and should receive right." If Mr Perceval were to rise in the House, and argue that he proposed nothing but a return to the ancient Constitution, in recommending that such should now be the business of the House, what a quantity of contemptuous derision would not the newspapers pour upon him? And yet, when Lord John Russell, and others, use this kind of argument for resuming the rule of representation alleged to have prevailed with regard to these councils, they are lauded as having uttered words of wisdom, founded upon learning.

In the next place, Lord John wishes to shew the evil of the present system, and lacking better matter, he favours us with a dramatic scene. He supposes a stranger acquainted with the wealth, industry, and civilization of this mighty kingdom, examining with his own eyes into the nature of the representation under which the legislature is formed, and, says Lord John, if he were taken to a ruined mound in one place, and some stone walls in another, and informed that each of these returned two members to Parliament, would he not be greatly astonished? Perhaps he would, Lord John,—and what then? Astonishment is, for the most part, the consequence of ignorance, or imperfect knowledge, and so it would be in this case. If you, Lord John, or any other reforming zealot with contracted mind, were his Cicerone on the occasion, he might remain in astonishment that a country which, by the hypothesis of the illustration, he knows to be a prodigy of wealth, industry, and civilization, should have become so under such a mode of representation; but if a person of sense and honesty accompanied this enquiring stranger, he would say to him, "These were once places with some inhabitants, to whom the King gave the right of sending Members to Parliament; they have undergone the common vicissitude of time, and their local importance has passed away. But while they were decaying, concerns of a greater magnitude were growing up, which, though they have a name, such as the Banking interest—the Colonial interest—the Mercantile and Shipping interest, and many others, yet have they no local habitation to which a right of representation could be affixed, and therefore they possess themselves of those places to which the ancient privilege is attached. Thus the most important interests in the country are in fact represented in Parliament, while in form the right of representation remains vested in a ruined mound, or some scattered walls." Then the astonishment of the stranger would cease, and he would see in the explanation he had received one great reason why this country was "unparalleled in wealth and industry, and more civilized and more enlightened than any country ever was before it." Such is the description which Lord John himself vouchsafes to give to the country, that has been so many years under the control of a system which he pronounces to be so pernicious. Do men gather grapes of thorns? or is it possible that the system can be so full of evil, from which such results have flowed? But Lord John Russell thinks a stranger would be "astonished," and this he really seems to suppose is argument against the present state of the representation!

The next argument of the noble mover, was in the shape of assertion, and every man must judge of its truth, according to the evidence which his own experience, or the knowledge he has acquired, will supply. He asserted that the confidence of the people in the constitution and construction of the House of Commons was entirely gone. This assertion was instantly, and with some indignation, denied by many members, of whom, several, at all events, were equal in character, and superior in ability and experience, to Lord John Russell. The statement then, even as an argumentum ad verendum, should go for nothing with the public; but even were it granted in the affirmative, though it would certainly settle the question that reform was necessary, the nature of the reform is left untouched by the argument, and it does not follow that by the adoption of the proposed measure, the confidence of the people in the House would be increased.

These were all the reasons for the reform which Lord John had to offer, and he then came to the statement of what that plan of reform was, upon which the government had resolved. We omit the consideration of the remarks with which Lord John accompanied each item, and confine ourselves to the propositions themselves. First, they proposed that every borough which appeared by the population returns of 1821 to contain less than two thousand inhabitants, should lose the right of sending members to Parliament—this would utterly disfranchise sixty boroughs, (cheers and loud laughter.) Forty-seven boroughs which contained less than four thousand inhabitants, should be deprived of the right of sending more than one member, (more cheers and more loud laughter.) These reductions, along with two taken from the four members now returned for Weymouth, would make up a reduction of one hundred and sixty-eight members, which was the whole extent to which the ministers proposed to go in the way of disfranchisement, (yet more cheers and yet louder laughter.) We have already explained how the ludicrous contrast of Lord John's precise and feeble manner, with the importance of the matters he had to communicate, may have created momentary feelings of mirth, but certainly there was enough in this statement,—given, be it remembered, on behalf of the government of the country,—to make —"the boldest hold their breath for a time."

For such a desperate sweep at existing institutions was certainly never attempted before, except under the avowed name of revolution.

But this was not all the disfranchisement in Lord John's plan, though he was pleased to say so—the right of election was to be taken away from all non-resident voters for cities and towns, and the elective right belonging to freemen and members of corporations, whether resident or not, to terminate with the lives of the persons having the privilege at present, and during their lives to be shared in common with all householders rated at or above an annual rent of £10. This surely is important disfranchisement, and though we do not question the power of the legislature to deal with pub-the privileges, nor deny the possibility of its expediency in urgent cases; yet the case should undoubtedly be a very clear and undeniable one, which would justify the Parliament in taking such a course with long established rights. The extension of the elective right, though it diminishes its importance to each individual, is of a very different character from direct spoliation; and the change proposed with regard to the franchise in counties, seems agreeable to common sense and practical utility. The change it effects will be neither violent in its character, nor calculated to throw a large measure of power into the hands of a class not accustomed to exercise it. There seems to be no reason in practice, why copyholders of L.10 a-year and upwards, and leaseholders of L.30 a-year, having a tenure of twenty-one years, should not vote along with the freeholder of forty shillings a-year, and these are the persons to whom the franchise is proposed to be extended.

We now come to that part of the plan which regards the disposal of the 168 members of which the House would be deprived by the proposed disfranchisements. To seven large towns which have not at present the right of sending members to Parliament, it is proposed to give two members each, and to twenty places of inferior note, one member each—to four districts of the metropolis, two members each—to twenty-seven of the largest counties two additional members each—to the Isle of Wight one member—to Wales one additional member—to Scotland five additional members—to Ireland three additional members, making up the number of 108 in place of 168 taken away, and leaving the proposed House of Commons sixty-two less in number than the House now contains. Shall it be said that such changes as these, all effected at once, ought not to be considered and to be called revolution? There is no way in which change could be introduced in the constitution of the House, that is not resorted to, and to an extent fatal to all existing arrangements! The right of voting—the places to return members—the numbers to be returned from the places permitted to retain the right—the number of voters—the positive and relative number of members from the several kingdoms of the Empire, and the total number of the Imperial House of Commons, are all at once proposed to suffer a violent alteration, and yet ministers, and the friends of ministers, are indignant that this should be called a revolution! But this is not all—in some of the places which are to have the privilege of returning a member or members, it is expected that three hundred householders rated at L.10 a-year may not be found, and in such cases a royal commission is to have the power of adding the neighbouring parishes or chapelries to such places, in order to increase their number; and this same commission is to divide counties where it is thought expedient to make two divisions, each division to return two members. In short, by this popular bill, a royal commission is to have power to cut and carve the people's representation in a way which, were it proposed at another time, and by other men, the popular party would rend the skies with clamour, and cry aloud that all liberty was lost. Along with all this, there is to be a reform in the mode of election, the nature of which, from what was said respecting it by Lord John Russell, seems to be nearly the same as that in the bill introduced by Lord Althorpe a few years ago—a bill exhibiting such a vexatious complication of details, and such complete ignorance of what was practicable—so dull, so heavy, and so difficult to be understood, that even were not Lord Althorpe its ostensible parent, the relationship might have been sworn to from the likeness. The bill was of course turned out, and its lucid wisdom is reserved for the "happier auspices" of the present period.

Well might Sir Robert Inglis say that "the plan of the noble lord was wild and impracticable"—its principles are revolutionary—its effects would probably be an utter subversion of every thing established in this country, which legislation can affect. But we are happily guarded against such fearful consequences, not only by the strength of the opposition which this bill will meet with, but also from the sheer impossibility of reducing to practice the political romance with which the noble lord has been entertaining his own imagination, and giving exercise to the eloquence of his fellow-senators. Certain it is, however, that a government allying itself with the most violent of the populace, may have force enough to throw down that which it has not skill to build up again—it might create a political chaos, from which the lucidus ordo of its extravagant dreams is expected to arise, and then sink in helpless imbecility amid the ruins. Against this dark and dreadful fate, it is our duty to guard, by taking from ministers the power of even commencing their mad experiment.

It is to be especially noted, that Lord John stated no practical evil arising out of the system which he desired to reform—such argument as he brought forward was abstract in its nature, and, even if granted, proved no more than anomaly in form. It may seem contrary to reason, that, in a city where there are five thousand men of property, only fifty have the right of voting for a representative; but undoubtedly, to the practical politician, it would strengthen the argument for reforming this system very much, if the positive inconvenience or injury happening to the city in consequence of this limited right of voting were shewn. Lord John did not attempt any thing of this kind in favour of reform; but Sir Robert Inglis did not imitate this forbearance in his reply. He shewed that towns without representatives, flourished as much and more than other towns which had them: that while, by the present system, all classes and interests of the community were represented, and all varieties of talent admitted, by that proposed, one class would preponderate, and others be entirely excluded; that the most eminent persons who had ever adorned Parliament came there by means of the boroughs which it was intended to abolish; that the present House of Commons was less under the influence of royalty and aristocracy, and more affected by public opinion, than Parliament had been accustomed to be, and therefore less in need of a popular reform; that the debates being more public than ever, the popular control was stronger than ever; that a House so popular in its constitution as that proposed, acting along with a free press, could not coexist with monarchy; and, finally, that such a House of Commons would cease to be a conservative body between the mass of the people and the crown. We do not mean to say that all these are self-evident propositions, but most of them are nearly so, and they involve practical results of the very highest importance. Sir Robert Inglis's speech was replete with good sense—it contained the germ of most of the arguments which were dwelt upon with perhaps more eloquence by others, and the more it is examined, the more will its solid value appear.

Mr Twiss principally directed his observations against the violent and sweeping nature of the measure, which he declared would take away all monarchical or aristocratical spirit from the House, in which already the will of the people had more control than it was strictly entitled to, consistently with the nature of our constitution. This learned gentleman's observations had, we confess, rather too much the tone of my lady's drawing-room for our taste; but with regard to the fact of the condition of the persons to whom the measure would transfer much of the elective power, he spoke correctly enough.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer argued, that the middle classes possessed quite enough of intelligence to qualify them to return the members of the House of Commons. This is one of those blunt, plain assertions, which, when Lord Althorpe utters, he thinks he says something to the purpose; but that is only because his views, although straightforward and passably honest, as the world goes, are coarse and confined. The middle classes have, no doubt, quite enough of intelligence to choose representatives for themselves and their interests, but they ought not to be able to exercise a preponderating influence, either upon those above or those below them. It would probably please the taste of the middling classes that there should be no aristocracy; does Lord Althorpe mean to say that, if such were their taste, it should be complied with? Their intelligence for their own purposes is not to be denied, but their intelligence for the government of the whole, cannot be admitted. No reasonable man will gainsay their right to have very considerable influence in the House of Commons; but if a preponderating influence is to rest anywhere, it should be with those whose property, whose habits of leisure, whose opportunities of travel, and whose exemption from the necessity of looking to private emolument, should make them the most interested, and, we would also suggest, not the least capable, to act for the dignity, honour, and welfare of the state. We dislike, as much as any reformer can, to see dandy lords and gentlemen in the House of Commons, and we heartily desire that some mode might be devised of forever preventing such gentry from obtaining places which they cannot adequately fill, and receiving public money, which they by no means deserve; but certainly we are of opinion that, in the House, their manners are more offensive than their conduct is hurtful to the state; and we put it to any man's experience, whether your coarse, meddling, cleverish, confident member, does not often do more absolute mischief in a year, than all the coxcombs in the House. For example, if it were questioned whether, for the good of the nation, it would be more expedient to rid the House of my Lord C— and the Honourable Mr B—, or of the Right Honourable Poulett Thompson and Mr Warburton, we should have no hesitation about ousting the latter gentlemen, who, although no fools, are positively mischievous, and are supposed by a calumnious world sometimes to have an interest other than that of the public in view.

The speech of Lord Leveson Gower should, we think, be read with particular pleasure by every Scotchman, for well did he describe its proud condition, in the ironical description of its necessity for reform. Lord Gower appealed to practical circumstances, and he conveyed his arguments in language rich with poetical imagery. We do not deny that his Lordship is sometimes guilty of the fault of sacrificing force of thought to mere elegance of expression; but in this speech he combined them. In order to shew the usefulness of boroughs, as a refuge for able men against popular prejudice, he referred to the case of Burke, driven from the representation of Bristol because he preferred the cause of his country to the selfish ends of his constituents. "They saw him (Burke) ostracised from Bristol, take refuge on the hearth of a borough, and they felt that though the portal may be comparatively low which gives some of us entrance here, integrity may pass it without stooping, and that, though strait the gate and narrow the way, wisdom may enter there without losing sight for one instant of those great lights of truth, of reason, and humanity, which are the beacons of its course in the night of distress and danger—the landmarks of its bright and glorious pilgrimage by day." Perhaps this may seem too elaborately fine to the reader, but it appeared beautiful and most impressive in the delivery; and the plain fact is not to be got over, that protection from the occasional injustice of popular feeling, has been found over and over again to be necessary, in the case of members of Parliament whose seats have been forfeited by independent conduct, and that the existence of close boroughs makes an admirable provision against this emergency.

The second evening's debate was opened by Mr Hume, who did not advance any argument upon the subject in controversy, but contented himself with recording as a radical reformer his approbation of the measure, and his astonishment at the length to which ministers had gone, though he should have been better pleased had they gone yet farther. Mr Hume spoke with a highly commendable brevity. Mr Shelley, in a speech of some length and considerable spirit, roundly maintained that the members for the places called rotten boroughs, were the best and most independent members in the House—not fettered by local prejudices, nor bound down by local interests, but representatives of the whole country, and thus qualified to view every question fairly upon its own merits, and to vote according to justice and to reason.

Mr Baring Wall, who avowed himself to belong to the class of moderate reformers, delivered a speech full of intelligence, strength, and liveliness, which made a great impression on the House. As a moderate reformer, he was determinedly opposed to the bill, and stated, that before his party attempted to develop their own plans and wishes, it was absolutely necessary "to get rid of, to destroy, and turn out the measure brought forward by the noble lord—to get rid of it should be the first object of the moderate reformer."

Lord Newark did not touch the merits of the question in debate—he would rather support a reasonable amendment on the question than the question itself, but he would rather have the proposed reform than no reform.

Lord Darlington expressed the question in brief—it was, whether the sovereign power was to be lodged in King, Lords, and Commons, or to be transferred to the people alone? Lord Darlington is neither a Solomon nor a Cicero, but he hit the point pretty fairly here. Lord Ebrington supported the ministerial plan, because it went to represent all interests, and to produce that sympathy between the House and the people which had long ceased to exist. The first part of the noble lord's reason is a matter of argument, and we utterly deny that the plan would tend to the representation of all interests—on the contrary, the principal, and, as it appears to us, the palpable objection to it is, that it would destroy the mixture of interests now to be found in the House. The second part is matter of opinion—we do not mean to say that the sympathy between the House and people has of late years been very lively, or that it ought to have been so; but we feel satisfied that, were this bill to pass, the sympathy would be lessened, and, if it be thrown out, it will be increased. Lord Stormont was adverse to the bill, and dwelt upon the impropriety of the time chosen for such an agitating topic. Sir John Walsh, whose able pamphlet on reform enables his opinion to no inconsiderable weight on the question, was decidedly adverse to the bill. He took a nice, but very just distinction, between attending to the interests and to the will of the people.

Mr Thomas Babington Macauley then arose,

'The applause of listening senates to command,"

and rattled away with such rapidity and brilliancy, (we heard an ill-natured person say flippancy,) that the reporters were astounded, and could not accurately tell what he said. He has, however, published his speech, as he knows the world and the trade of authorship too well, to take the trouble of writing a speech without making some money of it. We would have bought it, but that the charge was eighteenpence, which we thought unconscionable—the Lord Advocate's was only a shilling—and not liking to encourage a want of modesty in a young man, we took the learned lord's as being the cheaper and the better of the two. Mr Macauley's speech has been honoured with many compliments in the House, and we are willing to believe that it was "vastly clever," but we hardly think it is worthy of being rewarded with a lordship of the Treasury. We sincerely advise Mr Macauley not to take this office when it is offered to him—is not his fellow-reviewer, Brougham, a peer and a chancellor? He should be at least a master of the rolls—we were going to say vice-chancellor—but as this would deprive the country of his services in Parliament, we feel considerable remorse for having even inadvertently wished for an event involving so great a national calamity. Mr Macauley is, by the by, one of Lord Brougham's "Septuagint," as he calls them, which his self-denying Chancery Reform Bill is to sweep away; we shall see in due time what arrangement has been entered into in the way of compensation. Lord Mahon spoke next, and thought that the whole fabric of our institutions ought not to be destroyed, merely to meet the caprice of radicals or visionary reformers—he opposed the measure. Mr Hunt supported it, and talked of his confinement in Chester gaol.

Sir Charles Wetherell's speech was one of which no report can convey any thing like an adequate notion. The appearance and manner of the man are so peculiarly his own —his gesticulations are so odd—his style so singular, and yet the sense, honesty, and force of what he says, so remarkable, that we cannot choose but highly respect him, while we laugh both with and at him. Never was any thing at once so ludicrous and so sensible, as Sir Charles Wetherell's speeches. The House was convulsed with laughter during his speech on the Reform Bill. The chief force of his argument was directed against the violation of chartered rights, which this bill would occasion. Because Mr Locke said that things should be called by proper names, he would call the measure "corporation robbery." His description of an imaginary scene between Sir James Graham and one of his Cumberland constituents, in which the baronet admits that he could take off no taxes, but had taken off sixty-two members from the House of Commons instead, was given so well—the dialogue managed with such irresistibly comic effect, that Treasury bench and all joined in the universal roar of merriment. He concluded by affixing a name to the measure, which is not likely to die—the "Russell purge" will not soon be forgotten.

Sir Thomas Denman replied in a speech, to which, had the House not been previously exhausted, it would have been pleasant to listen, as it always is to a man possessing so fully the graces and ingenuity of an orator as Sir Thomas Denman; but of argument bearing on the general question we found none, except that drawn from his own individual experience, of the painfulness of sitting as the nominee of the patron of a borough. This is a matter rather of sentiment than reasoning, and when the question is, whether the boroughs are or are not of advantage to the working of the political system of the country, we do not think that an argument of this kind goes for much.

On the third night of the debate, the speakers against the bill were Mr G. Banks, Mr Hart Davis, Mr Baring, and Sir Robert Peel; in its favour, Mr Hobhouse and Lord Palmerston. It is with great regret that our limits compel us to notice these speeches so slightly; for we must confess that, in the absence of any very leading man, we could not have supposed that the House would have been able to produce such a night's debate, of which England at any time might be proud. Mr Hart Davis's talents are not those of an orator; but setting him out of the list, Lord Palmerston, who can sometimes make a good speech, was considerably inferior to all the rest. Mr Bankes's speech was forcible and ingenious, and shewed great research upon the history connected with the question. Mr Hobhouse's reply was full of force and spirit, and made the very best of the subject, but he did not enter with any closeness into the practical details of the measure. The weight attached to Mr Baring's position in the House, and the strict common-sense view in which he discussed the question, gave to his disapproval of the measure a force that very sensibly affected the opinion of the House. He maintained, that "while a mixture of aristocratic and popular influence in the House had been the greatest promoter of freedom and of equal and just laws, he knew of no oppression, of no grievance, which had sprung from their union." What has been the reply to this? Has the grievance, the practical evil, the pernicious laws, arising from the present state of the representation, been pointed out? No. Has the practical good, in the shape of greater liberty, or less taxation, or more trade, or greater plenty, which the reform will effect for the people, been pointed out? No. Lord Palmerston talked vaguely of public opinion in favour of a change—of what Mr Canning's opinion would be were he now alive; and lightly assumed the existence of five defects in the representation; when the whole matter in controversy is, whether these things do exist, or, if existing, whether they are defects? But he pointed out no direct evil as the result of the working of the system which he says is so defective. We do not say that the system is so perfect that no evil result could be pointed out; but we do not find that the supporters of the measure of reform have discovered such a result.

From the speech of Sir Robert Peel the House and the country expected much; and we who have been, and may perhaps be again, as ready to blame Sir Robert Peel as to praise him, confidently feel, and, therefore, hesitate not to say, that whoever has heard or read the speech must in candour admit, that even the highest expectation has been amply fulfilled.

It is, in truth, a most masterly disquisition, both upon the general question, and the arguments (if such they may be called) brought forward in support of it; and, indeed, were it not that the public craves something new, and will not bear a repetition of the same dish, however excellent, we should feel that we served the cause better by a reprint of this speech, than by any commentary of our own. The menaces by which the necessity of the measure is sought to be established, are met, and indignantly repelled—the sophistries and avoidance of the real question, on the part of his adversaries, exposed—the authorities, in favour of our mixed constitution, quoted, (the noble mover of the present Revolution bill being one,)—the disfranchisement of various bodies of electors, without any delinquency proved against them—the exclusion of the lowest orders, in some places, where they are now enabled to vote—the “tendency” of boroughs to become the means of introducing men of talent to the House—the desire of other states to imitate our forms of legislative deliberation—all these are used as arguments against the adoption of the measure, and then he comes to that which to us appears the most important of all. “What, sir, are the practical advantages which are now promised as the consequence of the change we are invited to make—as the compensation for the risk we must incur? Positively not one. Up to this hour, no one has pretended that we shall gain anything by the change, excepting, indeed, that we shall conciliate the public favour. Why, no doubt, you cannot propose to share your power with half a million of men, without gaining some popularity—without purchasing, by such a bribe, some portion of goodwill. But these are vulgar arts of government; others will outbid you, not now, but at no remote period—they will offer votes and power to a million of men—will quote your precedent for the concession, and will carry your principles to their legitimate and natural consequences.”

On the fourth night of the debate, the measure was supported by Mr Gisborne, Mr John Smith, Mr Stanley, and the Lord Advocate, and opposed by Mr Freshfield, Mr Duncombe, Mr Calcraft, Mr H. Seymour, Mr Wynn, and Mr Croker. Here is a goodly array of debaters, and they played their parts well. Mr Stanley's speech was a very able one, but entirely theoretical as far as it related to the question, and only touching facts when it became personal. Mr John Smith did allude to one practical result to arise from the measure, which he seemed to think would be a beneficial one; it was, the disappearance of many now in the House—“many well-dressed, well-behaved, well-bred young gentlemen, but whose loss would be well supplied by the twenty new members who would be returned from the towns to be enfranchised.” We are willing to give this fact, whatever weight those who dislike well-dressed, well-bred young gentlemen, may please to allow it; it is well to get even one practical argument out of such a heap of declamation. Mr Calcraft declared himself a Reformer, but directly adverse to a Reforming measure of the extent of that proposed. Mr Wynn held the same view, and evinced his sincerity by sacrificing his place in support of it.

The high character of the Lord Advocate for profound and varied abilities, and great dexterity in the use of them, led to great expectation from this his first important display in the House of Commons. He was destined to be tried by a high standard, that of his own reputation; and if he in some degree failed, which, in the general impression of the House, and the metropolis, he certainly did, it was because mere excellence disappointed, when something transcendent was expected. He did not hit the tone of the House—he fell into the error, in this respect, which many men of genius do, who adopt a more refined, and less obvious train of argument or illustration, than such a mixed auditory as the House of Commons have patience to follow. They require something that strikes the senses more immediately, and which it takes very little trouble to understand. It was thought that the mantle of Brougham was to descend upon Jeffrey; but this thought is gone for ever: the intense earnestness—the headlong passion—the strong plain sense of Brougham, which made him the wonder, terror, and sometimes the delight, of the House of Commons, are not found to belong to his literary associate. While Jeffrey spoke, it was whispered about in the House, “this is not a speech he is delivering, but a treatise; he ought not to have spoken it here, but printed it in his Review.” No great was the impatience of a part of the House at his manner, that, at one time, an attempt was made to silence him by coughing and other noises, but the vehement cheers of his friends put an end to what must certainly be considered unfair towards a man of Mr Jeffrey’s character for intellect, even though the manner of its display, on that occasion, was not the most fortunate. As to the practical part of his argument, he avowed that the evil he wished to avoid by the measure, was the danger of driving a great proportion of the distressed population into excess, by a denial of their just demands—that is, we suppose, the danger of a violent exertion of physical force, and the good to be derived, was the “infusion” of 300,000 new constituents, who would create an additional phalanx for the protection of the authority, and the loyalty of the kingdom.

Of all the men in the world, the very one whom we could have wished to rise up after Mr Jeffrey, did actually rise—his literary and critical rival, Mr John Wilson Croker. Mr Croker was, and is, we are sorry to say, suffering from severe ill health, but he nevertheless made a speech full of admirable points, some of them rather over-laboured; and his manner altogether too bitter, but still his speech was powerfully effective, and the facts that he flung out, like Congreve rockets, stuck and burned where they fell. After his facts about the history of Parliamentary Reform Petitions, no one could venture to speak of the gradually increasing desire of the people for Reform; and the “principle” of a representation adapted to population, was pretty plainly shewn to be utterly disregarded in the government scheme, though it served to point the arguments and adorn the speeches of its supporters. The quotation from the Edinburgh Review bore very hard on the consistency of its quondam editor, and were we to regard the speeches of these two learned and literary gentlemen as a trial of strength between them, we should be inclined to decide that he of the north came off but second best in the tussle.

The fifth night of the debate brought forward no less than seventeen speakers, of whom, ten were for, and seven against the measure. Of the former, only one, Mr Robert Grant, said any thing deserving of notice or remembrance, unless, indeed, we except Lord Howick, the tone of whose speech excited very marked disgust. On the other side, the principal speech was that of Mr North, which we have heard experienced judges declare to have come nearer the best style of Mr Canning, than any thing that has been heard in the House of Commons since the death of that fascinating orator. Sir George Clerk and Mr Hope gave spirited answers to the speech of the Lord Advocate; and Colonel Tyrrell, in a plain country-gentleman style, spoke effectively upon the question, and put the House in great good-humour, at the expense of Mr Whitte Harvey. The balance of effective speaking on this night, was exceedingly in favour of the opponents of the measure. On the sixth evening, the promoters of the bill rather recovered ground by the powerful talk of O’Connell, who certainly, on that occasion, brought up a great deal of leeway in the estimation of the House. Sir J. Graham’s was rather a good speech, but not so good as was expected, and he made sad blunders with some nautical illustrations which he attempted—he broke down in the principal one, amid great laughter of the House, and got quizzed by that merry bluff gentleman, Admiral Sir Joseph Yorke.

Mr Attwood’s speech against the measure, was, as his speeches always are, full of sound practical sense. Sergeant Lefroy, from Dublin, was not well, nor very well received. Mr Praed’s speech, which was also delivered under manifest indisposition, and at a bad hour of the night to win easy approbation, was one of very great promise. Tho newspapers very inadequately reported it; but those who heard it, were not disappointed in marks of that brilliant genius which has led to his obtaining a seat in the House. Mr Bethell of Yorkshire spoke, but it was not discoverable on which side.

On the seventh and last night, there were many speeches, of which the principal were Mr Perceval's against, and Mr Harvey's for the measure. The former; let who will ridicule it, was an excellent speech, striking home upon the really important matters in the question.

"— Facilis est rigidi censura cachelani."

It is easy to laugh at Mr Perceval—because he puts his religion, perhaps, too much in the van, when it is not likely to be treated with respect; but when a man speaks plain practical sense, he should not be sneered down for a peculiar manner. As to Whittle Harvey, he spoke as he generally does—clever, impudent, hard, and superficial. His support adds no weight of character to any measure—he is sufficiently well known to be, as Colonel Tyrrell said, "not particular to a shade." Lord John Russell's reply was very bad in the beginning, and better towards its close, but throughout feeble in manner, and uncandid in statement.

Such is a sketch, rapid and imperfect it must be allowed, of the great debate on the bringing in of the reform bill; but who can describe within a few pages the minute particulars of seven times seven hours of speech-making? Upon the whole debate we should not fear to leave it to any honest critic, of any party, to decide which had the advantage, sure of a decision in favour of the speeches against the measure. In the mortifying consciousness of this being the fact, the friends of Ministers cry out against the right of borough members to have been heard at all upon the question. So violently unjust a point was, we suppose, never before set up upon a matter, where public rights were in controversy. Why should not borough members be heard? They do not appear as witnesses in their own cause—they are, as members of the House of Commons, members for the whole country, and on an equality as senators with any other members. They are pleading a cause, not giving evidence, and they come forth as champions in the fair field of argument, to stand or fall by the test of truth and facts, which are open alike to all. If the members for boroughs be able men, should we not be cautious how we interfere with the system which brings them into the House?—if they be not able men, why are their speeches thus feared? for as yet it is not the interference of their votes which has been objected to.

We do most sincerely trust that no clamour without, nor intimidation nor abuse within, the House, may have the effect of giving any successful countenance to a measure of a tendency so revolutionary, that were it to pass into a law, we cannot see how sober thinking men could have confidence in the stability of any institution in this country. We think it perfectly obvious that such a revolution in the mode of electing the House of Commons, would give a preponderance to the democratical part of our constitution, which would soon be fatal to the existence of the other parts, and therefore destructive to the well-being of the democracy itself. If we could believe that the common people, or the middle class, (as that is the favourite phrase,) were capable of more happily governing themselves, if all authority were taken away from those above and below them, we might look upon such a measure as this with some hope, but we think no such thing; and whatever respect we may have for the sound sense of this class, displayed in the management of their own affairs, we firmly believe that, in matters of government, a mixture of other influences with theirs is necessary not only for the good of the nation at large, but even for their own peculiar good.

We have looked, but looked in vain, for any argument establishing a link of connexion between the Reform so much clamoured for, and an abolition of the causes which distress the people, check their industry, and thwart their efforts to be prosperous and happy. This should be looked to first, and were this attended to, we should then be by no means adverse to such a cautious and gradual amendment of our representative system, as would give to property and intelligence, a more equal and generally diffused influence; but to be useful at all—nay, not to be destructive—it should be soberly, cautiously, and gradually done. The present measure is altogether rank with the odour of revolution—it stinks in the nostrils of men who love peace, and prosperity, and security, and can only find partisans amongst those whom party fury blinds to the dictates of common sense, or who yield to base fear, instead of looking steadily at a slight danger, which would vanish away as soon as it was boldly examined. This we say with regard to the nation at large; as to the party which has introduced it to Parliament, they appear to have adopted it as a desperate expedient for bearing down the opposition, which their previous ill success had made so strong. Through fear of not continuing to govern, they have risked a measure, of which the bare promulgation directly tends to make the country ungovernable.

TO MRS HEMANS.

Thou hast ennobled Woman, and thy name
 Shall to posterity be handed down.
 Thine, lady, thine shall be the poet's fame;
 And, brightly wreath'd within thy laurel crown,
 Fair flowers of light and loveliness shall bloom,
 Scattering their perfume round thy hallow'd tomb!

How oft the deep-toned magic of thy strains
 In eve's soft twilight, to the heart appealing,
 Touching each nerve, and thrilling through my veins,
 In breathings full of rich and tender feeling,
 Has made the warm blood from my cheek retire,
 And in my breast a slight poetic fire!

O were it mine to tune thy sounding harp,
 And strike the chords of thy celestial lyre—
 To bid contending passions, keen and sharp,
 Quit their strong hold, and at my will expire;
 To raise the patriot flame, and for the brave
 A requiem sing, like thine own Körner's Grave!

But no! it may not be! No hand but thine
 Shall ever tune that deeply-touching string;
 Thou art thyself alone, whether thou twine
 In rosy garland fair the flowers of spring,
 Or wake the mourning for the early dead,
 Or the low plaintive wail for love that's fled?

Lady! despise not thou my humble song,
 And think not lightly of the heart that feels (Though loftier praises may to thee belong)
 The bright enchantment that thy music yields:
 Thou lov'st sincerity; and though my lays
 Be homely, thou wilt not reject the praise.

SOTHEY'S HOMER.*

PATRIOTS as we are, as well as Cosmopolites, how relieving, how refreshing, how invigorating, and how elevating to our senses and our souls, to fly from politics to poetry—from the Honourable House to the Immortal Homer—from the rapid feuds of placemen and reformers, to the deadly wrath of nature's heroic sons—from the helpless limp of any middle-aged Smith, to the elastic lameness of old Vulcan—from O'Connell and Hunt, with their matchless blacking, to

"Atreides, king of men, and Thetis' god-like son!"

We are no great Greek scholars; but we can force our way, vi et armis, through the Iliad. What we do not clearly, we dimly, understand, and are happy in the glorious glimpses; in the full unbroken light, we bask like an eagle in the sunshine that emblazons his eyrie; in the gloom that sometimes falls suddenly down on his inspired rhapsodies, as if from a tower of clouds, we are for a time eyeless as "blind Maenides," while with him we enjoy "the darkness that may be felt;" as the lightnings of his genius flash, lo! before our wide imagination ascends "state-ly-structured Troy," expand tented shore and mastodonta; and in that thunder we dream of the nod that shuddered Olympus.

Some people believe in twenty Homers—we in one. Nature is not so prodigal of her great poets. Heaven only knows the number of her own stars—no astronomer may ever count them—but the soul-stars of earth are but few; and with this Perryan pen could we name them all. Who ever heard of two Miltons—of two Shakespeares? That there should even have been one of each, is a mystery, when we look at what are called men. Who, then, after considering that argument, will believe that Greece of old was glorified by a numerous brotherhood of coeval geni of mortal birth, all "building up the lofty rhyme," till beneath their harmonious hands, arose, in its perfect proportions, immortal in its beauty and magnificence, "The Tale of Troy Divine?"

Was Homer savage or civilized? Both. So was Achilles. Conceived by a goddess, and begotten by a hero, that half-celestial child sat at the knees of a formidable Gamaliel—Chiron the Centaur. Grown up to perfect stature, his was the Beauty of the Passions—Apollo's self, in his loveliness, not a more majestic minister of death. Paint him in two words—STORMY BEHAUING.

Was the breath of life ever in that shining savage—or was he but a lustrous shadow in blind Homer's imagination? What matters it? All is that we think; no other existence; Homer thought Achilles; clouds are transient, but Troy's towers are eternal. Oh! call not Greek a dead language, if you have a soul to be saved! The bard who created, and the heroes who fought in the Iliad, are therein not entombed, but enshrined; and their spirits will continue to breathe and burn there, till the stars are cast from the firmament, and there is an end to what we here call Life.

Homer, you know, wrote in Greek, and in many dialects. He has been translated into English, which, in heroic measures, you know, admits but of one. All translation of the highest poetry, we hold, must be, such is the mysterious incarnation of thought and feeling in language, at best but a majestic mockery—something ghostlike; when supposed most substantial, suddenly seeming most a shadow—or change that image, why, then, like a broken rainbow, or say, rather, like a rainbow refracted, as well as reflected, from the sky-gazing sea. Glorious pieces of colour are lying here and there, reminding us of what, a moment before, we beheld in a perfect arch on heaven.

But while the nations of the earth all speak in different tongues—they all feel with one heart, and they all think with one brain. Therefore, he who hath the gift of tongues, may, from an alien language, transfuse much of the meaning that inspirits it into his own; although still we must always be inclined to say, listening to the "repeated strain,"

"Alike, but oh! how different."

All truly great or good poets desire that all mankind should, as far as it is possible, enjoy all that in the human is most divine; and therefore while each has

Like Prometheus stolen the fire from heaven," they have all exultingly availed themselves of the common privilege of stealing—whenever inspired so to do—and plagiarism is thus often the sign of a noble idolatry—of stealing from one another, that after hoarding them up in the sunny and windy air-lofts of their own imaginations, they may in times of dearth—or to make plenty more plenteous—diffuse and scatter those life-ennobling thefts—in furtherance of the desires of the dead—

"O'er lands and seas, Whatever clime the sun's bright circle warms."

And thus, too, have the truly great and good poets sometimes—often—felt that it was dignified to become translators. What else—ay, ay, much else—was the divine Virgil? Fools disparage him, for that he translated—stole from Homer. As well despise Shakspeare because he stole, not only from unwritten nature and her oral traditions, but from all the old Homeric war chronicles people had got printed, that he could lay hands on;

"For the thief of all thieves was the Warwickshire thief!"

Indeed, Shakspeare, who had "little Latin, and no Greek," contrived—heaven only knows how—to translate into English thousands of fine things from those languages. Marlow was an avowed and regular translator—so was Ben Jonson—and many others of that wonder-working age. But come down, without fear of breaking your neck by the fall—to Dryden and Pope at once;—and then, sliding along a gentle level, to Cowper—and, last of all, to Sotheby—all translators—and who is good, who better, and who best, you sure will find it hard to say—of the "myriad-minded" Homer.

Let it at once suffice for Mr Sotheby's satisfaction, that we say he is entitled—and we do not know another person of whom we could safely say as much—to deal with that well-booted Grecian, even at this time of day, after all that has been done to, in, with, and by "Him of the Iliad and the Odyssey," by not a few of our prevailing Poets.

Let us draw the best of them up in rank and file, and as they march before us, try their height by a mental military standard, declaring who are fit for admission into the grenadiers, who into the light company, and who must go into the battalion.

We shall confine ourselves to the First Book—itsself a poem—and let us try the volunteers by the test of the Opening thereof—almost all educated persons being familiar with that glorious Announcement in the original Greek.

CHAPMAN.

"Achilles' baneful wrath resound, O Goddess, that impos'd Infinite sorrows on the Greeks, and many brave souls loos'd
From brenets heroic, sent them far to that invisible cave
That no light comforts, and their limbs to dogs and vultures gave;
To all which Jove's will gave effect, from whom first strife begun Betwixt Atreides, king of men, and Thetis' godlike son."

DRYDEN.

"The wrath of Pelcus' son, O muse, resound,
Whose dire effects the Grecian army found,
And many a hero; king, and hardy knight,
Were sent in early youth to shades of night,
Their limbs a prey to dogs and vultures made.
So was the sovereign will of Jove obey'd;
From that ill-omen'd hour, when strife begun
Betwixt Atreides great and Thetis' godlike son."

TICKEL.

"Achilles' fatal wrath, whence discord rose,
That brought the sons of Greece unnumber'd woes,
O Goddess! sing. Full many a hero's ghost
Was driven untimely to th' infernal coast,
While in promiscuous heaps their bodies lay,
A feast for dogs and every bird of prey.
So did the sire of gods and men fulfil
His stedfast purpose and almighty will;
What time the haughty chiefs their jars begun,
Atreides, king of men, and Peleus' godlike son."

POPE.

"Achilles' wrath, to Greece the direful spring
Of woes unnumber'd, heavenly goddess sing,
That wrath which hurl'd to Pluto's gloomy reign
The souls of mighty chiefs untimely slain;
Whose limbs, unburied on the naked shore,
Devouring dogs and hungry vultures tore;
Since great Achilles and Atreides strove,
Such was the sovereign doom, and such the will of Jove."

COWPER.

"Sing, Muse, the deadly wrath of Peleus' son,
Achilles, source of many thousand woes
To the Achaian host, which numerous souls
Of heroes sent to Aëtes premature,
And left their bodies to devouring dogs
And birds of heaven, (so Jove his will perform'd.)
From that dread hour when discord first embroil'd Achilles and Atreides king of men."

SOTHEY.

"Sing, Muse, Pelides' wrath, whence woes on woes
O'er the Achæans' gather'd host arose,
Her chiefs' brave souls untimely hurl'd from day,
And left their limbs to dogs and birds a prey;
Since first 'gainst Atreus' son Achilles strove,
And their dire feuds fulfill'd the will of Jove."

What are the qualities that characterise the original? Simplicity and stateliness. Each word in the first line is great.

ΜΗΝΙΝ ἄνδρῶν, οὐαί, Πηλεΐδῃος Ἀχιλλεύου.

Now, not one of all the translations makes an approach to the grandeur of that magnificent line. It is then, we may conclude, unapproachable in the English—and consequently in any other language. Dryden and Cowper, we think, (please always, if you have time and opportunity, to verify or falsify our criticisms by reference to translation and original,) succeed best; Pope and Sotheby are about on an equality, though Pope is the more musical; and Tickel is poor, though Johnson, throughout that passage, waywardly prefers him to Pope. Perhaps some will think old Chapman the best, after all, and certainly his lines have the "long-resounding march," if not the "energy divine." Pope says of Chapman sneeringly, that he has "taken an advantage of an immeasurable length of verse." The longer the better, say we, had he known how to use it—which, though the above quotation be very good, we say he generally did not, in spite of the Cockneys.

Observe with what a sonorous and significant, say sublime, word, Homer begins the second line, ὀλοφύετο. The translators give "baneful," "dire effects," "fatal," "direful," "deadly," all right and good, but not one of them placed where Homer placed his word in its power. Sotheby omits it.

The last line of the Announcement is full brother to the first—only look at it.

Ἀτρεΐδῃος τε, ἄνδρῶν ἀνδρῶν, καὶ κτενὶ Ἀχιλλεύου.

All the translators were bound by every tie, human and divine, to have preserved—if that were possible—its sound, and its sense, and its soul. Old Chapman has done so, and praise be to him; Dryden had the gumption to steal old Chapman's line, but even in an Alexandrine he could not get a common title to Agamemnon's just title of "King of Men," and had to cut it down to "great," thereby impairing its majesty; Tickle also keeps to old Chapman, and wisely drops out "betwixt;" Pope translates it poorly, and kills it by transposition; Cowper keeps it in its right place, but has dropped the noble and essential epithets; Sotheby almost repeats Pope.

Let us go straight to the famous picture of the Descent of the Plague-Apollo. We must really give the Greek.

Ὡς ἴφατ' ἐνχόμενος τοῦ δ' ἔκλυε Φοῖβος Ἀπόλλων
 Βῆ δὲ κατ' οὐλύμεναι καρήνων χρώμενος κῆρ,
 Τὴν ἄμεισιν ἔχων, ἀμφερφεία τι φασίτην·
 Ἐκλαυζαν δ' ἄρ' ἕστατο πρὸ ὅμων χρομένοιο,
 Αὐτοῦ κινήσιντος· ὃ δ' ἦν νυκτὶ ἰσικαῖς·
 Ἐξίτ' ἵπυτ' ἀπάσινθε νῶν, μετὰ δ' ἰὸν ἔκασ·
 Διὶν δὲ κλαγγὴ γένετ' ἀργυρέοιο βιοῖο.
 Οὐρῆας μὲν πρῶτον ἰσάχιστο, καὶ κύνας ἀργούς·
 Αὐτὰρ ἵπυτ' αὐτοῖσι βίλος ἰχθυονικὸς ἴφις,
 Βάλλ'· αἰνὸν δὲ πυραί νεκρὸν καίοντο θαρμυαί.

This all men feel to be sublime. Yet, strange to say, we doubt if to two imaginations it presents any thing like the same picture. The Sun-god, Phœbus Apollo, being incensed, slew mules, dogs, and Greeks. He is the Plague. Yet he is a Divinity too—and, at one and the same time, he plays to admiration the part of both, and we defy you to tell which is, in your mind, the predominant idea—of his Godship or his Plagueship. Down to the end of the line closing with αἰνόν, he is himself ὁ αὐτός Ἀπόλλων—Etty might paint him—Macdonald shew him in sculpture. But henceforth he is entirely, or nearly, the Plague. True, he continues to shoot his arrows—but the Impersonation grows faint; and, finally, from before our eyes at least, fades utterly away. For how can the imagination, that was startled by the suddenness of the descent of the glorious Apparition from the summits of Olympus, figure to itself the same Sight sitting apart from the ships for nine nights and days of slaughter, and of blazing funeral piles! The bright Vision of Poetry gives place gradually to the dim vagueness of national Superstition. If this be true—and if it be possible to do it, then the translator should vary his version, in the same spirit as Homer saw and sung, and make us feel the strange transition from Divinity to Disease. How may he do so? By intensifying, as Homer did, the Personality of the Godhead, up to the highest pitch at αἰνόν; and then letting it generalize itself away into the mere presence of the unweariable activity of death.

Competitors! right shoulders forward—wheel!

CHAPMAN.

"Thus he pray'd, and Phœbus heard him pray—
 And, vex'd at heart, down from the tops of steep heaven stoop'd, his bow,
 And quiver covered round, his hands did on his shoulders throw;
 And of the angry deity the arrows as he moved Battered about him. Like the night he ranged the host, and roved
 (Apart the fleet set) terribly; with his hard-loosing hand
 His silver bow twang'd, and his shafts did first the mules command,
 And swift hounds, then the Greeks themselves—his deadly arrows shot,
 The fires of death went never out, nine days his shafts flew hot
 About the army."

DRYDEN.

"He pray'd, and Phœbus hearing, urged his sight,
 With fury kindled, from Olympus' height;

His quiver o'er his ample shoulders threw;
 His bow twang'd, and his arrows rattled as they flew.
 Black as a stormy night, he ranged around
 The tents, and compass'd the devoted ground.
 Then with full force his deadly bow he bent,
 And feather'd fates among the mules and sumpters sent,
 The essay of rage; on faithful dogs the next;
 And last in human hearts his arrows fixed.
 The god nine days the Greeks at rovers killed,
 Nine days the camp with funeral fires was filled."

TICKEL.

"Apollo heard his injured suppliant's cry;
 Down rush'd the vengeful warrior from the sky;
 Across his breast the glittering bow he flung,
 And at his back the well-stored quiver hung:
 (His arrows rattled as he urged his flight.)
 In clouds he flew, conceal'd from mortal sight,
 Then took his stand the well-aim'd shaft to throw;
 Fierce sprang the string, and twang'd the silver bow.
 The dogs and mules his first keen arrows slew;
 Amid the ranks, the next more fatal flew,
 A deathful dart. The funeral piles around,
 For ever blazed on the devoted ground."

POPE.

"Thus Chryses pray'd, the favouring power attends,
 And from Olympus' lofty top descends.
 Bent was his bow, the Grecian hearts to wound,
 Fierce as he moved his silver shafts resound.
 Breathing revenge, a sudden night he spread,
 And gloomy darkness roll'd around his head.
 The fleet in view, he twang'd his deadly bow,
 And hissing, fly the feather'd fates below.
 On mules and dogs, the infection first began,
 And last, the vengeful arrows fix'd in man.
 For nine long nights, through all the dusky air,
 The pyres thick flaming, shot a dismal glare."

COWPER.

"Such pray'r he made, and it was heard. The God,
 Down from Olympus, with his radiant bow,
 And his full quiver o'er his shoulder slung,
 March'd in his anger; shaken as he moved,
 His rattling arrows told of his approach.
 Like night he came, and seated with the ships
 In view, dispatched an arrow. Clang'd the cord,
 Dread-sounding, bounding on the silver bow.
 Mules first, and dogs, he struck, but aiming soon
 Against the Greeks themselves, his bitter shafts Smote them. The frequent piles blazed night and day."

SOTHEBY.

"Thus Chryses pray'd: his pray'r Apollo heard,
 And heavenly vengeance kindled at the word.
 He from Olympus' brow, in fury bore
 His bow and quiver's death-denouncing store.
 The arrows, rattling round his viewless flight,
 Clang'd, as the god descended, dark as night.
 Then Phœbus stay'd, and from the fleet apart,
 Launch'd on the host the inevitable dart;
 And ever as he wing'd the shaft below,
 Dire was the twanging of the silver bow.
 Mules and swift dogs first fell, then far around
 Man felt the god's immedicable wound.
 Corse lay on corse, to fire succeeded fire,
 As death unweary'd fed the funeral pyre."

Here again, old Chapman may be said, on the whole, to be excellent. But Homer does not shew us Apollo—that translator does—in the act of enduing himself with his bow and quiver. We see from the first the “heavenly archer,” (these are Mr Milman’s words,) equipped for revenge. “His silver bow twang’d,” is indeed woefully inadequate, and “hard-loosing hand,” though rather expressive, and shewing that old Chapman may have been a toxophilite as well as Ascham, nor yet un-Homeric, is not in the original, and therefore gives offence to us who belong to the King’s Body-Guard.

Dryden sadly mistakes and mars the majestic meaning of Ἰκλαγγανὸν ἄρ’ οἱ τοῖσιν ἄμυν χρομήνεοι,

Αὐτὸ κινεῖντες.

“His bow twang’d and his arrows rattled as they flew.”

This is an unlucky blunder—and it led him into another,—

“Then with full force his deadly bow he bent!”

As much as to say, we presume, that though before his “bow twang’d” it had not been bent with full force. “Glorious John” did not see that it had not before been bent at all. Why should it, till he had taken his station apart from the ships? “Feather’d fates” are fine things—but not in the passage. “The Greeks at rovers killed,” is a piece of pedantic impertinence—which archers will understand—and for which, could Homer have foreseen it, he would have longed even in Hades to have broken Dryden’s head.

Tickel’s translation is nearly a total failure. Vengeful “warrior,” is somewhat impertinent.

“The well-aimed shafts to throw,” suggests a suspicion that our friend was thinking of a “stone bicker;” yet, strange to say, the next line is more truly Homeric than, perhaps, any other single line in any of the other translations, and is almost perfect,— “Fierce sprung the string, and twang’d the silver bow.”

“In clouds he flew, concealed from mortal sight,” is an absolute and manifest lie; for Homer saw him, and so do we, and so did Tickel himself, unless he were bat-blind, which he was not, but, on the contrary, had a couple of good sharp eyes in his head.

On Pope’s translation it is not possible to bestow much praise.

“Bent was his bow the Grecian hearts to wound,”

is false and feeble. “Resound” should have been “resounded,” we suspect; though such capricious change of tense is, we know, a bad trick, common among the poets of Pope’s school.

“And gloomy darkness gather’d round his head,”

is idle tautology. “Twang’d his deadly bow,” not literal, where literality was demanded; and “feathered fates” may be restored, without Pope being the poorer, to Dryden.

“For nine long nights, through all the dusky air,
The pyres thick-flaming shot a dismal glare,”

are very noble lines; but the pyres burned by day as well as night—though by day they were doubtless not so visible. Homer left us to see them of ourselves during both; but since Pope has grandly directed our eyes to the night-imagery, we owe him gratitude.

Cowper, on the whole, is good, forcible; but owing to some rather commonish words, we fear, not sufficiently dignified—for Apollo. “Marched in his anger,” is raw-recruitish; though raw recruits are often formidable fellows; and “told of his approach,” is very prosaic. After it, only think of Milton’s “far-off his coming shone!” The attempt at imitative harmony or discord in the singular line about “dread-sounding bounding,” we confess we like—but liking is not loving, nor loving admiring, nor admiring astonishment, nor astonishment exultation.

Sotheby is excellent—but not all we hoped he might have been—with all these bell-rocks and beat con lights—to shew him his path on the waters. “Kindled at the word,” is sudden and sharp, but quaint and incorrect. "Then Phœbus stayed," has the same merit and the same demerit. We do not like the repetition of "dart" in "shaft." "Immedicable wound" and "inevitable dart," have a sameness of sound not satisfactory to our ears at the close of lines so near each other—nor is there any thing answering to either epithet in Homer.

"Dire was the twanging of the silver bow," is admirable in its almost literal simplicity.

"Corse lay on corse, to fire succeeded fire,
And death unwearied led the funeral pyre," are in themselves two strong lines—but are they both equal in power and glory, to αἰὶ δὲ πυρὶ νέων καίετο Σαρπηΐ;

No.

There is one half line in the original of which we have yet said nothing—and which loses its identity in some of these translations, and scarcely preserves it in others. What effect does it produce on your imagination?

ὡς δ' ἄν νυκτὶ λαιαῖ;

Old Chapman renders it—rightly so far, for so far literally—

"Like the Night, he ranged the host."

Dryden—

"Black as a stormy night, he ranged around
The tents."

Pope—

"Breathing revenge, a sudden night he spread,
And gloomy darkness roll'd around his head,"

which last line we have already abused. Tickel, idiotically as we said—

"In clouds he flew, conceal'd from mortal night."

Cowper best of all, and perfectly—

"Like night he came;"

and Sotheby—

"As the God descended, dark as night,"
—which is not so good as Cowper, only because not literally Homer,

We ask you again, what effect does it produce in your imagination? Not surely that of night over the whole sky—not utter concealment of the God in a darkness not appertaining to himself, but in which he is merely enshrouded, as are the heavens and earth? No, no, no, that cannot have been intended by Homer. But Homer, we think, in the inspiration of his religious awe, suddenly saw Apollo, the very God of Light, changing in the passion—the agony of rage—into an Apparition the reverse, the opposite, of his own lustrousness, —undergoing a dreadful Transfiguration. It was not as if Day became Night, but that the God of Day was wrath-changed into the Night God—almost as if Apollo had become Pluto. Milton must have understood the image so, for he has transferred it—not the change—but the image itself, to his most dreadful personage, "Black it stood as Night"—in the daylight, you know, and therefore was that Foul Blotch so terrible. Try then each translation separately, by this the test of truth, and judge for yourself which is good, which bad, and which indifferent. We should like to hear your opinion.

Meanwhile, before we proceed to another passage, only hear old Hobbes, who, perhaps you may not know it, translated the Iliad and the Odyssey. "His poetry, as well as Quilvie's," (which we have never chanced to see,) says Pope truly, "is too mean for criticism."

"His prayer was granted by the Deity;
Who with his silver bow and arrows keen,
Descended from Olympus silently,
In likeness of the sable Night unseen."

In this stealthiness there seems to us something meanly suspicious. True, that in scripture we read of death coming like a thief in the night—but that was not said for the sake of sublimity, but to shew us how we are, in our imagined deepest home-felt security, unsafe from that murderous wretch Death, or Williams. But Homer being a heathen meant no uncivil scorn of Apollo—whereas Hobbes converts him into a cracksmán.

"His bow and quiver both behind him hung,
The arrows chink as often as he jogs!"

We come now to that immortal quarrel

"Betwixt Atides, king of men, and Thetis' godlike son,"

and are thankful to learn that we ourselves have never felt tempted, by a rash ambition, to dare to try to translate it. Never did Wrath so naturally, we may say rightfully,—speaking of chiefs who were any thing but Christian—flame up, from a single spark into a roaring flame, within maganimous hearts. Ere yet he knew what Chryses was about to divulge as the cause of the Plague—unless, indeed, he had a sort of pre-saging forethought, that it somehow or other regarded the king—Achilles, by promising the priest immunity from all punishment, placed himself in the spirit and posture of a foe to Agamemnon. That Atides should have been smitten with sudden rage against the suppliant Father, we cannot wonder; for we soon have his own word for it, that Chryses was now as dear, that is, dearer to him than ever had been Clytemnestra in her golden and virgin days. Kings, heroic and unheroic, are seldom subjects to right reason; and, in his towering passion with the slow-footed Chryses, his looks could have been none of the sweetest towards the swift-footed Achilles. That fiercest of the fierce, took him up at once, on his first tyrannical deviation from justice—thence instant revenge threatened not vainly by him whose will was law—the pride of unmatched power in one, conflicting with the more than pride of the invincible valour of the other—the indignation of habitual dignity on this side, watching the character of the rage of natural passionateness on that—till each seemed equally the fount of the stormy light that redly discoloured the countenances of both heroes—and king and prince shone and shook alike in the perturbation of their savage spirits, the intolerant and untamed sons of headstrong and headlong nature.

Is it not amazing to think of it, after we lay down this dramatic scene, how Homer, without any apparent effort, has kept up, throughout all the furious injustice of these heroes to each other, such strong sympathy with both, that though sometimes shaken, it is never broken; and that, during the course of the quarrel, though assuredly our hearts beat faster and louder towards Achilles, they ever and anon go half over to the side of Agamemnon? He swore but to deprive his antagonist of that blessing of which himself was about to be, as he thought, robbed—the enjoyment of love and beauty. What signifies right, or the observance or violation of right, when disappointment, which in the soul of a king is equal to a subject's despair, has darkened conscience and corrupted will, and seeks refuge in revenge? And what signifies blood-thirsty heroism, that has been exulting in victorious fields of death to the soul in which it has burned, when its sweetest meed is ravished out of its embrace, the light of woman's eyes, and the fragrance of woman's bosom, that had captivated the conqueror, and bound him within his night-tent, in divinest thralldom, the slave of a slave? Patriotism, glory, fealty, are all overpowered by pride raging in the sense of degradation, injustice, and wrong, done to it, openly beneath the sun, and before all eyes; and down is flung the gold-studded sceptre on the earth, that the clash may ratify the oath sworn to Jove, that never more shall the hand that swayed it draw the sword, though the hero-slaughtering Hector should drive Greece to her ships, and Troy be triumphant over her flying sons. Is not this a Quarrel indeed of demigods, and who could have sung it but Homer?

We cannot quote all the translations of the progress of this Wrath up to the intervention of Minerva, and therefore we shall quote none of them—but go to the passage in which the goddess reveals herself to the goddess-born, and so far calms the roar within his soul, as does a sudden lull for a while that of the sea. Agamemnon has just said—as Dryden makes him say, "Briseis shall be mine."

CHAPMAN.

"Thetis' son at this stood next, his heart

Bristled his bosom, and two ways drew his discursive part,

VOL. XXIX. NO. CLXXIX.

If from his thigh his sharp sword drawn, he should make room about Atreides' person, slaughtering him, or sit his anger out,
 And curb his spirit. While these thoughts strived in his blood and mind,
 And he his sword drew, down from heaven Athenia stoop'd, and shined
 About his temples, being sent by the ivory-wristed queen, Saturnia, who out of her heart had ever loving been,
 And careful of the good of both. She stood behind, and took Achilles by the yellow curls, and only gave her look
 To him appearance; 'not a man of all the rest could see.
 He turning back his eye, amaze shook every faculty;
 Yet straight he knew her by her eyes, so terrible they were Sparkling with ardour"——

DRYDEN.

" At this the impatient hero sourly smiled;
 His heart impetuous in his bosom boil'd,
 And, justled by two tides of equal sway,
 Stood for a while suspended in his way.
 Betwixt his reason and his rage untamed,
 One whisper'd soft, and one aloud reclaim'd;
 That only counsel'd to the safer side,
 This to the sword his ready hand apply'd.
 Unpunish'd to support the affront was hard,
 Nor easy was the attempt to force the guard.
 But soon the thirst of vengeance fired his blood,
 Half-shone his falchion, and half-sheath'd it stood.
 In that nice moment, Pallas, from above,
 Commission'd by the imperial wife of Jove,
 Descended swift: (the white-arm'd queen was loath
 The fight should follow, for she favour'd both.)
 Just as in act he stood, in clouds enshrin'd,
 Her hand she fasten'd on his hair behind:
 Then backward by his yellow curl she drew;
 To him, and him alone, confess'd in view.
 Tamed by superior force, he turn'd his eyes
 Aghast at first, and stupid with surprise."

NOVI.

" Achilles heard, with grief and rage oppress'd,
 His heart swell'd high, and labour'd in his breast.
 Distracting thoughts by turns his bosom rul'd,
 Now fir'd by wrath, and now by reason cool'd:
 That prompts his hand to draw the deadly sword,
 Force thro' the Greeks, and pierce their haughty lord:
 This whispers soft, his vengeance to control,
 And calm the rising tempest of his soul.
 Just as in anguish of suspense he stay'd,
 While half unsheath'd appear'd the glittering blade,
 Mine—a swift descended from above,
 Sent by the sister and the wife of Jove;
 For both the princes claim'd her equal care.
 Behind she stood, and by the golden hair
 Achilles seiz'd; to him alone confess'd,
 A sable cloud conceal'd her from the rest.
 He sees, and sudden to the goddess cries,
 Known by the flames that sparkle from her eyes."

COWPER.

" He ended, and Achilles' bosom swell'd
 With indignation; racking doubts ensh'd,
 And sore perplex'd him, whether forcing wide
 A passage through them, with his blade unsheath'd,
 To lay Atreides breathless at his foot,
 Or to command his stormy spirit down.
 So doubted he, and undecided yet,
 Stood drawing forth his falchion huge; when, lo!
 Down sent by Juno, to whom both alike

Were dear, and who alike watch'd over both,
 Pallas descended. At his back she stood,
 To none apparent, save himself alone,
 And seiz'd his golden locks. Startled, he turn'd,
 And instant knew Minerva. Flash'd her eyes Terrific, whom in haste he thus bespake:"

SOOTHEY.

"He spake—Achilles flam'd—wrath, deep, disdain,
 Swell'd his high heart, and thrill'd in every vein;
 In doubt, with sword unsheath'd to force his way,
 Dash thro' the warriors, and the tyrant slay;
 Or, in stern mastery of his mind, control
 Th' unsated vengeance of an outrag'd soul.
 In this dread doubt, while now in act display'd,
 His hand had half unsheath'd th' avenging blade.
 Pallas, at mandate of the wife of Jove,
 Who watch'd the rival chiefs with equal love,
 Unseen by all, behind Achilles stood,
 Seiz'd his gold locks, and curb'd his madd'ning mood.
 He turn'd, and awe-struck, straight the goddess knew.
 As from her eyes the living lightning flew."

Achilles has now lost all desire—all power to speak—and he late so insultingly, and scornfully, and savage, and fiercely, and ferociously eloquent, is dumb. Ω; ζειν; Ηελαν;. δ' αχες γειν;. Homer then in four lines says, that the heart of Achilles deliberated—to kill Atrides, or to subdue his own rage. The words he uses are strong as strong may be,
 and direct as his alternate purposes of slaughter or silence. Let them be so, therefore, in all translation. Old Chapman deserves to have his grave disturbed for having said "his heart bristled his bosom," which either means nothing, or that the hair thereon bristled, which is mean and miserable falsehood of the chest of the youth who excelled all living in heroic beauty. "Stood next," is perhaps good—to them who remember Shakespeare's "still vexed Betmuthes." "This discursive part,"
 no doubt, gives the right meaning, but is too formal and philosophical for the occasion. What follows on to the Apparition of Pallas, is forceful and rather grim—which is good—but there is a dignity in the original —in the verbs, especially—which has forsaken Chapman's eyesight. Minerva, sent by Juno, the protectress of both heroes alike, comes from heaven, and takes Achilles by his yellow hair, who, astounded, turns his head, and by her stern eyes recognises the Goddess. Now when Chapman says that Athenia "shined about his temples," he is manifestly thinking not of her Person, which was there, but of Wisdom, of which she was Goddess—and this open expression of Homer's hidden meaning, is as bad as can be, and brings out marvellously the lesson which the great moral bard doubted not all the world would read for itself.—

 Otherwise the translation has the merit of much vigour.

Dryden's version is, of course, also vigorous; but it is not literal, but licentious; and he wilfully violates throughout both the style and the spirit of Homer. The "hero sourly smiled," is in itself good, but not in the original; and one hates to see heightenings of the expression of any strong passion beyond the aim of the mind that depicted it.

"And, justled by two tides of equal away, Sood for a while suspended in his way,"

is coldly conceived and inaccurately expressed, as are the two, indeed the six lines, which follow—a sorry sort of declamation, in which the plainest statement is perverted and falsified, and fire made mere smoke.
 The rest is sweeping and sonorous;
 but thirteen lines of Greek into twenty-one of English, is a dilution that must be severely condemned.

Pope's translation is very fine. It flows freely, and has few faults, except that it is somewhat too figurative.

"Now fired by wrath, and now by reason cool'd,"

is an antithesis not to be found—though there is something like it—in Homer.

"This whisper soft, his vengeance to control,

And calm the rising tempest of his soul," sounds like commonplace to our ears now—though it is likewise common sense. "A soft whisper" did not suit the ear of Achilles—at least, not from cool reason, though assuredly from warm Briseis—and is not in Homer; for Homer never spoke nonsense; and nonsense it would have been to have said that a sable cloud was present on this occasion.

"A sable cloud conceal'd her from the rest,"

Sotheby's translation, we may safely say, is admirable. It has but one line more than the original—and loses little either of the style or sense of Homer.

"Swelled his high heart, and thrilled in every vein, is a line, the construction of which Pope was too fond of, and its latter half is weak and futile; and the last line of all,—

"As from her eyes the living lightning flew,"

is a sorry substitute in its meretricious glitter, for

ὄμμα δ' αἰὲρ ὥς φάειν

But with these blemishes—which to some people may not seem blemishes at all, but beauties, the translation is such as probably to surpass the power of any other of our living Poets.

Even more admirable is the translation by Cowper. It is almost as literal as translation can be; and we do not scruple to say that it is faultless.

"Stood drawing forth his falchion huge; when lo!

Down sent by Juno, to whom both alike Were dear, and who alike watched over both.

Pallas descended"— is perfectly Homeric. But were we to indulge ourselves in criticism, we should find ourselves re-transcribing the whole passage. Cowper is bald—Cowper is dull—Cowper is tame; So drivel the dunces—but even at this time of day, few feel, and fewer know, what is the power of blank verse—and of blank verse Cowper was a great master.

Pallas has vanished away into the mansion of Aegis-armed Jove, and Achilles is left again to struggle with his own great heart. The awe of that sudden celestial visit yet lies upon him, and his sword is chained in the scabbard. But though he will obey the mandate, he feels free in his obedience still to fling scorn and wrath into the face of the King. Enough that he slays him not where he stands, but yet allows him life. Juno herself, nor Jove either, shall wrong him out of another—and a lasting revenge. Nay, Minerva's self—the Goddess of Wisdom—had given him the privilege to shoot through Agamemnon's heart the arrows of disdain—swift as those of death—and foretold that the day is doomed, when his great loss will be far greater repaid.

Such, we may believe, was his mood; and Homer says, ere the wrath of Achilles again bursts forth,

*Πηλεΐδης δ' ἐξ ὅττις ἀταρταρὸς ἵστητο
Ἀτρεΐδην προσέειπε καὶ εὖ πη ἄνδρ' ἐχέοντο*

This is introduction enough—and in the usual style of Homer. But it does not satisfy Dryden; and he chooses to tell us how Achilles looked and felt, contrary to the positive assertion of Homer.

"At her departure, his chariot returned;
The fire she fanned with greater fury burned;

Rumbling within, till thus it found a vent"—

Homer does not say that Minerva fanned the fire—that would have indeed been a work of supererogation, and a Milesian fulfilment of the mandate of Juno. "Rumbling within," is in the vein of old Chapman's "bristling his breast."

Pope saw the simple words, and felt their power—and therefore says, sufficiently well—

"Nor yet the rage his boiling heart forsook, Which thus redoubling on Atrides broke."

Cowper writes,

"But though from violence, yet not from words

Abstain'd Achilles, but with bitter taunts Opprobrious, his antagonist reproach'd ;"
which is stiff and formal—as if written by a Quaker.

Sotheby says,

" But Pelcus' son again, with gather'd ire, Hurl'd on the monarch words of living fire."

He did so. His words were of " living fire." Just as from Minerva's eyes " living lightning" flew. But why should Mr Sotheby say what Homer did not—either in this passage, or in any other in the Iliad of Odyssey? All the translators—except Pope perhaps—have failed ; so difficult must it be to do apparently a very easy thing. But Achilles speaks—and we cry " hear ! hear !

hear !" though he is sadly out of order—and others may cry " chair !
chair ! chair !" The son of Thetis excelled in a reply. Had Lord Brougham " the accomplishment of verse," we think he would give the closing speech of Achilles with characteristic power.

DRYDEN.

Dastard, and drunkard, mean and insolent,
Tongue-vagrant hero, vaunter of thy might,
In threats the foremost, but the lag in fight ;
When did'st thou thrust amid the mingled race,
Content to bide the war aloof in peace ?
Arms are the trade of each Plebeian soul ;
'Tis death to fight ; but kingly to controul.
Lord-like at ease, with arbitrary power,
To peel the chiefs, the people to devour.
These, traitor, are thy talents ; safer far
Than to contend in fields, and toils of war.
Nor could'st thou thus have dar'd the common hate,
Were not their souls as subject to their state.
But, by this sceptre, solemnly I swear,
(Which never more green leaf or growing branch shall bear ;
Torn from the tree, and given by Jove to those Who laws dispense, and mighty wrongs oppose,)
That when the Grecians want my warranted aid,
No gift shall bribe it, and no prayer persuade.
When Hector comes, the homicide, to wield
His conquering arms, with corpse to strew the field,
Then shalt thou mourn thy pride ; and late confess
My wrong repented, when 'tis past redress.
He said—and with disdain, in open view,
Against the ground his golden sceptre threw ;
Then sat—with boiling rage Atides burn'd,
And foam betwixt his gnashing grinders churn'd.

POPE.

O monster ! mix'd of insolence and fear,
Lion dog in forehead, but in heart a deer !
When wert thou known in ambush'd fights to dare,
Or boldly face the horrid front of war.
'Tis ours the chance of fighting fields to try,
Thine to look on, and bid the valiant die.
So much 'tis safer through the camp to go
And rob a subject, than despoil a foe.
Scourge of thy people, violent and bare ;
Sent in Jove's anger on a slavish race,
Who, lost to sense of generous freedom past,
Are tamed to wrongs, or this had been thy last.
Now by this sacred sceptre hear me swear,
Which, never more shall leaves or blossoms bear,
Which sever'd from the trunk, (as I from thee,)
On the bare mountains left its parent tree ;
This sceptre, form'd by temper'd steel to prove
An ensign of the delegates of Jove,
From which the power of laws and justice springs,
Tremendous oaths inviolate to kings ;

By this I swear, when bleeding Greece again
 Shall call Achilles, she shall call in vain.
 When, flush'd with slaughter, Hector comes to spread
 The purpled shore with mountains of the dead,
 Then shalt thou mourn th' affront thy madness gave,
 Forced to deplore, when impotent to save;
 Then rage in bitterness of soul, to know
 This act has made the bravest Greek thy foe."

COWPER.

"O charged with wine, in steadfastness of face,
 Dog unabash'd, and yet at heart a deer!
 Thou never, when the troops have taken arms,
 Hast dared to take thine also; never thou
 Associate with Achaia's chiefs, to form
 The secret ambush. No, the sound of war
 Is as the voice of destiny to thee.
 Doubtless the course is safer far to range
 Our num'rous host, and, if a man have dared
 Dispute thy will, to rob him of his prize.
 Tyrant! the Greeks are women, else themselves
 Would make this contumelious wrong thy last.
 But hearken, I shall swear a solemn oath
 By this my sceptre, which shall never bud,
 Nor boughs bring forth as once, which, having left
 Its parent on the mountain-top, what time
 The woodman's axe lopp'd off its foliage green,
 And stripp'd its bark, shall never grow again,
 Which now the judges of Achaia bear,
 Who, under Jove, stand guardians of the laws,—
 By this I swear, (mark thou the sacred oath,)
 Time shall be, when Achilles shall be miss'd;
 When all shall want him, and thyself the power
 To help the Achaeans, what o'er thy will;
 When Hector at your heels shall mow you down,
 The hero-slaught'ring Hector! Then thy soul,
 Vexation-stung, shall tear thee with remorse
 That thou hast scorn'd, as he were nothing worth,
 A chief, the soul and bulwark of your cause."

SOMMER.

"Swain drunkard! dog in eye, but hard in heart,
 Who ne'er in war sustain'st a warrior's part,
 Nor join'st our ambush; for alike thy fear
 In war and ambush views destruction near.
 More safe, 'twould Greece's ranks th' inglorious toil,
 To grasp some murmurer's unprotected spoil.
 Plunderer of slaves—slaves void of soul as sense—
 Or Greece had witness'd now thy last offence.
 Yet—by this sceptre, which, untimely reft
 From its bare trunk upon the mountain left,
 Bark'd by the steel, and of its foliage shorn,
 Nor bark nor foliage shall again adorn,
 But borne by powerful chiefs of high command,
 Guardians of law, and judges of the land.
 Be witness thou, by this tremendous test
 I ratify my word, and steel my breast,
 The day shall come, when Greece, in dread alarm,
 Shall lean for succour on Pelides' arm:
 Then, while beneath fierce Hector's murderous blade
 Thy warriors bleed, and claim in vain thy aid,
 Rage shall consume thy heart, that madd'ning pride,
 Dishonouring me, thy bravest chief defied."

Dryden has made some hits—but also many misses—Achilles at once gives vent to a matchless burst of the concentrated essence of scorn.

Οἶνοπαρις, κυνὸς ὄμματ' ἔχων, κραδίην
δ' ἱλαφοιο·

Drunkard, Dog-eye, Deer-heart!

We call this multum in parvo. Dryden leaves out both dog and deer! Incredible. And of one line makes three—a commentary rather than a translation.

"Arms are the trade of each Plebeian soul"— is a pure interpolation—and most unlike the direct charge against the king by Achilles. Nothing can be worse.

"To peel the cliets, the people to devour," is in itself good, and we suppose it impossible to translate adequately the words "Δυσκόροιο βελήναι." A fine flow of versification perhaps redeems this version—but at its close we feel how feeble, even in Dryden, is the proud prophecy of Achilles, who in Homer concludes with calling himself what all the world knew he was, ἀρεστον Ἀχαιῶν, an avowal of the consciousness of his own worth most suitable and sublime.

Pope almost entirely succeeds where Dryden utterly fails. In the first burst, he ought not, however, to have let escape him Οἶνοπαρις, which is ill supplied by the whole line, though it be a strong one,

"O monster! mixed of insolence and fear."

That strong line, indeed, does not contain within it οἶνοπαρις—but the dog and deer. The line naming these animals is perfect.

Achilles becomes rather too much of the rhetorician in Pope's hands; but he declaims with great energy, and we shall not play the captious-critic on his oration. We must object, however, to two lines, which, doubtless, Pope thought a mighty improvement on Homer,

"When flush'd with slaughter, Hector comes to spread

The purpled shore with mountains of the dead."

It is not in such pompous terms that hero speaks of hero—especially when soul-inflamed; nor is it thus that Homer makes Achilles speak of Hector. No purple shores—no mountains of the dead—simply εὗτ' ἂν πολλοὶ ὑφ' ἑκτορος ἀνδροφύοιο

Θνησκοντες πίπτωσι—

"When many dying fall beneath
The hero-slaughtering Hector."

Cowper, as usual, keeps close to Homer. And, after all, of a Great Poet the most literal version must be the best. Better to lose something—than to get much that has no business there—which may be no idle, but false to the truth—mingling styles and spirits that "own antipathy"—that will with difficulty be brought to coalesce, and that cannot be amalgamated.

"O, charged with wine" is not exact, for it restricts his accusation to that hour—but Achilles calls Agamemnon a drunkard—a wine-swiller—or beer-barrel. Had Achilles believed him drunk then, we scarcely think he would have honoured him by such prolonged and repeated Addresses to the Throne. With that exception, his abuse of Agamemnon is well rendered—and it is Homeric.

It is dangerous to Cowper to read his translation immediately after Dryden's and Pope's. There is a richness in their diction, and a profusion of harmonious sounds overflowing the page, which, along with the rhymes, fills the ear with a music that wafts on the mind, and makes reading something like flying—a pleasure accompanied with a sense, as it were, of our own easy-working power. Meanwhile, we too often feel and think vaguely and obscurely—or perhaps not at all—and, as for seeing, we can scarcely be said sometimes to see any thing; for we either trust to our ears, on which occasions people shut their eyes, or we behold men and things floating away by us, like clouds on the air, or bubbles on a stream. But Cowper strives to set before us Homer's Iliad in its simplicity—and it is often most simple when it is most sublime,—and under no delusion, or ignorance, regarding the Bard's express and definite meaning, why, to enjoy his poetry, we must see things as well as hear words; the imagination must exert itself, or, let us say the truth at once, the gentle reader will infallibly fall asleep. "How magnificent is Dryden's Homer!" "How splendid is Pope's!" But be ordered to sit down and mould a Hero from some of these magnificent or splendid descriptions, or to stain one on the canvass, and you will find, on comparing your statue or picture with the originals in Homer, that "Greek does not meet Greek," tough as may be the tug of war; and that the wondering world, if not admiring, must be left to conjecture in what forgotten ancient bard or historian you can have found such and such personages; and, above all, what it is that they are about—"doing or suffering."

We have neither time nor room—nor indeed inclination—to make many particular remarks on Cowper's translation of this speech, wishing to come to Sotheby.

"When Hector at your heels shall mow you down,
The hero-slaughtering Hector!"—

Here though the first line is not Homer, it is surely far better in itself, and infinitely more characteristic of Achilles, than Pope's "purpled shores and mountains of the dead,"—and shews, that if at any time Cowper is forced to depart from the original—and the structure of verse must often force every translator so to do—he still writes in a kindred and congenial spirit. In like manner, Cowper changes into a different form of expression the final sentiment of Achilles, which he ought not to have done, for 'twould have been easy to have kept close to the Greek; but he adheres to the meaning of it, nay, rather intensifies it; whereas Dryden "changes the drink upon us," and for purple wine passes off pale negus, as you may assure yourself by looking at the wishy-washy stuff of the last two lines of Achilles' speech, than which nothing can be wensher, except perhaps saltless parritch.

Now, read again Sotheby—after you have read the other three—great names all, Dryden, Pope, Cowper—and read again Achilles' last speech—but not like Sir Charles Wetherell's dying words—in Homer. You have done so. And do you not think with us, that Sotheby's version is the foremost of the four? It is—longo intervallo. From first to last, it breathes insult and scorn, unweakened by one needless or unnatural word of ornament,—a loftier indignation mixing with them, as Achilles, swift of tongue as of foot, eyes his own sceptre, which, after having worn by, he intends to dash on the ground,—and finally, insult, scorn, indignation, all, themselves almost tamed in his heroic breast by the exultation that fills it from the forethought, when he shall have abandoned the host, of his revenge on Agamemnon, coming too from the very sword of Hector, his mighty foe, the hero-slaughtering Hector, then unopposed by the man his king had dishonoured—the best of all the Greeks—ἄριστος Ἀχαιοῖς.

To have been able so effectually to rid himself of all remembrances of the words of Pope and Dryden, (except in the first lines, which he improves,) shews how thoroughly imbued Sotheby's mind is with the true feeling and knowledge of Homer's genius—and this one passage alone proves him a great translator.

A sudden thought strikes us—let us leave Achilles, and see who of the ἑσπετιμαῖ are most successful in Jupiter's Nou—when he was "a noddin noddin in his house at home."

Jove has been listening propitiously to the prayer of Thetis for her son, and he says,—

Εἰ δ' ἄγε, τοι κεφαλῇ κατακύνσομαι, ὄφρα τιποιῇ, Τὺτο γὰρ ἐξ ἑμῖν γ' ἔμει' ἀβαντοῖσι μίγῃσι
τίκμῃ· ἢ γὰρ ἔμει παλινάγῃσι, εὖ δ' ἀπατελοῖ.
Οὐδ' ἀπλῆνύτῃσι γ', ο, τ, κε κεφαλῇ κατακύνσω.
Ἢ, κ' κυανέῃσι ἐπ' ἴφρῃσι νῦν τε Κροῖον
Ἀμφοροῖσι δ' ἄρα χαίται ἐπὶ ῥέσσαντο ἄνακτος.
Κροῖος, ἀπ' ἀβαντοῖσι μίγῃσι δ' ἐλίσσῃσι Ὀλύμπῳ.

Even if you cannot read Greek, you will feel that something sublime is going on there—depend upon it—by getting some one who can, (and to whom the gods have given to speak ore rotundo;) to recite that poetry. Should you be still rather at a loss, let Dryden come to your assistance.

DRYDEN.

Go then, and on the faith of Jove rely,
When nodding to thy suit, he bows the sky—
This ratifies the irrevocable doom :
The sign ordained, that what I will, shall come.
The stamp of Heaven, and seal of fate,—he said,
And shook the sacred honours of his head.
With terror trembled Heaven's subsiding hill,
And from his shaken curls ambrosial dews distil.

POPE.

But part in peace, secure thy prayer as sped,
Witness the sacred honours of our head,
The nod that ratifies the will divine,
The faithful, fixed, irrevocable sign ;
This seals thy suit, and this fulfils thy vows—
He spoke, and awful bends his sable brows,
Shakes his ambrosial curls—AND GIVES THE NOD—
The stamp of fate and sanction of the god.
High heavens with trembling the dread sanction took,
And all Olympus to the centre shook.

COWPER.

And to assure thee more, I give the sign
Indubitable, which all fear expels,
At once from heavenly minds. Nought so confirm'd,
May ever be reversed, or rendered vain.
He ceased ; and under his dark brows THE NOD
Vouchsafed of confirmation. All around
The sovereign's everlasting head his curls
Ambrosial shook, and the huge mountain reel'd.

SOOTHEY.

Hence ! hence ! lest Juno now detect thee here—
Away ! Thy prayer is granted—disappear !
Go, firm in trust ; I pledge the brow of Jove,
The sign most sacred 'mid the god's above ;
This stamp of Fate, th' irrevocable sign,
That perfects all its promises, be thine !
He spake ; and fully to confirm his vow,
The sanction gave, and bow'd his awful brow ;
From his immortal head profusely flow'd
Th' ambrosial locks that waved around the god,
While all Olympus trembled at THE NOD !

Dryden is here not very good—nay, he is almost bad—bad—very bad—though one quakes to say so of Glorious John, as he was writing of Glorious Jove. True that these lines of his have even a majestic flow—as is ever the case when he wills it, with his versification ; but throughout there is, to our mind, a manifest struggle to be strong, which nevertheless fails to attain the effortless sublimity of Homer. In this version Jove tells Theseis that “ he bows the sky,” an expression, which the more you look at it, here, becomes the more obscure. Does it refer to “ ἀθανάτοισι μέγιστον τιμήμαρ ;”

If it does, it could not easily be worse ; if it does not, there is nothing equivalent to it in the original ; and if on any occasion Homer ought to have had his own way entirely, it was on this, for he is perfect.

“ The stamp of heaven and seal of fate,” is language fitter for the lips of a clerk in the Home-office, the Customs, or Excise, than the mouth of Jove. Look at the words in Homer! Not one expression of artificial appliances.

"He shook the sacred honours of his head," is a shy line that rather shuns the original—

"Κυαυγισιν ἐπ' ὀφρύσι γένει Κρονίων."

A "subsiding hill" may be something very impressive; but we should think a hill had little chance of subsiding while it trembled with terror. We speak, however, in the dark; only this we know, that Dryden was more than half-drunk when he thought that a translation of

"μίγαν δ' ἱελαίησιν Ὀλύμπου."

Nay, that he was whole drunk—(in a state of civitation)—is, though an inadequate, still a humane excuse, for the enormity of attempting to murder at one blow both Homer and Jupiter. Far gone, indeed, must he have been, ere, after he had heard Olympus tremble, he could yet hiccup out,

"And from his shaken curls ambrosial dews distil."

That is putting the horse behind the cart—the cause after the effect—making the Nodder yield precedence to the nodder.

Pope is better—and he had probably been better still, had he not been haunted by Dryden. Witness

"The sacred honours of our head."

and

"The nod that ratifies the wil divine."

That last line is judiciously stolen or borrowed—of the first we have much pleasure in again expressing our dislike.

"The stamp of fate and sanction of the god," is another piece of plunder of which we do not grudge Pope the possession—and so is "this seals thy suit," a style of talking less characteristic of Jupiter than of a Jew-clothesman. But the "sable brows," the "ambrosial curls, and even "all Olympus," &c. are excellent, and for their sake we praise the passage.

After these sonorous singers, Cowper's voice at first hearing sounds somewhat flat—but we soon perceive it is a fine tenor—he has the right tune, and knows and gives its true character. In Dryden and Pope, Jupiter is as proud as Punch; in Cowper he is every inch a King. He does not shew off before Thetis, but gives her a solemn and sublime assurance of his benignant will—just as he did in Homer. No witnessing "the sacred honours of his head,"—no sealing—and no stamping. "Huge mountain reel'd" is magnificent, though we are loath to lose "Olympus." The passage reads like a version of Homer by Milton.

Sotheby far excels Dryden and Pope—does he equal Cowper? Many will say yes—we reluctantly say no. Throughout the whole of his Translation of the Iliad, Cowper seems never to have—though he well knew them—cared what other translators had done. He might have said, like Anthony,

"I only speak truth on."

From this wise forgetfulness arose utter fearlessness, and thence power. Sotheby, on the other hand, an accomplished and ambitious scholar, has come forward in order to excel, and he hopes to be the Prizeman. He is seen often striving to outline; and sometimes, perhaps, he seems less desirous of honouring Homer, than of triumphing over "his traducers." Jupiter, not wishing to awaken the jealousy of Juno, says to Thetis,

"Ἀλλὰ σὺ μὲν οὐκ αὐτὴς ἀπέρχῃς," which, though decisive, is not discourteous—though peremptory, polite. That he was in no great quandary, and was very far from wishing Thetis to hurry herself, is manifest from the self-composure displayed in his preface to his celebrated Non, no less than in his celebrated Non itself, the beau-ideal of a Non (as we believe it was remarked, without his being sensible of saying so, by our friend Charles Nodier,) even in the Land of Non. Why, then, should Sotheby have shewn Jupiter in such flurried alarm of Juno? The terrified Thunderer orders Thetis off five times: 1. "Hence!" 2. "Hence!" 3. "Away!" 4. "Disappear." 5. "Go!" Such extreme repetition can be thought natural only on the ground of extreme trepidation—and gives one the idea, not of Jove the Cloud-compeller, but the Hen-pecked. Sotheby, too, must needs have the "stamp of fate," which, by the by, we should like to see fairly out of the hands of the distributor. "Firm in trust," for οὐκ ἀπιστοῦν, is simple and strong, and sufficient. "Pledge the brow of Jove," is very fine; and its slight deviation from the original is on that account allowable. We do not see the beauty of the use of "sign" twice, and it probably had not been but for the rhyme. The five lines from "He spake" are noble. Indeed, we cannot imagine them improved; and therefore the judges—that is We—assign the prize to Cowper and Sotheby conjunct in brackets.

The feeling of the sublimity of this renowned passage of Homer is not, however, complete without what follows the Nod.

Τὴν γὰρ ὡς βυλεύσαντι διτρυγῖν ἢ μὴν ἵππῳ
Εἰς ἄλλα ἄλτο βαθύῃ ἀπ' αἰγλήντος Ὀλύμπῳ
Ζεὺς δὲ ἰὼν πρὸς δῶμα. Οἰοῖ δ' ἅμα πάντις ἀνέσται
Ἐξ ἰδίων, σφῶ πατρὸς ἡκνῆτιον ὅδ' τις ἴτλη
Μῖναι ἐπιερχομένην, ἀλλ' ἀντίοι ἴσαν ἅπαντες,
Ὡς οὐ μὴν ἵνα καθίζῃ ἐπὶ θρόνῳ.

Let us compare here again the competitors for the Grecian Crown.

DRYDEN.

"The Goddess goes exulting from his sight,
And seeks the seas profound, and leaves the realms of light.
He moves into his hall; the Powers resort,
Each from his house, to fill the Sovereign's court.
Nor waiting summons—nor expecting stood—
But met with reverence, and received the God.
He mounts the throne," &c.

POPE.

"Swift to the seas profound the Goddess flies,
Jove to his starry mansion in the skies.
The shining synod of th' immortals wait
The coming God; and from their thrones of state,
Arising silent, rapt in holy fear,
Before the Majesty of Heaven appear.
Trembling they stand, while Jove assumes the throne," &c.

COWPER.

"Their conference closed, they went. She, down at once,
With headlong plunge into the briny deep,
And to his own ethereal mansion, Jove.
His dread approach perceived, uprose the Gods,
And all at once, to meet the sire of all.
He reach'd his throne, and sat.

SOTHEBY.

"Their conference o'er, the Ocean Nymph again
Down from Olympus plunged beneath the main.
Jove sought his palace: as their sire appeared,
The Gods his might and majesty revered;
None dared regardless linger on his seat—
But on their king's advance arose to greet.
Jove on his throne reclined," &c.

Dryden may be called—should you happen to be in good humour—spirited; should you happen, "as is your custom of an afternoon," to be in spirits yourself, then you probably will call him splendid. But to us, who are scribbling away

"In the silence of midnight's contemplative hour," with no refreshment on the table but our snuff-box, (filled, by the by, with incomparable, a kindly-taken present, at a pinch, from our unforgettable friend in Wigmore street, No 6,) the version is far from first-rate. In Homer, Thetis vanishes in a moment—"Εἰς ἄλλα ἄλτο βαθύῃ;" in Dryden, she is nominative to three verbs. She "goes,"

she "seeks," and she "leave" She lingers in that long lazy line—when she should have been off like a shot—down to the deep like a sea-eagle.

"The Powers resort,
Each from his house, to fill the sovereign's court,"

is good in itself, but bad, in so far as it is a misreading—for the Powers were already at court, and Homer says they rose up from their seats. But a mere mistake of ignorance is not to us half so offensive, in a translator of Homer, as a wilful error of arrogance, and therefore we are here gentle upon John.

Pope, here, is much inferior to his Master. In the first line, "flies" is not at all the right word; neither is "starry mansion," in the second: yet the suddenness of the parting is given, and the rapidity of the motion of the sea-diving and of the sky-soaring Immortal. "Rapt in holy fear," are words that, to our ears, seem not rightly applied to a crowd of Heathen Gods and Goddesses. They sound too Scriptural—we hope we are mistaken—but we are not mistaken, we fear, in objecting to "Trembling they stand." What, may we ask, were they so very much afraid of? Still we pass Pope, by no means a pauper, with praise to the next parish.

Cowper, again, beats both Dryden and Pope hollow. He was full of Homer then—when he saw Thetis

"Down at once

With headlong plunge into the briny deep;"

"Believe my nod, the great, the certain sign,
When Jove propitious hears the powers divine,
The sign that ratifies my high command,
That thus I will; and what I will shall stand.
This said, his kingly brow the Sire inclined,
The large black curls fell awful from behind,
Thick shadowing the stern forehead of the God:
Olympus trembled at the mighty nod.
The Goddess smiled; and, with a sudden leap,
From the high mountain plunged into the deep.
But Jove repair'd to his celestial towers,
And as he rose, uprose the immortal powers.
In ranks on either side the assembly cast,
Bow'd down, and did obeisance as he past,
To him enthroned," &c.

and how calm the contrast of

And to his own ethereal mansion, Jove!"

What can be better, too, than

"Uprose the Gods,
And all at once!"

Nothing. Cowper, again, had Milton in his mind. He leans on the right arm of Homer, and on the left of Milton—and so doing, he is not likely to fall to the ground.

Sotheby is rather better, perhaps, than Pope—but very inferior to Cowper. "Ocean-nymph," we do not relish—we hardly know why—applied here to Thetis. She was an Ocean-nymph, but here we look on her as the mother of Achilles, and wish Sotheby had called her Goddess. Homer here calls her simply η, and we prefer that monosyllable with its aspirate. "Again" is scarcely correct. She did not plunge "again." It was her first and only plunge—that day. "Linger on his seat" is not the potatoe. "Reclined" is surely not "xathēr." We believe he sat down on his throne, as straight as a pole or a pine. Stop—perhaps not. He leant a little back—like a glorious oak-tree—slightly off the perpendicular, yet with its golden crown steadfast in the sunshine.

Where is Tickel? Under a heap of slips. Let us see how he and Addison—for Pope shrewdly suspected the Spectator had a finger in the pie—manage the matter.

'Pon our honour, Tickel, or Addison, or both, have acquitted themselves admirably. They have deviated a little too much from the words, but they have preserved the spirit of Homer,—and they need not shrink from comparison with the best of their competitors.

But where all this while has been sleeping old Chapman? Why, we have been sitting on the flat folio. Let us see.

"To thy prayer my eminent head shall move,
Which is the great sign of my will with all the immortal states;
Irrevocable, never fails; never without the rates
Of all powers else; when my head bows, all heads bow with it still,
As their first mover, and gives power to any work I will.
He said; and his black eyebrows bent; above his deathless head
Th' ambrosian curls flowed; great heaven shook; and both were severed,
Their counsels broken. To the depth of Neptune's kingdom dived Thetis from Heaven's height; Jove arose, and all the Gods received (All rising from their thrones) their Sire, attending to his court.
None sat, when he rose; none delayed the furnishing his port,
Till he came near—all met with him, and brought him to his throne," &c.

The old boy had certainly a fiery spirit, and an energetic style. He satisfied to skip or slur over all his asperities, and roughnesses; as you value your life, to steer clear of his jaw-breakers; and shut your eyes, if you can, against the bold blunders that he dashes into your face, and you may often be roused and elevated by his blad. He himself thought his translation a great work. He speaks of "the frontless detractions of some stupid ignorants that, no more knowing me than their own beastly ends, and I ever (to my knowledge) blest from their sight, whisper behind me—vitiating of my translation; out of the French affirming them," &c. and afterwards saith of the judicious reader, "that he will easily see I understand the understandings of all other interpreters, and commentators, in places of his utmost depth, importance, rapture." And again, "for my other fresh fry, let them fry in their foolish galls; nothing so much weighed as the barking of puppies, or foisting-hounds; too vile to think of our sacred Homer, or set their profane feet within their lives' lengths of his threshold."

The old bouncing buck then tells us, that he has "not left behind him any of his (Homer's) sentence, elegance, height, intention, and invention"—and then to shew his humility, he saith, "I know I cannot too much diminish and divest myself," which he does by elsewhere informing us that he translated the last twelve books in fifteen weeks! We must have an article on Chapman.

Mercy on us! here is that little thick, black, beast—Old Hobbes—We mean his Homer. Hark!

"But go, lest she observe what you do here.
I'll give a nod to all that you have spoken;
That you may safely trust to, and not fear—
A nod from me is an unfailling token.
This said, with his black brows he to her nodded,
Wherewith displayed were his locks divine;
Olympus shook at stirring of his godhead,
And Thetis from it jump'd into the brine.
And Jupiter unto his house went down!
The gods arose and waited on him thither;
But unto Juno it was not unknown
That he and Thetis had conferr'd together," &c.

This is the unconscious grotesque, and burlesque of the sublime and beautiful, and will never, we venture to prophesy, be carried farther by any mortal-Momusaping Apollo.

It is our intention to have several—perhaps six, articles on Sotheby—like and unlike this one; and before Christmas, his merits, which are of the highest order, will be admired wherever Maga cheers human life.

and SHEPHERD—Tea, Coffee, Cautkers, &c. &c. &c. &c. &c. &c. &c.

SHEPHERD.

Receet the passage, again, sir—for oh! but it's caautifn', and I couldna hae believed that it was Milton's.

TICKLER.

Milton is worth all your modern poets in a lump, were you to multiply them by—

SHEPHERD.

But we shanna put them a' into a lump, Mr Tickler—nor multiply their multiplicand by any multiplicavtor whatsoever; for I hae nae notion o' slumpin' inspiration in that gate, a sair injustice to a' individual Genie. Let ilka poet, great and sma', staun' on his ain feet, and no be afeard o' the takin'
o' his altitude, by quadrants in the hauns o' geometrical critics—accepp them that sits on ane anither's knees, and they may just keep sittin' there; and them that tries to owertap their betters, by getting theirsel's hoisted up upon stools or tables—to say little or naething o' twa three mair wha shall be nameless, that speels up the backs o' the brither-hards, and look proudly alang the heads o' the crood, seemingly higher by head and shouthers than their supporters and elevators, but wha are sure to get a fa' at last—and then, wae's me! they're trampled aneath hoofs, and never mair recover either their hats or their laurels. But receet the passage again, Mr North.

NORTH (recites).

"Now came still evening on, and twilight grey
Had in her sober livery all things clad.
Silence accompanied—for bird and beast,
These to their grassy couch, these to their lair,
Had slunk—all but the wakeful nightingale—
She all night long her amorous descant sang.
Silence ~~was~~ pleased. Then glow'd the firmament
With living sapphires. Hesperus, who led
The starry host, shone brightest, till the moon,
Rising in clouded majesty, at length
Apparent queen, unveil'd her peerless light,
And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw."

SHEPHERD.

How beautifully progressive, sir, up to the tapmost pitch o' nocturnal beauty!

NORTH.

Seemingly most simple, James, yet, believe me, steeped, every syllable and sentence, in imagination. Had it not been so, be assured, the "divine Milton" had never introduced so long a description into Paradise Lost. Natural it might have been, without being imaginative; but, in that case, it would have disfigured instead of improving the poem.

SHEPHERD.

It may be sae. I ken naething, for my ain pairt, about imagination—that's to say, the secret o' its power. For I'm a poet, and nae metaphysician; whereas the late Dr Thomas Brown—wha, by the by, was aye unco kind to me—was a metaphysician, but nae poet.

NORTH.

Coleridge is both—so is Wordsworth—so is Bowles—and so was Byron. For my own part, James, I am neither—

SHEPHERD.

That's true.

NORTH.

What's true, sir? Do you dare to say that I am not sup—

SHEPHERD.

I'm wullin', Mr North, to alloo ye the possession o' a' the powers that ever glorified humanity, gin you would but gie ower layin traps for compliments to your genius and tawlons—fishin' for flatteries, no only frae the likes o' me—for that I can understaun' and sympathese wi'—but frae fules and sumpls o' a' ages and sexes—sometimes wi' the flea, and sometimes wi' the worm—and sometimes wi' the baggy mennon—and sometimes wi' the sawmon-rae—and, when nae bait 'll catch them, wi' the verra naked hyeuck, or a girn!

NORTH.

I acknowledge—I confess—I glory in that impeachment. Without sympathy, James, there is "A craving void left aching at my heart."

'Tis like the air I breathe—without it I die. That's the secret of my seeming love of—

SHEPHERD.

Weel, weel—I believe you—judging by myself—but what o' the passage?

NORTH.

The imagination, therein, my dear Shepherd, is conceivable to be, either in the successive objects or portions of descriptions, that is, severally, in each; or not in each singly, but in the conjunction of them in the whole.

SHEPHERD.

Or baith ways at ance.

NORTH.

True. What then, may be the Imagination of the successive members of the whole? Rather, is there any, and what is it, in them, in this example? For it may be whatever it is in real objects.

SHEPHERD.

I'm perplexed already—what's your wull?

NORTH.

There appears to be much of that kind of Imagination which consists in infused animation and undefined incipient Impersonation. "Now came still evening on," and "Twilight grey had in her sober livery all things clad." "Silence accompanied."

SHEPHERD.

You say richt, sir—three impersonifications.

NORTH.

If I could suppose that here were meant to be introduced three distinct figured personages, taken out of Italian poetry, and all sorts of poetical writing, for some hundreds of years, I should be sorry. I hope and confide that Milton meant no more than that degree of alteration of things from their reality which forces itself irresistibly upon us, in certain proper moods of contemplating them.

SHEPHERD.

Imaginative moods.

NORTH.

Try to consider each expression as literally as you can, and suppose that Milton meant to represent the objects as nearly what they are, to the simple understanding, as poetical feeling, predominant, would suffer him. Try how much the word Evening is forced from meaning the mere season or hour. "Come on" seems to mean more than that the Evening succeeded to the day. In the first place, it severs the hour, as having a unity in itself; in the next, it attributes to the season a power of advancing, an energy of progress of its own.

TICKLER.

Come, be clear, North—no mysticism.

NORTH.

What! are you listening? Detur, that the proper idea of Evening to the understanding, is of a certain state of external affairs, then co-existent with a particular portion of diurnal rotation:—Detur, that the natural idea of Evening superadds to this something of positiveness in the season of existence, of unity, a distinct entity in it.

TICKLER.

Begin then, my metaphysical master, with an explanation of the natural idea of Evening, and then shew us what of Poetry or Imagination—if any—Milton has added, out of his divine mind, to that Idea.

SHEPHERD.

That's the right method o' procedure, sure anouch, Mr North. Mr Tickler's a clear headed tyke.

NORTH.

You will observe then that the accustomed idea of Evening has in it a degree of work of imagination, since in it that darkness, or less light, which is merely the state, or fact, of certain objects being less illuminated than for some time past they have been, is conceived by us, in the first place, as a positive existing dusk; and in the second, as brought on by a certain hour or season, which hour or season, being in effect nothing but a portion of the admeasurement of time, appears to us to be made up, and consist of, in part, those appearances in nature which are merely its accompaniments,—amongst others, for instance, of that very darkness which at the same time it appears to bring;—the hour, properly considered, can bring nothing: it can only coexist with other things, or become existent along with them. And in all ideas of day, night, seasons, &c., there is such illusion.

TICKLER.

As the old Schoolmen used to say,

"In omnem sensus actum influunt Imaginatio."

NORTH.

Correctly quoted, Tim? Nevertheless, there must be an idea of Evening, which being the universal idea, and as necessarily conceived by the human understanding as that the Sun sets, though mixed in part of illusory conception, is not, for the purposes of poetry, to be accounted imagination.

TICKLER.

Granted.

NORTH.

Let us take, then, this accustomed, simple, necessary idea, and see how far the expressions of the passage in question go beyond it. It shall then appear, that in Milton's expressions there is conceived something more, namely, of the motion of that which has no motion; and, as I think, of an energy, and almost a will of motion in itself. In some way, the words are lifted out of prose, and but a little way. The epithet "still," though as ordinary an epithet to Evening as you can find, enhances the effect, the separation of Evening, from being nothing but a state, with time, of external existence.

TICKLER.

But you must make out more distinctly, sir, the division between the natural imagination which is in our usual idea of Evening, and the heightened imagination that is in Milton's expressions.

NORTH.

I will. If you go through the description, you find, as to each object of thought, some heightening of the same sort. "Twilight had clad,"—an energy of action. Even "Silence accompanied,"—is an act,—and an act of that which is so far from being something, that it is not even the negation of an entity, but the negation of certain actions of entities. Besides, whatever it is, it is included in the state of external things. It does not "accompany." "Hesperus that led,"—"host,"—"rode brightest,"—"clouded majesty,"—"queen,"—"unveiled her light,"—observe here is, at every point almost, a heightening from the inanimate reality. The only part of the description which is without alteration from reality, is bird and beast, they being already animate. What is to be remarked, in respect to them, is merely the generalizing way in which they are disposed of, and perhaps the word "slunk." Now, supposing the description to be a tolerably good one, we may say that every step of it falls under imagination, severally. The objects being either such as naturally affect imagination without any heightening from the peculiar and strong feelings of the poet, or being brought under imagination, or their natural imagination enhanced by such heightenings. The nightingale singing sole, is in herself an object to imagination. I do not take "living sapphires" to have the sense of that infused animation which belongs to impersonation, but merely the effect to the eye. The firmament "glowed," may have a slight degree of imagination. There is something in the conception beyond what the cold understanding gives.

TICKLER.

You have explained your meaning well, sir.

SHEPHERD.

Middlin'.

NORTH.

Is there, then, I ask, gentlemen, besides this imagination in the parts, any imaginative effect in the whole, that is, an effect resulting from the combination of all the parts? I am inclined to think there is, and that the impression which is left from the whole is that of a LIVING CALM.

SHEPHERD.

A Leevin' Cawm!

NORTH.

If so, the contribution of every part to the effect of the whole is intelligible. The stillness throughout—the song that does not disturb silence—the lights so serene and yet pregnant with life—the infused animation of every object that has not—and the sufficiency of animation in those that have it—have all a perfect propriety. It may not belong exactly to the question I am considering—

SHEPHERD.

What question?

NORTH.

—though it does to the poetical analysis of the passage, to show the skillful progress of impressiveness.

SHEPHERD.

Ah, ah! ma man! You're borrowin' frae me noo—for that's the verra first observe I made on your selectin' the passage.

NORTH.

So much the better, James. Observe then, on the whole, each object rising in this respect above another—and yet not by a scale. For instance, when real living creatures are introduced, it is done in gradation, first, those that sleep, then the night-singer, in whom the feeling of animal natural life is raised to its height, by the line "She all night long her amorous descant sung." And immediately a great tranquillization follows, and that animal vitality is blotted out by insensate things, and no pulse or breathing is more, save those which circulate in space, and in the bosom of universal nature.

SHEPHERD.

Still following out ma original idea!

NORTH.

Detur, that all I have said is right—here is then shewn by an instance what is meant properly by a poetical description—that is to say, of many ways believed, one way is shewn in which a description is placed under the reign of imagination.

SHEPHERD.

Aneuch. Be dune, sir.

NORTH.

This is the preparatory part of the enquiry. Then ensues this other question—What is in this instance the character, quality, nature of the affection of imagination? It is plain, in the first place, that it is essentially feeling. Secondly, that it is feeling of a singular, remote, and rather mysterious kind. Thirdly, the feeling is that which accompanies and enters into the lower degrees of impersonation. If the impression resulting from the whole, is that which I have endeavoured to render by the expression, a LIVING CALM, this belongs to the same mode of imagination. It is as if the vast and deep tranquillity, the very rest and peace, were self-conscious.

TICKLER.

You're a clever lad, Kit, Perge Puer.

NORTH.

It may be proper here to repeat, that in this particular act or mode of imagination, the analysis of imagination gives this form, which always appears to me to be the essential and proper form of imagination, viz. that an object being given to the understanding, by a new and further intellectual act, a feeling not proper to the object (that is, not proper to it in its truth, as conceived by the understanding) is superinduced upon it. Try this in one or two instances. "Silence was pleased." What is given to the understanding? The noiselessness and hush of night—and song delighting the ear, and not disturbing to the heart, but rather quickening and deepening the affection, produced by the general hush and repose. But herein moved imagination perceives a listening spirit of silence—and that pleasure which is felt by the bodily imagined witness, the poet, or any other, and that non-disturbance and rather vivifying and intensifying of his affection of stillness and peace, is, by a turn of imagination, transferred to that spirit which is conceived to be pleased with, and, instead of being annihilated, to exist in more animation by virtue of those sounds. There is here both a production and a variation of thought, beyond or after, or from what is given, proper to the understanding. Is there, by means of these further intellectual acts, any new different feeling induced towards the object of the understanding? Undoubtedly there is, though the difference may be difficult to define. For it is quite impossible that we should look with the same affection of feeling on objects materially different, though it is often difficult to ascertain what our feeling is, especially towards objects which do not affect us with strong emotion; as indeed very many of the feelings of imagination are of so slight, delicate, fine a kind, that we hardly know how to speak of them, or to call them feeling, they are so infinitely remote from the vehement, and possessing power of ordinary passion. Our feeling, or the affection of our mind, the disposition to feel, cannot be the same towards objects so different as the actual silence of nature, and that vivified silence having a soul into which song is instilled. The affection with which we consider silence itself, including in it the idea of tranquillity, is that of tranquillity mixed with something of solemnity, and from its vacancy of fear. But if silence is considered as "LIVING," the sense of solemnity is taken off in some degree, that of fear altogether.

SHEPHERD.

Weel, thank Heaven, this metaphysical enquiry, for it was nae less, into the natur o' imagination, is owre, and that I hae survived it, though rather a wee fentish—sae let's drap in a thummle-fu' o' cogniac untill this—is't the seventh or aucht' cup, think ye, sir, o' coffee—and fortified by the speert, I wad fain trust that sae I shall be able to endure the severest conversation it is in the power o' man to inflict. Mr Tickler, spoot you, in your turn, a screed o' Milton.

TICKLER.

The other Shape,
If Shape it might be called, that shape had none,
Distinguishable in member, joint or limb;
Or substance might be call'd that shadow seemed,
For each seem'd either; black it stood as night,
Fierce as ten Furies, terrible as hell,
And shook a dreadful dart; what seem'd its head
The likeness of a kingly crown had on.
Satan was now at hand——

SHEPHERD (looking round.)

What said ye? Sawtan at haun'!

NORTH.

Speak of the Devil and he'll appear, is a general rule, my dear James, subject to an occasional exception. Regain your composure.

SHEPHERD.

It's a fearsome passage.

TICKLER (taking North's crutch under his arm and imitating the voice, gesture, and manner of the "old man eloquent.")

In this sublime passage, the power of Imagination is at its height. This Being, who, at the gates of hell, offers combat to Satan, has not even yet been named, as if the poet were so lost in the emotion accompanying the sight of the phantom he had himself conjured up, that even a very name had not risen yet for what was so unsubstantial. He scarcely dares to call it by the vague term "Shape;" but as soon as he does so, qualifies even that approach to substantiality, by saying, "if Shape it might be called, which shape had none distinguishable," or "substance might be called that shadow seemed." Then he adds that still farther feeling of unreality—"each seemed either," that is, substance seemed shadow, shadow seemed substance. Thus uncertain in its horror to his eyes, "black it seemed as night;" not utter darkness, but something black and grim, "darkness visible"—"fierce—not as a Fury—for that would be something too definite, since the image of a fury is of something conceived to exist—but fierce as ten furies, an expression in which all individuality is lost, and nothing conveyed to the mind but an idea of aggregated and accumulated fierceness. "Terrible as hell" is still more vague, and purposely so, or rather so under the power of the emotion; yet in all this obscurity, unsubstantiality and shadowiness, it shook a dreadful dart, (observe how much effect is in that word, it,) something not described by any quality, as of size or shape, but merely "dreadful"—how, why, or in what dreadful, we know not; while this motion of its weapon directs the mind to look on the Shape that brandishes it, and lo! that which seemed its head—not its head, but that which in that fury, haunted and infernal darkness seemed its head—the likeness—not the reality—but the likeness of a kingly crown had on! Poetry alone could give such an Imagination as this—for painting would at once of necessity give outlines, features, realities, which, however enveloped in obscurity, would be fatal to the fearful effect, and embody too sensibly the here almost unembodied attributes of this seeming, shadowy, threatening, scarcely-existing, yet most terrific Impersonation!

SHEPHERD.

Had ma twa een been shut the noo, like them o' a Methodist minister sayin' grace, I could hae sworn that you was Mr North, Mr Tickler. His verra vice! And then, as to the matter, the same licht o' truth fitfully brightens through the glimmer or gloom o' a mair or less perfect incomprehensibility. An' that's what you twa chitls ca' pheelosophical creetyschism?

TICKLER.

Pray recite, James, a passage from the Excursion, that I may make it undergo a similar process of investigation into the principles of composition.

SHEPHERD.

Mee recet a passage frae the Excursion?

NORTH.

What is your opinion of that Poem, Tickler?

TICKLER.

The Excursion is full of fine poetry, but it is not what the author intended it to be, and believes that it is—a Great Poem. Mr Wordsworth cannot conceive a mighty plan. His imagination is of the first order; but his intellect does not seem to me, who belong, you know, North, to the old school, commanding and comprehensive. His mind has many noble visions, but they come and go, each in its own glory; a phantasmagorical procession, beautiful, splendid, sublime, but not anywhere forming a Whole, on which the spectator can gaze, entranced by the power of unity.

SHEPHERD.

Entranced by the power o' Unity! Havers—clavers!

TICKLER.

Considered as a work that is to hand down his name to future ages, among those of our great English poets, our Spensers and our Miltons, I must think it a failure, and that it will for ever exclude him from that band of immortals. But you have taught me, sir, to see that it contains passages of such surpassing excellence, in the description of external nature, and in the delineation of feeling, passion, and thought, that I think they may be set by the side of the best passages of a similar kind to be found within the whole range of poetry.

SHEPHERD.

That's praise aneuch to satisfy any reasonable man.

NORTH.

We are not now speaking for the satisfaction of Mr Wordsworth, but of ourselves—

SHEPHERD.

And the world.

NORTH.

My admiration of Mr Wordsworth's genius is well known to the universe, and has often been expressed with more enthusiasm than has been accompanied by the sympathies even of the wisest. I hope it is nevertheless judicious; and I have always given reasons for my delight in his works. But the admiration of some of his critics has, of late years, been any thing but judicious; and the language in which it has been expressed, so outrageous, as to do greater injury to his just and fair fame, than all the attacks of his mightiest or meanest enemies. The Excursion has been often compared by the cockneys with Paradise Lost; and that portion of the Reading Public who know something of Mr Wordsworth's poetry, but not much, have become indignant and disgusted at such foolery, and transferred, unconsciously, to the bard himself some of those ungenial feelings with which it was inevitable and right that they should regard the idiots who had set him up as their idol. His genius is indeed worthy of far other worship.

TICKLER.

With Milton! Shakspeare! forsooth! Why, Paradise Lost is, by the consent of all the civilized world, declared to be the grandest and most sublime poem that ever emanated from the mind of man, equally so in conception and in execution. It embraces all that human beings can feel or comprehend of themselves, their origin, and their destiny. The Excursion is an eloquent and poetical journal of a few days' walk among the mountains of the north of England, kept by one of the party, in which every syllable, good, bad, and indifferent, that was uttered by the three friends, was carefully recorded, and many connecting descriptions introduced by the journalist himself, who was the only one of the trio who had "the accomplishment of verse." I have said enough already to expose the frantic folly of those who speak in the same breath of Paradise Lost and the Excursion.

SHEPHERD.

Quite aneuch.

NORTH.

I am delighted to find you so reasonable, Tickler.

TICKLER.

Nay, I am even an enthusiastic Wordsworthian.

NORTH.

Although the Plan of the Excursion is altogether inartificial, and far from felicitous in any respect, yet it affords room for the display of Mr Wordsworth's very original genius, which delights in description of all that is grand and beautiful on the earth, and in the heavens above the earth, and which is, on all such occasions, truly creative. The Three Friends wander wherever the wind wafts them, poetizing and philosophizing in the solitudes." Sometimes the objects before them awaken their spirits—the rocks, or the houses, or the clouds—and not unfrequently they forget "the visible diurnal sphere," and, in fine flights of imagination, visit the uttermost parts of the earth. The "impulses of deeper kind that come to them in solitude," they delightedly obey; and soon as those impulses cease, they are all equally willing, according to the finest feelings of humanity, to cross the thresholds of "huts where poor men lie," and to converse of, or with them, cheerfully and benignantly; or when more solemn thoughts again arise, to walk into the Churchyard among the Mountains, and muse and meditate among the stoneless turfs above the humble dead, or among the pillars of the sacred pile, on which hang the escutcheons, or are painted the armorial bearings of the high-born ancestry of hall and castle.

SHEPHERD.

Ay, sir, those Books are delictifu!—divine.

NORTH.

I love to hear you say so, my dear James. They are divine.

TICKLER.

Would that all those exquisite pictures had been by themselves, without the cumbrous machinery of the clumsy plan—if plan it may be called.

NORTH.

It is obvious that a parallel might be drawn, though I have no intention now of doing so, between the Excursion and the Task. Wordsworth, if not by nature, certainly by the influences of his life, has far higher enthusiasm of soul than Cowper. He has seen far more of the glories of creation than it was given that other great poet to see; and hence, when he speaks of external nature, his strains are generally of a loftier mood. But Cowper was not ambitious—and Wordsworth's chief fault is ambition. The author of The Task loved nature for her own sake—the author of The Excursion loves her chiefly for the sake of the power which she inspires within him—for the sake of the poetry that his gifted spirit flings over all her cliffs, and infuses into all her torrents. It often requires great effort to follow Wordsworth in his hymns—nor can any reader do so who has not enjoyed some of the same privileges in youth that have all his life long been open to that poet—above all, the privileges of freedom from this world's carking cares, enjoyed to the uttermost among the steadfast spectacles, or sudden apparitions of nature. But almost all persons alike, who have ever lived in the country at all, can go along with Cowper. Fields, hedge-rows, groves, gardens, all common rural sights and sounds, and those too of all the seasons, are realized in The Task, so easily and naturally, that we see and hear as we read, with minds seldom, perhaps, greatly elevated above the every-day mood, but touched with gentle and purest pleasure, and filled with a thousand delightful memories. Wordsworth's finest strains can be felt or understood only when our imagination is ready to ascend to its highest sphere—and to the uninitiated they must be unintelligible, and that is indeed their very highest praise. But the finest things in The Task may be enjoyed at all times, and almost by every cultivated mind. That too is their highest praise. To which of the two kinds of poetry the palm should be given, it would be hard to say; but it is easy to know which of the two must be the more popular. Were it for nothing else than its rural descriptions, The Task would still be a favourite poem with almost all classes of readers. Noble as they are, and, in our opinion, frequently equal, if not superior to any thing of the kind in poetry, the rural descriptions of Wordsworth (rural is but a poor word here) can never be sympathized with by the million, for not ten in a thousand are, by constitution or custom, capable to understand their transcendent excellence.

TICKLER.

There must, I fear, be some wrong-headedness in the poet, who, from the whole range of human life, deliberately selected a pedlar for his highest philosophical character in a philosophical poem.

SHEPHERD.

Dinna abuse pedlars, Mr Tickler. In Scotland they're aye murder'd.

TICKLER.

Mr Jeffrey murder'd the pedlar in the Excursion,

SHEPHERD,

Na. Mr Wordsworth.

NORTH.

No impertinence, gents.

SHEPHERD.

Nae wut without a portion o' impertinence,

NORTH.

Therefore I am never witty.

SHEPHERD.

But then, you see, you may be impertinent, as you was the noo, notwithstanding.

NORTH.

The first twenty pages of the Excursion enable the reader to know on what grounds, and for what reasons Mr Wordsworth has chosen, in a moral work of the highest pretensions, to make his chief and most authoritative interlocutor, a pedlar. Much small wit has been sported on the subject, about pieces of tape and riband, thimbles, penknives, knee-buckles, pincushions, and other pedlar-ware; and perhaps such associations, and others, essentially mean or paltry, must, to a certain extent, connect themselves in most, or all minds, with the idea of such a calling. There is neither difficulty nor absurdity, however, in believing that an individual, richly endowed with natural gifts, may be a pedlar—and certainly that mode of life not only furnishes, but offers the best opportunities to a man of a thoughtful and feeling mind, of becoming intimately and thoroughly acquainted with all the on-goings of humble life. Robert Burns was an exciseman. Yet it does not follow from this, that there is wisdom in the choice of such a small retired merchant for the chief spokesman in a series of dialogues, in which one of the greatest poets of England is to take a part. Of many things spoken of in those dialogues, such a pedlar, in virtue of his profession, was an excellent judge; but of many more the knowledge is not only not peculiarly appropriate to a pedlar, but such knowledge as could only, I conceive, have been accumulated and mastered by a man of finished classical education. We fear, therefore, that there is something absurd in his language about Thebes, and “Palmyra central in the desert,” nor less so in the profound attention with which he listens to the “Poet’s” still more eloquent, most poetical, and philosophical disquisition on the origin of the heathen mythology. But admitting this, none but the shallowest and weakest minds will allow themselves to be overcome by a word. Blot out the word pedlar from the poem, substitute, as Charles Lamb well remarked, the word palmer, and the poem is then relieved from this puny and futile objection. Let his previous history be unknown—his birth and parentage—and let him be merely said to be a man of natural genius, great powers of reflection, a humane spirit, an understanding chiefly cultivated by self-education, though not unenlightened by knowledge of history, and especially of long and intimate experience of the habits, and occupations, and character of the poor, and we have a person before us, entitled to walk and talk even with Mr Wordsworth, and if so, before all the world,

TICKLER.

My dear Shepherd, will you have the goodness to help me to wheel round your sofa-bed towards the right flank of the fire?

SHEPHERD.

Surely, sir—but you’re no gaun to sleep?

TICKLER.

Why, James, I waltzed from eleven last night till three this morning——

SHEPHERD.

You what?

TICKLER.

Waltzed, and galloped, and mazourka'd.

SHEPHERD.

The man's mad.

[TICKLER lies down on the sofa-bed, and the SHEPHERD covers him cozily with cloaks.

TICKLER.

Pastor Fido!

SHEPHERD.

I wunner what Procrustus wou'd hae thoct o' you, sir?—Noo—dianna snore name. Though I snore mysell, I canna thole't in ither's—that's a guid callant—say your prayers—shut your een—and gang to sleep. Hushaby—hushaby—hushaby—hushaby! Remember me, sir, to a' your freens in the Land o' Nod—a strange shadowy set, an unaccountable generation—leevin' unner laws that hae subelisted syne the Fa', and enjoyin' sic a perfect system o' misrepresentation, that nae desire hae they o' Parliamentary Reform!

TICKLER (indistinctly.)

"A plague on both your houses."

SHEPHERD.

His een's fast glazin'—there's a bit snorie—and noo I think that may be safely ca'd sleep.—(Starting up)—Mr North, haud ma hauns!

NORTH.

Hold your hands! What do you mean, James?

SHEPHERD.

I was seized just then wi' a shudderin' impetus to murder Mr Tickler—and had there been a knife on the table, I do devoutly believe I wou'd hae nicked his craig.

NORTH (taking his crutch from its corner.)

I cannot just exactly say, James, that I altogether like the expression in these eyes of yours at present. Burke indeed is dead—but his accomplices are yet alive——

SHEPHERD.

Oh, man! but you're easily frightened—you're a great cooart——

NORTH (cautiously restoring the crutch to its corner, while he still eyes the SHEPHERD.)

Well then—well—James.

SHEPHERD.

Wheesht, sir—wheest. Speak loun, and ring the bell saftly—for eisters, and we'll cheat Tickler oot o' the brodd.

[Enter the Establishment with the Oyster board—the Council of Five Hundred.

NORTH.

Now, my dear James, let us suck them up silently—not to disturb Timothy's dreams.

SHEPHERD.

Excessive sappy!

NORTH.

Very.

SHEPHERD.

Young though lusty—their beards are no grown yet—ay, here's ane wi' a pair o' whaukers——

NORTH.

The natural history of the oyster——

SHEPHERD.

Oh, sir! but I'm fonder and fonder every day o' the study o' natural history.

NORTH.

You have Bewick, I know, James, at your finger-ends——

SHEPHERD.

Na—you ken nae sic thing. I hae little or nae knowledge at my finger-ends, or ma tongue-tip either—it lies a' in my brain and in my heart. When, at times, the ideas come flashing out, my een are filled wi' fire—and when the emotions come flowin' up, wi' water; at least in the ae case there's brightness, and in the ither a haze. Aften the twa unite, like a cloud, veilin', but no hidin', the sun—like radiance on dew, shewin' it mair translucent ere it melt awa' on the spring buds or the simmer flowers—an evanescence o' liquid lustre, out o' whose bosom the happy thochts flee awa' to ither regions o' delight, like bees obeyin' their instincts, that lead them, without chart or compass, to every nook in the wilderness where blows a family o' heather-bells.

NORTH.

I know you have the Journal of a Naturalist, published by Mr Murray—a delightful volume—perhaps the most so—nor less instructive than delightful—given to natural history since White's Selborne.

SHEPHERD.

You gied me't, and I never lend byeucks you gied me—for to lend a byeuck is to lose it—and borrowin's but a hypocritical pretence for stealin', and shou'd be punished wi' death—

TICKLER.

Without benefit of clergy.

SHEPHERD.

True, indeed, sir; a clergyman cou'd be o' nae benefit to sic an unjustified sinner.

NORTH.

But there is another work, James, called "The British Naturalist," published by Whittaker, Treacher, and Arnott, Ave-Maria-Lane, which I must send out to you by the carrier—

SHEPHERD.

What for no gie't to me the noo, and I'll put it in my pouch?

NORTH.

'Tis not in the Snuggery. Indeed, at present, both volumes are with Mrs Gentle. The author is not only well versed in natural science, but he is a close observer of nature. He has a keen eye and a fine ear, and writes, not only with perspicuity, but, like almost all good naturalists, with eloquence. He views his subjects in those masses in which we find them grouped in nature; and the plant or the animal has been taken in conjunction with the scenery, and the general and particular use—and when that arose easily, the lesson of morality or natural religion.

SHEPHERD.

A plan, I jalouse, at aince natural and feelosofical.

NORTH.

The woodcuts of the various animals and insects are designed and executed by Mr W. N. Brooke—and those of the lake and the brook by Mr Bonner, from drawings by Harry Wilson, Esq., who, by the way, has recently published some interesting Views of Foreign Cities.

SHEPHERD.

What mean ye, sir, by the Lake and the Brook?

NORTH.

Why, the first volume of the British Naturalist consists of parts, entitled the Mountain, the Lake, the River, the Sea, the Moor, and the Brook.

SHEPHERD.

Be sure to remember no to forget to keep it in your mind, sir, to attend to drappin' a hint to Mrs Gentle, that ye hae promised to send out the twa volumms o' the British Naturalist to Altrive—and shou'd they only be in boards, you had as weel get them bun', plainly but strangly, for wee Jamie's mad about a' crawlin', creepin', soomin', and fleein' things, and I think o' getting him made an Honorary Member o' the Wernerian Society.

NORTH.

I will send you out, at the same time, my dear James, "Menageries," written, I am told, by my most amiable and ingenious philosophic friend, Charles Knight, Editor (?) of the Library of Entertaining Knowledge.

The "Tower Menagerie," containing the natural history of the animals contained in that establishment, with anecdotes of their character and history—

SHEPHERD.

That wull be a feast to my darling.

NORTH.

—illustrated by portraits, taken from life, by that admirable artist, William Harvey, and engraved on wood by Branstons and Wright, who stand in the first rank of their profession.

SHEPHERD.

He'll wear his deen een out—God bless him—on the lions, teeggers, and leopards—for though a lamb in gentleness o' disposition, the fiercer the animal, the deeper draughts o' delight drinks his imagination frae the rings o' their een, and the spats on their hide, sae wildlike wi' the speerit o' the sandy deserts; yet mair beautifu' than ony tame creaturs that walk peaceably aroun' the dwellin's o' men.

NORTH.

The literary department has been superintended by E. T. Bennet, Esq., F.L.S., an active member of the Zoological Society—and much valuable assistance afforded by N. A. Vigors, the Secretary—

SHEPHERD:

Erudite, I doot not, on a' manner o' monsters—

NORTH.

Zoologists, James, of the first order. To the same gentlemen we owe a similar work, equally beautiful—"The Gardens and Menagerie of the Zoological Society, Vol. I., Quadrupeds"—

SHEPHERD.

Pit it intil the parshel. But diinna tak the trouble o' payin' the carriage—for I'll no grudge it, nor a couple o' caulkers to the carrier, wha's a steady man, and never sleeps in his cart, nor, when she's heavily laden, even up-hill, louns on to ease himsell on the tram—a dangerous practice, that has made many an honest woman a widow, and many weans orphans.

NORTH.

Your head, my dear James, is now touching Howitt's "Book of the Seasons." Prig and pocket it. 'Tis a jewel.

[The Shepherd seizes it from the shelf, and acts as per order.

SHEPHERD.

Is Nottingham far intil England, sir? For I wou'd really like to pay the Hooitt's a visit this simmer. Thae Quakers are, what ane might scarcely opine frae first principles, a maist poetical Christian seck. There was Scott o' Amwell, wha wrott some simplish things in a preservin' speerit o' earnestness;—there is Wilkinson, yonner, wha wonus on a beautifu' banked river, no far aff Peerith, (is't the Eamont, think ye?) the owther o' no a few pomes delichtfu' in their domesticity—auld bachelor though he be—nae warld-sick hermit, but an enlightened labourer o' love, baith in the kitchen and flower garden o' natur';—lang by letter has me and Bernard Barton been acquent, and verily he is ane o' the mildest and modestest o' the Muses' sons, nor wanting a thochtful genie, that affen gies birth to verses that treasure themselves in folk's hearts;—the best echolar amang a' the Quakers is Friend Wiffen, a capital translator, Sir Walter tells me, o' poets wi' foreign tongues, sic as Tawso, and wi' an original vein too, sir, which has produced, as I opine, some verra pure ore;—and feenally, the Hooitts, the three Hooitts,—na, there may be mair o' them for aught I ken, but I'ae answer for William and Mary, husband and wife, and oh! but they're weel met; and eke for Richard, (can he be their brither?) and wha's this was tellin' me about anither brither o' Wulffe's, a Dr Godfrey Hooitt, ane o' the best botanists in a' England, and a desperate beetle-hunter?

NORTH.

Entomologist, James. A man of science.

SHEPHERD.

The twa married Hooitts I love just excessively, sir. What they write canna fall o' being poetry, even the maist middlin' o't, for its aye wi' them the ebullition o' their ain feeling, and their ain fancy, and whenever that's the case, a bonny word or twa will drap itsell intil ilka stanzy, and a sweet stanzy or twa intil ilka pome, and sae they touch, and sae they sune win a body's heart; and frae readin' their byeuckies ane wushes to ken theirsells, and indeed do ken theirsells, for their personal characters are revealed in their volumms, and methinks I see Wully and Mary——

NORTH.

Strolling quietly at eve or morn by the silver Trent——

SHEPHERD.

No sae silver, sir, surely as the Tweed?

NORTH.

One of the sincerest streams in all England, James.

SHEPHERD.

Sincere as an English sowle that carena wha looks intil't, and flawa bauldly alang whether reflectin' cluds or sunshine.

NORTH.

Richard, too, has a true poetical feeling, and no small poetical power. His unpretending volume of verses well deserves a place in the library along with those of his enlightened relatives—for he loves nature truly as they do, and nature has returned his affection.

SHEPHERD.

But what's this Byeuck o' the Seasons?

NORTH.

In it the Howitts have wished to present us with all their poetic and picturesque features—a Calendar of Nature, comprehensive and complete in itself—which, on being taken up by the lover of nature at the opening of each month, should lay before him in prospect all the objects and appearances which the month would present, in the garden, in the field, and the waters—yet confining itself solely to those objects. Such, in their own words, is said to be their aim.

SHEPHERD.

And nae insignificant aim either, sir. Hae they hit it?

NORTH.

They have. The scenery they describe is the scenery they have seen.

SHEPHERD.

That circling Nottingham.

NORTH.

Just so, James. Their pictures are all English.

SHEPHERD.

They shew their sense in stickin' to their native land—for unless the heart has brooded, and the can brooded too, on a' the aspects o' the outer warld till the edge o' ilka familiar leaf recalls the name o' the flower, shrub, or tree frae which it has been blawn by the wind, or dropped in the cawm, the poet's haun 'll waver, and his picture be but a haze. In a' our warks, baith great an' sma', let us be national; an' thus the true speerit o' ae kintra 'll be breathed intil anither, an' the hail warld encompassed an' pervaded wi' poetry and love.

NORTH.

As a proof, James, of their devotedness to merry England——

SHEPHERD.

No a whit less merry that it contains a gude many Quakers.

NORTH.

——our Friends have described the year, without once alluding—as far as I have observed—to the existence of Thameon!

SHEPHERD.

Na—that is queer an' comical enough;—nor can I just a'thegether approve o' that forgetfulness, ignorance, or omission.

NORTH.

It shews their sincerity. They quote, indeed, scarcely any poetry but Wordsworth's—for in it, above all other, their quiet, and contemplative, and meditative spirits seem to repose in delight.

SHEPHERD.

I canna understaun' why it should be sae, but wi' the exception o' yourself, sir, I never ken't man or woman ~~who loved and admired Wordsworth up to the pitch, or near till't, o' idolatrous worship, who seemed to care a doit for any ither poet, leevin' or dead:~~ He's a sectawrian, you see, sir, in the religion o' natur'—

NORTH.

Her High Priest.

SHEPHERD.

Weel—weel—sir; e'en be't sac. But is that ~~any reason why a' ither priests shou'd be despised or disregarded, when tryin' in a religious speerit to expound or illustrate the same byeuck—the byeuck o' natur' which God has given us, wi' the haly leaves lyin' open, sae that he wha rins may read, though it's only them that walks slowly, or sits down sneath the shadow o' a rock or a tree, that can understaun' sufficient to privilege them to breathe forth their knowledge an' their feelings in poetry, which is aye as a prayer or a thanksgiving?~~

NORTH.

The Book of the Seasons is a delightful book—and I recommend it to all lovers of nature.

[Enter the Household on their stocking-soles, and remove the relics of the Feast of Shells.]

SHEPHERD.

Noo we may wauken Tickler. He whuspered intil my lug, as I was makin' him cozy wi' the cloaks, no to let him sleep ayont eleven.

[The Shepherd "blows mimic hootings to the silent owl," who, opening his large eyes, cries "towhit toowhoo!" and sits up on his perch.]

TICKLER.

Let us have oysters.

SHEPHERD.

Eisters! The eisters 'll no be ready, sir, for an hour yet. For my ain pairt, I'm no hungry the nicht—and dinna think I'll eat ony eisters. Mr North, will you?

NORTH.

No.

SHEPHERD.

Dinna fash wi' eisters the nicht, Mr Tickler—for this has been a stormy day, and they're no caller. Was ye dreamin', sir? For you seemed unco restless.

TICKLER.

I was, James.

SHEPHERD.

What o'?

TICKLER.

A Battle of Cats.

"How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon the slates!"

Miss Tabitha having made an assignation with Tom Tortoiseshell, the feline phenomenon, they two sit curmurring, forgetful of mice and milk, of all but love! How meekly mews the Demure, relapsing into that sweet under-song—the Purr! And how curls Tom's whiskers like those of a Pashaw! The point of his tail—and the point only is alive—insidiously turning itself, with serpentlike seduction, towards that of Tabitha, pensive as a Nun. His eyes are rubies, hers emeralds—as they should be—his lightning, hers lustre—for in her sight he is the lord, and in his, she is the lady of Creation.

NORTH.

"O happy love! when love like this is found!
O heartfelt raptures! bless beyond compare!
I've paced much this weary mortal round,
And sage experience bids me this declare—
If earth a draught of heavenly pleasure share,
One cordial in this melancholy vale.
'Tis when a youthful, loving, modest pair,
In others arms breathe out the tender tale!"—

SHEPHERD.

The last line wunna answer—

"Beneath the milk-white thorn that scents the evening gale!"

TICKLER.

Woman or cat—she who hesitates, is lost. But Diana, shining in heaven, the goddess of the Silver Bow, sees the peril of poor Pussy—and interposes her celestial aid to save the vestal. An enormous grimalkin, almost a wild cat, comes rattling along the roof, down from the chimney-top, and Tom Tortoiseshell, leaping from love to war, tackles to the Red Rover in single combat. Sniff—snuff—splutter—squeak—squall—caterwaul, and throttle!

NORTH.

Where are the following lines?

"From the soft music of the spinning purr,
When no stiff hair disturbs the glossy fur,
The whining wail, so piteous and so faint,
When through the house Puss moves with long complaint,
To that unearthly throttling caterwaul,
When feline legions storm the midnight wall,
And chant, with short snuff and alternate hiss,
The dismal song of hymeneal bliss"——

SHEPHERD.

Wheesht, North—wheesht.

TICKLER.

Over the eaves sweeps the hairy hurricane. Two cats in one—like a prodigious monster with eight legs and a brace of heads and tails—and through among the lines on which clothes are hanging in the back-green, and which break the fall, the dual number plays squeelch on the miry herbage.

SHEPHERD.

A pictur o' a back-green in fowre words. I see it and them.

TICKLER.

The four-story fall has given them fresh fury and more fiery life. What tails! Each as thick as my arm, and rustling with electricity like the northern streamers. The Red Rover is generally uppermost—but not always—for Tom has him by the jugular like a very bulldog—and his small, sharp, tiger-teeth, entangled in the fur, pierce deeper and deeper into the flesh—while Tommy keeps tearing away at his rival, as if he would eat his way into his windpipe. Heavier than Tom Tortoiseshell is the Red Rover by a good many pounds; but what is weight to elasticity—what is body to soul? In the long tussle, the hero ever vanquishes the ruffian—as the Cock of the North the Gander.

NORTH (howling).

Proceed.

TICKLER.

Cats' heads are seen peering over the tops of walls, and then their lengthening bodies, running crouchingly along the copestones, with pricked-up ears and glaring eyes, all attracted towards one common centre—the back-green of the inextinguishable battle. Some dropping, and some leaping down, from all altitudes, lo! a general melle! For Tabitha, having through a skylight forced her way down stairs, and out of the kitchen-window into the back-area, is sitting pensively on the steps,

"And like another Helen fires another Troy."

Detachments come wheeling into the field of battle from all imaginable and unimaginable quarters—and you now see before you all the cats in Edinburgh, Stockbridge, and the suburbs, about as many, I should suppose, as the proposed constituents of our next city member.

SHEPHERD.

The Town-Council are naething to them in nummers. The back-green's absolutely composed o' cats.

TICKLER.

Up fly a thousand windows from ground-flat to attic, and what an exhibition of nightcaps! Here elderly gentlemen, apparently in their shirts, with head night-gear from Kilmarnock, worthy of Tappitoury's self—behind them their wives—grandmothers at the least—poking their white faces, like those of sheeted corpses, over the shoulders of the fathers of their numerous progeny—there chariest maids, prodigal enough to unveil their beauties to the moon, yet, in their alarm, folding the frills of their chemises across their bosoms—and lo! yonder the Captain of the Six Feet Club, with his gigantic shadow frightening that pretty damsel back to her couch, and till morning haunting her troubled dreams! “Fire! Fire!” “Murder! Murder!” is the cry—and there is wrath and wonderment at the absence of the police-officers and engines. A most multitudinous murder is in process of perpetration there—but as yet fire is there none; when lo! and hark! the flash and peal of musketry—and then the music of the singing slugs slaughtering the Catti, while bouncing up into the air, with Tommy Tortoise clinging to his carcass, the Red Rover yowls wolfishly to the moon, and then descending like lead into the stoue-area, gives up his nine-ghosts, never to chew cheese more, and dead as a herring. In mid-air the Phenomenon had let go his hold, and seeing it in vain to oppose the yeomanry, pursues Tabitha, the innocent cause of all this woe, into the coal-cellar, and there, like Paris and Helen,

“When first entranced, in Cranæ’s Isle they lay, Lip press’d to lip, and breathed their souls away,” entitled but not tempted to look at a king, the peerless pair begin to pur and play in that subterranean paradise, forgetful of the pile of cat-corpses that in that catastrophe was heaped half-way up the currant-bushes on the walls, so indiscriminate had been the Strages. All undreamed of by them the beauty of the rounded moon, now hanging over the city, once more steeped in stillness and in sleep!

SHEPHERD.

Capital! Talkin’ o’ cats reminds ane o’ mice—and mice reminds ane o’ toasted cheese. Suppose, Mr Tickler, we hae a Tin-Trencher?

TICKLER.

A Welsh rabbit? Ring the bell.

[Enter Sir David Gam and Tappistoury with Welsh rabbits.]

SHEPHERD.

Noo, sirs, indulge me, if you please, wi’ some feelosofical conversation.

TICKLER.

Moral or physical?

SHEPHERD.

Let me consider. Fizzical.

NORTH.

Nay—nay—James—remember there are three of us—and that it is share and share alike—remember, too, that Tickler had no oys—

SHEPHERD.

Wheesh!.

TICKLER.

Physical philosophy, gentlemen, is the most rigorous investigation of truth that the human mind has ever pursued. More than history—more than the legal examination of evidence—more than moral and metaphysical philosophy—more than religion. In it the matter of enquiry is more under command, the spirit of enquiry more just and sincere. It would seem that the discipline of truth which the human mind has undergone in its last hundred, one hundred and fifty, two hundred years—since Lord Bacon—of physical study, is the greatest, truest, most effectually fruitful that it has ever proved. Do we not feel the effects in the study of moral science, of history, philosophy? Do we not now look upon them with the purged eyes of Baconian pupils, with habits of thought, lights of examination, canons of judgment, a criticism of truth learnt in the school of physical philosophy? Do we not require other evidence, judge with another sobriety, look for another solidity in knowledge than we did? There were bolder, greater, more capable thinkers, not a stricter rule of thought. The great intellectual feature of the last age has been its success in physical science; not merely among the leaders, but among the multitude, so that every one could contribute, and has done. Let us say this is not the end, but a step. Now it is time that the higher thinkers take another step. They do in Germany. The next step is that they cease to view man's physical as his greatest conquests, and recognise, as they used to do, a mightier field.

NORTH.

Yes. Let them become again moralists, not physicians.

SHEPHERD.

Ay—let them become again moralists, no physicians.—A savouryer Welsh rabbit I never preed.

TICKLER.

The character of the physical philosophy of the last century is, that it is without hypotheses (comparatively)—a kingdom of facts. Let moral philosophy be so. But first let us recognise the field, its extent, might, fruitfulness;—that it is not less than the physical—that it has been lost sight of—that it must be seen after again;—and this understood, things will resume their natural proportionate place. And now a change commences, which see. Physical philosophy having exerted its own rectifying, strengthening influence on the higher order of minds, will begin to leave them, to give way to more needed science, and to decline to an under rank of minds—and shall, according to a wonted and known law of society, pass gradually down to the lowest, producing in each rank as it descends, by its temporary activity, a salutary permanent influence—till it reaches the bottom, and at last gives way even from the lowest rank. But it will not, in truth, give way from and leave any rank; but from predominant will become subordinate, and take its due proportioned place in each.

NORTH.

I suppose, then, that we may bestir ourselves to advance the moral studies of the higher, and need not so much guide the intellectual of the lower.

TICKLER.

But meanwhile, Mr North, the moral studies of the lower classes ought to be wholly involved in religion—as the moral studies of the higher may be safely enough distinct from it, without forgetting it.

SHEPHERD.

Eh?

NORTH.

What is physical study? Consider the difference in the knowledge of the world since the Greek thought the sun a chariot, and the earth a flat circle or oblong, with Hyperboreans, Cyclops, Acephali, &c., a south uninhabited from heat, &c., as in Herodotus, with Cælian's natural history, &c., and its present state—geographical voyages, &c.

SHEPHERD.

Et cetera.

TICKLER.

That was a dream of the world—this is knowledge. That was the age of imagination—this of understanding or reason, or an approach to it. What is the good of physical knowledge? Many. One is, that it helps to make man feel strong in his powers: justly. Reading the universe rightly, he is exalted by understanding in it the wisdom that made it. It is one case of "magnanimous to correspond with heaven." Farther, he feels, by his power both to understand and to control nature, how much his destiny is given into his own hands. He is excited similarly to search government, education, happiness—to investigate the internal world, and endeavour to control and mould it. Only, he must not think himself higher, or more self dependent, than he is. But to know fully the true extent of his powers, is the way not to think falsely, or have an interest in doing so. His intellectual dominion is now so great, that it may satisfy his ambition; and he may be content to know where it stops, where he becomes finite and dependent. If he is ennobled by his just contemplation of the structure and design of the universe, shall not the whole race participate in his ennobling? Shall not the common man be raised by it—by knowing the results, without the process of deduction, without the science? Thus, I can well suppose that mechanics' lectures on Geography, Natural History, Astronomy, and some other branches, scientifically true in all their matter, but popular in their exposition—that is, made intelligible to a very moderately constructed understanding, and affecting to the imagination and feelings, might be very interesting and very useful indeed; therefore, let Dr Birchkeck, spite of his politics, which are bad, flourish, and all Institutions.

SHEPHERD.

That's leebereal and illeebereal in æe breath. Never heard I mortal man sæe voluble during a Welsh rabbit.

NORTH.

Listen to me, gentlemen.

SHEPHERD.

Listen to you, sir—what else hæe we been doin'—and I fear to little purpose—a' this lang interminable night?

NORTH.

The spirit which draws men individually towards knowledge, is not the same which invests it with reverence to the eyes of the world. The sages of rude times have been held in mysterious veneration; and their wisdom has been thought to proceed from beings of a higher nature, or even to command them. Imagination, ever-seeking Deity, apprehends its presence not only in the powers that move in the natural world, but in human power, when much surpassing all that appears within the range of familiar knowledge. Thus it makes prophets, enchanters, and the favoured that have intercourse with spirits.

SHEPHERD.

Michael Scott, in the olden day. But times are changed, sir; and even Christopher North himself, is by few reckoned a magician.

NORTH.

But this reverence for knowledge is imaginative and generous, and of the same birth with the love of knowledge, which is itself an inquisition after Deity. But in those times of ours, when Imagination is almost expelled from the processes and counsels of human life, what then makes worship around knowledge? Truly, she that worshippeth Power. She that liveth in the eyes of men, and is ruled under their influences as her stars.

SHEPHERD.

What's her name?

NORTH.

She sees that knowledge is great and strong in the world—that it commands power and fame; that it gets wealth; that it sways even in the great motions of the world; that it is set in honour, in places of old authority—therefore it is for her reverence—therefore she will set her children to learn it—therefore she will give it her favour and her help, and will to some degree bow herself before it.

TICKLER.

Yes, North, that principle will govern even opinion of knowledge, among every society, wherever great causes act to produce a general contention of spirit for it beyond the pure love of it for its own sake. Or, to make clear sense at once, what are the principles that excite labour after knowledge, besides the pure delight in it?

NORTH.

There are two great original powers, Tickler, that drive onwards the human spirit in quest of knowledge; the necessity of life, and the delight of the soul. From the rudest to the most civilized state of society, the acquisition of knowledge that arises to men, from their contention with nature, to make her yield them life, is very great—immense. Suppose in our own country, James, one mind to possess all the knowledge by which, in ten thousand thousand hands, bread is earned.

SHEPHERD.

What a Solomon he would be—a livin' Library o' Usefu' and Entertainin' Knowledge.

NORTH.

Setting aside, for a moment, the multiform application of simple principles by which the instruments of human art are produced—heavens! only think on the knowledge of Nature, James, which in every minute division is distributed throughout those various arts!

SHEPHERD.

The thocht's overwhelmin'.

NORTH.

Suppose that all the facts as to the nature and properties of the different substances which are employed as materials or agents in various arts in Birmingham and Sheffield, were known to one mind, as they are known to those who without higher knowledge practice them for their bread! Suppose an intelligent mind to possess the knowledge only which it might acquire in a course of workshops, from the conversation of those who worked in them—would it not, without study, without books—be most extensive—most—

SHEPHERD.

The knowledge o' many a' gathered thegither in ae master-mind—yet aiblins withouten sceence.

NORTH.

But if you will look at those forms of life in which each man, James, is required to possess the whole of that knowledge of nature, which is necessary for obtaining from her the greater part of the means of his subsistence—

SHEPHERD.

Am' nae I sic a man mysell, sir?

NORTH.

You are, my dear James. Think, Tickler, how any man, who is much acquainted with labouring people, where they are generally neither depressed by poverty nor degraded by vicious habits prevailing among them, must have been surprised at times to find the extent of knowledge, which native intelligence, exerting itself upon those objects and facts which the plain necessities of life only made important, had amassed—without books—husbandmen—shepherds—mechanics—artificers!

SHEPHERD.

Pour oot upon him, Tickler—deluge him, Timothy.

TICKLER.

If you would see the most extensive acquisition of knowledge enforced by the necessities of life, you must know what is the life of a savage, in those tribes where there is full power of mind—for in some the mind is extraordinarily degraded. For example, many of the tribes of the North American Indians, before they were visited with the curse of an intercourse with Europeans, possessed a high character of mind, both for heroic and intellectual qualities. Now, conceive one of these Indians cast amidst the boundlessness of nature—with a mind strong and ardent—not beginning life as we do—surrounded with a thousand helps to guard it from all sufferings and necessities, to spare it all use of its faculties—but cast upon the bosom of nature—to win from her the means of the preservation of his existence. From the moment he begins to understand and know—he sees what the course of his life is to be. He is to be a hunter and an inhabitant of the woods. Now, imagine all the multitude of natural facts, on the knowledge of which, for safety and sustenance, his mind is made to rest. He is a hunter—that is to say, that from the day he can use his hands at his will, he will begin his warfare against the animal race. What does that mean? That of every bird and animal of which his power can compass the destruction, he must begin to know the signs, the haunts, and the ways. He is already engaged as an observer in natural history. You may be sure he has very soon an exact a knowledge of the figure, colours, cries, &c., of many of them, and of the place and construction of the habitations of those which find, or make themselves habitations—of their young, or eggs—their number, their seasons, and precautions of breeding, &c., as any naturalist from Linnæus to Cuvier. Now, every thing he has to do to ensnare, entice, waylay them, is drawn entirely from observation of the various particulars of their modes of life. This knowledge, as he grows, he goes on extending to numbers of the birds and animals that people his dominion,— and when the savage has, by keen and extensive observation, (you have read Hearn, North?) acquired all the knowledge that affects his own well-being—of the appearance, the nature, the seasons, the modes of life of as many of these creatures as will come under the necessity or the wantonness of his art as a hunter, I ask, is it not plain that he must possess, very intimately and exactly, much of that knowledge which, when possessed by a naturalist, is raised to the rank of science?

SHEPHERD.

Ask Audubon.

TICKLER.

Combine with this the knowledge of the natural world that surrounds him, as implied by his dependence for sustenance on its vegetable productions—and all the various knowledge of the earth itself, and of the skies, which become important to him who is to make his way by recollection or conjecture through untracked wildernesses, forests, swamps, and precipices. How, in an unknown wilderness so made up, even after he has chosen his course, by the stars, shall he know to trace a path through the dangers and immensity of nature, which human feet may tread? By observing, studying all his life long the nature of mountains, torrents, marshes, vegetation. Then add to this—his observation of the air and the skies, from his dependence on their changes, and I think, my lads, if you have imagination to represent to yourselves one-twentieth part of the knowledge which a savage will thus be driven to possess by his mere physical necessities, you will be astonished to find how much liker a learned man he is than you be.

SHEPHERD.

Maist yeloquent!

TICKLER.

Will this seem fanciful? I will give you a single instance. There is scarcely one point in natural history more celebrated and interesting than the beaver's building his house. Do you wish to be correctly informed upon this subject? Read all our naturalists from Buffon downwards, and you will be incorrectly instructed on the mind of these mysterious animals. Then go and read the account given by a man who had nothing to do with beavers, except that he was an agent in the fur trade, and who tells you what the Indian hunters told and shewed him, and you will find much the most interesting, and the only exact account we possess of these builders.

SHEPHERD.

Wha?

NORTH.

It is in Hearn's Travels in the northern parts of America. Here then I establish that a great part of that knowledge of external living nature which we hoard up among our treasures of science, is, through necessity, possessed, and I will say—much more accurately—by men in those rude forms of life, in which they are perpetually contending with nature for the supply of all their wants.

[Shoulders the Crutch]

TICKLER.

Since you insist upon it, why then I will sing a new song—in the character of a Radical!

THE JACOBIN BILL.

TUNE—Nottingham Ale.

I.

Now the reign of the tyrant for ever is past,
 And the day-star of freedom is beaming on high—
 When truth is now heard in the Senate at last,
 And the shout of the million in grateful reply—
 Let us sing and rejoice,
 With heart and with voice,
 And each man his bumper triumphantly fill—
 For in this Age of Reason,
 We know of no treason,
 But refusing to drink to the Jacobin Bill!

II.

For many a hopeless and heart-breaking day,
 The conflict unequal we strove to maintain—
 But still, as the slaves of "legitimate" sway,
 We demanded redress—but demanded in vain—

Debased and degraded—
 Our birthrights invaded—
 We fruitlessly sought the great truth to instil,
 That our ruthless oppressor,
 The present possessor,
 Must taste all the sweets of a Jacobin Bill !

III.

But the debt of the people, so long in arrear,
 By the Jacobin Bill will be speedily paid,—
 And the step of the peasant will press on the peer,
 And prove of what metal his "order" is made—
 With Hunt at the steerage,
 We'll pitch the whole Peerage,
 Like the Prophet of old, the vex'd waters to still,—
 And many a martyr
 Of star and of garter,
 Must now read his fate in the Jacobin Bill !

IV.

And as for those righteous rulers in lawn,
 Who pillage the poor with palaver of peace—
 Those Shepherds, whose reverend minds are withdrawn
 From the care of the flock, by the thoughts of the fleece,—
 How odd the grimaces
 Of many smug laces,
 On finding they're nothing but tenants at will,
 When first we shall dish up
 Some rosy Archbishop,
 Who voted, perhaps, for the Jacobin Bill !

V.

The lawyer no longer need bother his brain
 With the quibbles and quirks of his straw-splitting trade,
 For the Law of our Bill is abundantly plain,
 And needs not a hired misinterpreter's aid :
 And as for the Judge,
 There's nobody grudge-
 To give them a touch of their friend the tread-mill,—
 If 'twere but to shew them
 We feel what we owe them,
 For days when none dream't of a Jacobin Bill !

VI.

Thus peer, priest, and lawyer, each civilly sent
 His bread in an honest calling to win,
 And heaving no more of tithes, taxes, or rent,
 The work of reform may be said to begin !
 The great revolution
 Of just distribution,
 Its blessings unmeasured will thenceforth distil,
 And cutting and carving,
 For thousands now starving,
 At once will be found in the Jacobin Bill !

VII.

The mechanic who toils for his shilling a-day,
 May then get as drunk as the prince or the peer,—
 And citizen Russell, and citizen Grey,
 Will see the true use of their thousands a-year ;
 In Whig and in Tory-house,
 Happy and glorious,

Day after day the parch'd people may swill—
 And how pleasant to revel
 On "the fat Bedford level,"
 For love of our friend of the Jacobin Bill!

VIII.

Oh! England, the land of the tyrant and slave!
 How happily changed will thy destinies be,
 When the harlequin-banner shall gallantly wave
 O'er the patriot deeds of the brave and the free!
 With streets barricaded,
 And pikemen paraded,
 What generous ardour each bosom will thrill,
 When in civil defiance
 Of martial science,
 We stand in defence of the Jacobin Bill!

IX.

And when ev'ry man's hand is at ev'ry man's throat—
 Oh! then what a pleasant Parisian scene!
 With our own a' ira, and our own sans culottes,
 And perhaps, Heaven bless us! our own gullotins.
 We've been too slow in learning—
 Too dull in discerning,
 These radical cures for each deep-seated ill—
 But truly our neighbour
 Has not lost her labour,
 When at length she has taught us our Jacobin Bill!

NORTH.

Thank ye, Tickler. You write and sing a song as well, if not better, than any man in Scotland.

SHEPHERD.

It cuts to the quick.

NORTH.

There is one public man in England, Tickler, over whose apostacy from one sacred cause—more in sorrow than in anger—I and thousands—yea millions—groaned. Yet from his eloquent lips lately fell words of warning wisdom; nor shall my praise of his patriotism be mingled at this moment with any unavailing lamentation or reproach—Sir Robert Peel. The conclusion of his admirable speech on Lord John Russell's motion for Reform in Parliament, has committed itself to my memory—

TICKLER.

Hear! hear! hear!

NORTH.

"We are arrived at 1831, and reform is again proposed, whilst the events of the last year in Paris and Brussels are bewildering the judgment of many, and provoking a restless, unquiet disposition, unfit for the calm consideration of such a question. I, too, refer to the condition of France, and I hold up the late revolution in France, not as an example, but as a warning to this country. Granted that the resistance to authority was just; but look at the effects,—on the national prosperity, on industry, on individual happiness,—even of just resistance. Let us never be tempted to resign the well-tempered freedom which we enjoy, in the ridiculous pursuit of the wild liberty which France has established. What avails that liberty which has neither justice nor wisdom for its companions—which neither brings peace nor prosperity in its train? It was the duty of the King's Government to abstain from agitating this question at such a period as the present—to abstain from the excitement throughout this land of that conflict—(God grant it may be only a moral conflict!)—which must arise between the possessors of existing privileges, and those to whom they are to be transferred. It was the duty of the Government to calm, not to stimulate, the fever of popular excitement. They have adopted a different course—they have sent through the land the firebrand of agitation, and no one can now recall it. Let us hope that there are limits to their powers of mischief. They have, like the giant enemy of the Philistines, lighted three hundred brands, and scattered through the country discord and dismay; but God forbid that they should, like him, have the power to concentrate in death all the energies that belong to life, and to signalize their own destruction by bowing to the earth the pillars of that sacred edifice, which contains within its walls, according even to their own admission 'the noblest society of freemen in the world.'

TICKLER.

Much indeed might be forgiven in the past conduct of a statesman, who has courage so to speak at such a crisis.

NORTH.

May Reform come from such a statesman as spoke in that pregnant passage, and the country will at once be satisfied and strengthened.

TICKLER.

Amen.

SHEPHERD.

Ax your pardon, sir, for puttin' rather an abrupt question; but does neither o' you twa smell ony thing out o' the common?

TICKLER.

I have no nose.

SHEPHERD.

Nae nose? In that case, neither has an elephant.

TICKLER.

I mean no sense of smell.

SHEPHERD.

Then I pity you, sir, in spring, up i' the mornin' early, in the Forest, when the sun is sae tenderly wooin' the dawn, and a shower o' bees is perpetually drappin' doon frae the bawmy bosom o' the south-west wind, on the bawmy bosom o' the Earth, that is indeed flowin', as the Scriptur' says, wi' milk and honey, and a' hotchin' wi' dew-reekin' sun-seeikin' flowers, as if through a' her open pores weré breathin' the irrepressible delight o' our great mother's heart.

NORTH.

How spiritual the scent of violets!

SHEPHERD (snuffing and smoking.)

Can it be Guse?

NORTH.

Poo, poo, James. 'Tis but "the strong imagination of a feast."

SHEPHERD.

A feast? Fuilzie!

TICKLER.

"So scented the Grim Feature, and upturned
His nostril wide into the murky air,
Sagacious of his quarry from afar."

SHEPHERD.

That quotation's no pat, sir; I'm no smelling a dead horse in a far awa' quarry, but the memory o' a roasted Guse in this verra room. THE GLASGOW GANDER'S NO YET EXTINK.

NORTH.

James, you are too metaphysical. The memory of a smell is a most abstract idea.

TICKLER.

I remember it in the Concrete.

SHEPHERD.

It aften haunts me, sirs, at meals, till I lay doon the spoon wi' a scunner, and bock at therummlete-thumps. The family canna sympathese wi' me—for it's the same wi' the scent as wi' the sight—twa folk never yet, at ae time, either smelt or saw a ghost—and its even sae wi' the stink o' the Gander.

NORTH.

Peace to his manes!

TICKLER.

Methinks I see him moulting. "In my mind's eye, Horatio."

SHEPHERD.

Mooltin'! Pair fallow! in the pens! The Gander's in a piteous condition then, sirs; a' ragged and raw, dowp red-bare, as if nettle-stung, and the sprootin' quillies blushin' wi' bluid. Oh! but at that season he's sensitive—sensitive; and he drags along his meeserable existence in ae dolefu' hiss—a fent and feeble hiss—less like an ordinar Gander's than a bat's—

TICKLER.

I know it—a mixture of a bat's, a cat's, and an adder's, which, in the darkness and silence of nature, would be not unalarming, did not your knowledge of ornithology come instantly to your aid, and scientifically refer it to the enormous moulter.

NORTH.

As Goldsmith pathetically says,

"To stop too fearful, and too faint to go!"

SHEPHERD.

If you but pint your finger at him, then, "he gangs distracted mad"——

TICKLER.

And gives vent at all points to such a gabble, that you look up to the lift, James, expecting a cloud of wild-geese from Norway——

SHEPHERD.

But the sky is calm——

NORTH.

And so would be the common, but for this picturesque Impersonation of pain, impertinence, and poltroonery——

TICKLER.

Who "plays such fantastic tricks beneath high heaven

As make the angels weep."

SHEPHERD.

What an eemage! An angel weepin' at a guse! That's no orthodox. It wou'd be ayont the power o' the angel Gabriel himsell, or Michael, or Raphael eithe', ony man than us Three, to gaze doon on the Gander without fa'in intil guffaws.

NORTH.

In Lincolnshire—in the Fens—these unfortunate animals are plucked peremittally in covies——

SHEPHERD.

What? A the year through?

NORTH.

Ay, James, all the year through—from June to January—and from January to June

SHEPHERD.

Without bein' arood ae single holiday, sir! I cou'dna carry on sic a system o' persecution as that again' ony Guse or Gander that ever gabbled—for it borders on inhumanity; and sometimes, methinks, about the close o' the month, as I was hauldin' the noiseless tenor o' my way towards his covey, to gie him his accustom'd plookin', my heart wou'd relent, seein' the pimples and pu-tules pabblin' a' ower him, just as parritch pabbles in the pat—the countless holes, sir, out o' which the quills had been ragged,—and then, in place o' administerin' the usual discipline to his dowp, or what, wi' his tale, he thinks wings, ten to aye I wou'd gie him a handfu' o' corn, mixed wi' could potawtoes, say something kind and consolin' to the sans culottes citizen o' the covey, and aiblins openin' the door, let him oot to tak a waddle on thae absurd splay-feet o' his, beneath whose soles you canna, however, help pityin' the poor grass, and heavin' a sigh for the inevitable bruisin' o' much beetle.

NORTH.

I am not—either by nature or education—superstitious; yet I cannot help attaching some credit to the strange rumour——

SHEPHERD.

What strange rumour? Let me hear't, sir; for there's naething I like sae weel's a strange rumour.

NORTH.

Why, that the great Glasgow Gander has been seen since the last Noctes.

SHEPHERD.

Whaur?

NORTH.

At divers times and in sundry places.

SHEPHERD.

But no in the flesh, sir—no in the flesh.

TICKLER.

THE GHOST OF THE GANDER!!!

NORTH.

"Doom'd for a certain time to walk the night,
And, for the day, confined to fast in fires,
Till the foul crimes, done in his days of nature,
Are burnt and purged away."

TICKLER.

"But that it is forbid
To tell the secrets of his prison-house,
He could a tale unfold,"

NORTH.

That "eternal blazon," Tickler, must be reserved for another Noctes. A description of his Purgatory by the Ghost of the Glasgow Gander will eclipse Dante's.

SHEPHERD.

Wha saw't?

NORTH.

People in general.

*SHEPHERD.

Aye, that's the way wi' a' supernatural apparitions. I defy you to trace ony ane among the best accredited o' them a' up to its first gloom or glimmer afore individual een—but it's neither the less true nor the less fearsome on that account—and that you'll alloo even to your ain lowpin heart, the first time you foregather wi' a ghaist—in a wood, or on a muir, or glowerin' out upon you frae the embrasure o' an auld castle, or risin' up as silent as the mist, in the verra heart o' the thuunner o' some lonesome waterfa'.

NORTH.

Some, 'tis said, have seen it, as if escaped from the spit—trussed, yet endowed with locomotive power——

TICKLER.

Hissing like a steam-engine.

NORTH.

Others, gashed with a thousand wounds, and dripping with gore and gravy——

TICKLER.

"In sommos ecce! ante oculos mæstissimus ANSER,
Visus adesse mihi, largosque effundere fletus!
Raptatus Tapitouro ut quondam, aterque cruento
Pulvere, perque pedes trajectus loro tumentes."

NORTH.

"Hei mihi! qualis erat! Quantum mutatus ab illo ANSER!"

TICKLER.

"O Lux Dardaniæ! Spes O Fidissima Teuerûm!
Quæ tantæ tenuere moriæ? Quibus ANSER ab oris Expectate venis?"

NORTH.

" Ut te, post multa tuorum

Funera——

Defessi adspicinus !"

TICKLER.

" Quæ causa indigna serenos

Fœdavit voltus ? aut cur hæc volnera cerno ?"

NORTH.

" Ille nihil ; nec me querentem vana, moratur,
Sed, graviter gemitus imo de pectore ducens"——

TICKLER.

" Heu ! fuge, NATE DEA !"

SHEPHERD.

What ! Does the Ghost of the Gander gabble Greek ?

TICKLER.

The story runs, James, that

" Even in his ashes lives his wonted fire,"

and that he has been seen by the watchman, as he " walks his lonely round," impotently pursuing, up and down the Guse-dubs, some dingy Dulcinea desired of yore, who, with loud shrieks, shuns his embraces, and finally, in desperation, plunges for shelter in among a drove of ducks, merry in the moonlight on the Peat-Bog, into whose sullen depths is afraid to plunge the hot and hissing Tarquin, who bitterly knows that fat cannot float without feathers——

NORTH.

He sticks to Terra Firma——" larding the lean earth as he moves along."

SHEPHERD.

What seems he noo in the een o' the Bubbley ?

NORTH.

The Bubbley sees through him——and wages warfare on the Gander's Ghost. But you may imagine the Bubbley's astonishment on finding the Gander evaporate beneath his tread as he leaps upon him, after having chased him three times round Nelson's Pillar.

TICKLER.

Methinks I see the Ghost of the Gander,

" At the close of the day, when the city is still,
And mortals the sweets of forgetfulness prove," waddling along that noble square, on the summit of Blythswood-hill, and moralizing to himself on the destinies of his species——

SHEPHERD.

Wishin', a' in vain, that they wad but tak' a lesson frae his fate ! A' in vain, sirs ; for even let a spectre come frae the sewer to forewarn them o' their doom, yet wunna they keep their tongue within their bills, but wull keep gapin', and hissin', and gablin' on till the end o' the chapter, which, aiblins, consists o' sic a catastrophe at Ambrose's, sir, as will be remembered to the latest posterity, and, translated intil a thousand languages, be perused by all people that on earth do dwell, lang after the Anglo-Scotch, and the Scoto-English, have been baith dead tongues. Example's lost on a' Fules——feathered and unfeathered——and that's aye been an argument wi' me——accept in cases o' verra rare culprits——again' capital punishments.

NORTH.

'Tis said the Gawpus of the Ghost——

SHEPHERD.

You mean the Ghost o' the Gawpus——

NORTH.

——has been seen in Edinburgh. The Black Cook of this establishment, James, is afraid to sleep by herself——

SHEPHERD.

Canna she get Tappitoury, or the Pech——

TICKLER.

Hush—hush—James.

NORTH.

You know all feathers are among her perquisites—and she told King Pepin, that, t'other night, on lifting up the lid of the chest where that golden fleece reposed, among the plumage of inferior fowls, lo! the Ghost of the Gander, spurred on by instinctive passion, abhorrent of his nudity, insanely struggling to replume himself—

SHEPHERD.

Haw—haw—haw!—and hopping about in the chest, amaisht as roomy as a Minister's Gannel, like a chiel risin' half-drunk in the mornin', and wha havin' gotten ane o' his legs intil the breeks, fin's it a'thegether ayont his capacity to get in the ither, but keeps stoiterin' and stacherin', and tumblin', outowre the floor frae wa' to wa', for a lang while, doure on an impossible achievement, and feenally fa'in' backarts on a sack, wi' nae mair howp o' maisterin' his velveteens in this world, than in the next o' insurin' his salvation.

TICKLER.

O thou Visionary!

NORTH.

Poor soul! in her situation, such an adventure—

SHEPHERD.

Her situation? You're no serious, sir?

NORTH.

Too true, James. In her fright she let fall the lid—nor has she since had courage, his majesty informs me, to uplift it.

TICKLER.

The Ghost of the Gander will be smothered. He had better have kept in the sewer.

NORTH.

In future ages, James, generations of men, seeing the Ghost of the Glasgow Gander, will vainly believe that in the nineteenth century all Ganders were of his size—

SHEPHERD.

Aye—that there were giants in our days.

TICKLER.

He will cause great disturbance in Ornithology.

SHEPHERD.

Among the tribe Anseres. Compared wi' him, the geese o' the three thousandth 'll dwindle doon to dyucks.

NORTH.

In some future Demonology, the philosopher will endeavour to reduce him to ordinary dimensions, nay, even to prove him—all in vain—to be a mere phantom of the imagination.

SHEPHERD.

Yet, sirs, mithers and nourices wull hush the babbies on their breasts wi' the cry o' "the Ganner!" "the Ganner!" "gin you wunna lie quate, ye vile yaummerin' imp, I'll gie ye to the Ghost o' the great Glasgow Ganner!" Na—tunes 'll be made to remage forth his gabble, by the Webbers o' unborn time—and Theatres be thick wi' folk, as trees wi' craws, to hear, on the hundredth nicht o' its performance, a maist unearthly piece o' music frae a multitudinous orchestra, ca'd the "Ganner's Chorus!"

TICKLER.

I am sorry he was slaughtered. He would have been an incomparable chimney-sweep.

SHEPHERD.

To have admitted him, whatna flue!

TICKLER.

Come, North, cut the subject short with a song. Give us the Ghost of the Gander—a Tale of Terror—after the fashion of Mat Lewis. Poor Mat! he was a man of genius—now how forgotten!

NORTH.

I'm a little hoarse—

SHEPHERD.

A little horse?

TICKLER.

That's always the affectation of you great singers.

NORTH.

Pray, Tickler, which, to your ear, is the more musical of the two, the gabble of a Gander, or the braying of a Jackass?

SHEPHERD.

Donna answer him, Mr Tickler, for he's only wushin' to get aff the sang.

TICKLER.

'Twould be bad, boorish manners, James, not to give an answer to a civil question. I prefer the Gander by sunrise from the sea—the jackass, when that luminary is setting behind the mountains.

SHEPHERD.

What luminary?

TICKLER.

Neither the Gander nor the Jackass, James, but the Sun. Elated by the glowing charms of the rosy morn, my soul delights in the gabble of geese on a common—but as I wander pensive at to-fall of the day, then, for love or money, your jackass, with ears, legs, lungs, and jaws, all “stepping westwards,” and enacting, in a solo, for his own enjoyment, the Vicar of Bray, worthy to be a Bishop.

SHEPHERD.

What say ye to a Mool?

NORTH.

The young American, in his most amusing volumes, “A Year in Spain,” has exhausted the subject.

SHEPHERD.

What's your wull, sir?

NORTH.

“I hate a mule,” quoth he, “most thoroughly, for there is something abortive in everything it does, even to its very bray. An ass, on the contrary, has something hearty and whole-souled about it. Jack begins his bray with a modest whistle, rising gradually to the top of his powers, like the progressive eloquence of a well-adjusted oration, and then, as gradually declining to a natural conclusion; but the mule commences with a voice like thunder, and then, as if sorry for what he has done, he stops like a bully when throttled in the midst of a threat, or a clown who has begun a fine speech, and has not courage to finish it.”

SHEPHERD.

Haw! haw! haw! That's capital, man.

NORTH.

As Alexander of Macedon said of old, that had he not been Alexander, he would have wished to be Diogenes, so, we may presume, had the hero of Glasgow not been a Gander, he would have chosen to be a——

TICKLER.

Mule or Jackass?

SHEPHERD.

Aye—that is the question. Each——

NORTH.

Alternately——

SHEPHERD.

Day about.

NORTH.

On Tuesday, beginning his bray with a modest whistle, and throughout his performance just such an original as the lively American has drawn the animated picture of—on Friday, like a bully throttled in the midst of a threat——

TICKLER.

And cudgelled along the Trongate——

Till his back was like the Edinburgh Review.

NORTH.

The Blue and Yellow.

TICKLER.

Or Blackwood's Magazine.

NORTH.

A lively green.

TICKLER.

Needing nae certificat'.

SHEPHERD.

But no more nonsense. Now for your song.

TICKLER.

NORTH.

(Clearing his pipes with a caulker.)

THE GHOST OF THE GANDER.

Oh! what is that figure, and what can it mean,
That comes forth in the stillness of night—
That near the Guse-Dubs like a phantom is seen—
That haunts the Salt-Market, the Gorbals, the Green,
And avoids the approach of the light?

'Tis the Ghost of the Gander—the unavenged Ghost—
The spirit disturb'd and distress'd
Of him who erewhile of his tribe was the boast,
Whom 'twas shocking to slay, and inhuman to roast,
The unfortunate Goose of the West!

We all must remember—we never can cease
To think of his proudest display,
When first in the grand competition of Geese,
He appear'd like an over-fed Hero of Grease,
And triumphantly carried the day.

And oh! had he made but a different use
Of his triumph of shape and of size,
He still might have lived—a respectable Goose—
And the nettles might still have been proud to produce
The Gander that carried the prize!

But, flush'd with his conquest, elated with fame,
And swoln with preposterous pride,
With gabble unheard-of in wild-goose or tame,
The Gander in person and conduct became
The Pest of the Queen of the Clyde.

We do not insist on his manner and mien—
For these we might find an excuse—
But his gabble was gross, and his conduct obscene,
And he openly dwelt among creatures unclean—
A shameless and scandalous Goose!

And, hating the blessings he never could share,
How loudly his anger arose
'Gainst the great, and the good, and the brave, and the fair,
Whom, in the true spirit of spiteful despair,
He accounted his natural foes!

But the life of the Gander we need not relate,
 Nor describe how he flourish'd and fell—
 We all know his folly—and as for his fate,
 Remembrance must long be oppress'd with the weight
 Of that "strange insupportable smell!"

And now that his carcass at length is at rest,
 And rankles in rotten repose—
 When the regent of day has gone down in the West,
 His spirit thus wanders, unpitied, unblest,
 And noxious still to the nose!

The Ghost of a Goose is a curious sight—
 A strange enough phantom at best:
 But far may you travel, before you shall light
 On such a preposterous spirit of night
 As the Ghost of the Goose of the West!

His figure, his gesture, his aspect, his air,
 His waddle—they still are the same—
 But his ill-fated carcass is naked and bare,
 Displaying the marks of a recent affair,
 That his friends are unwilling to name.

And a spirit like this, in a garb of Goose-skin,
 Where plumage refuses to grow,
 Is doubly absurd, when there hangs at his chin,
 The shadowy shape of a Trophy of Tin,
 The Medal he gain'd at the show.

Thus nightly he waddles around and around
 Each loved and familiar scene—
 The Goose-Dubs, of course, are his favourite ground—
 But sometimes the spectre may even be found
 Near the door of the very Tontine!

And there, when the usual party are met,
 "Just thinking" of oysters and ale,
 The plan of the evening is quite upset,—
 For the Ghost of a Goose is a very bad whet,—
 And the Knights of the Shell turn tail!

By the church of Saint Mungo he often has sat,
 On a tombstone, awaiting the day,
 When the rest of the ghosts, and the owl, and the bat,
 Alarid at a phantom so fetid and fat,
 Have fled with a shriek of dismay!

And oh! but to hear him when making his moan
 In that region remote and recluse—
 It is not a gabble—it is not a groan—
 Description despairs in describing the tone
 Of the ill-fated Ghost of the Goose!

And although 'twas a rule among spirits of old
 To speak not, except in reply,—
 With the Ghost of the Gander this rule doesn't hold,
 For he always is ready his "tale to unfold,"
 With a sad and a sulphurous sigh!

With accent unearthly, and piteous look,
 He curses the day he was dress'd—
 He calls for revenge on the scullion, the cook—
 But chief upon him who the task undertook
 Of dissecting the Goose of the West!

But long may he wander alarming the night,
 And vengeance invoking in vain—
 For no one in Glasgow e'er pitied his plight,
 And many there are who would even delight
 If he could be dissected again!

There are Masses for many a spirit's repose,
 And spells that can lay them at rest;
 But who would e'er dream of assuaging the woes
 Of one so offensive to eyes, ears, and nose,
 As the Ghost of the Goose of the West!

TICKLER.

Bravissimo! Bravissimo!

SHEPHERD.

Anchor! Anchor!

NORTH.

I have done so, James. I have brought my verse to an anchor.

TICKLER.

Encore! Encore—encore—Kit—encore—

SHEPHERD.

That's what I mean, sir. Hangcur! Hangcur! Hangcur!

NORTH.

No—gentlemen. Pardon me. But feeling myself in voice, I have no objection to compound with a parody on Tom Bowling. After that, let us set in to serious thinking. You must suppose the Gauder buried in a dung-hill.

TICKLER.

No violent supposition, certainly, Sir.

NORTH (sings.)

AIR—Tom Bowling.

1

Here a foul hulk lies Glasgow's Gauder,
 The vilest of his race,—
 Alike unfit for spit or brauder,
This is his proper place!
 His aspect was the most ungainly,
 And those who knew him well,
 Say that you might discover plainly
 His presence by the smell!

2.

This bird of mud was still reviling
 Each of the Birds of Air,
 His columns still of filth compelling,—
 The splutter of despair!
 And toiling thus in his vocation,
 His Chronicle will tell
 How you might prove to demonstration
 His labours from the Smell!

3.

And when by this rash hand dissected
 On that unhappy Night,
 He proved, as might have been expected,
 Indeed "a Sorry Sight!"
 The fainting-fits—the fumigation—
 On these my Song would dwell,
 But it concludes in Suffocation
 From memory of that Smell!

TICKLER.

Faugh! faugh! faugh!

SHEPHERD.

Feuch! feuch! feuch!

NORTH.

Steuch! steuch! steuch!

SHEPHERD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

---

Will Contributors and Correspondents have the goodness to take the hint we have ere now more than once graciously given them, and henceforth please to direct their communications, whether private epistle, or public article, either to "Christopher North," the "Editor of Blackwood's Magazine," or "Mr Blackwood?" We have now made such arrangements as will ensure instant cremation to all communications for Maga, directed to other less distinguished persons. They will be intercepted by the grato even on their way to the Balaam-Box.

There are lying in the security of the Sanctum, several Poems of much merit, unfit for Maga, either from being too long, or unfinished, which we wish to have an opportunity of returning to their ingenious and anonymous authors.

We have read M's advertisement in the Courant of 7th April, anent an article in Maga of the First of February, entitled, "Mr Sadler and the Edinburgh Review." If it be unlucky to arrive the day after the Fair, how miserable at the close of nine weeks. M accounts "for the delay which has caused him to stay," by the asinine assertion that he does not read Maga. The circumstance which he calls a calumny, we have heard mentioned by several friends of the person to whom it relates, and they conceived it, as did we, to be creditable to his character. We must have it contradicted on better authority than M's before we disbelieve or correct our statement. As Tories, we value a man less on the score of his family and possessions in soil or stock, farms or funds, than on that of his talents and virtues—and therefore cannot sympathize with the thin-skinned soreness of M, a Whig, on the points of birth and heritage. His anxiety about the house of Achin-goul is ludicrous—nor could he have more pompously elaborated his memorial thereon had it been the House of Bourbon—and his hero a King, instead of a Cock-Laird. But he should not consider opprobrious that kind of manual labour which dignified the prime of Robert Burns—and of Cincinnati, who was three times that which M will not be suffered to be once—Dictator. M has informed the Pensive Public that his signature is lying at full length in the Courant Office—for the inspection, we presume, of the curious in autographs. We do not understand that there has been a great rush to see that of the distinguished author of the advertisement; but we have heard that it is, as might have been expected from the rignarole, a sad scrawl. M is not so well acquainted with the literary history of Gallo-way as he imagines; and though we prefer peace, yet, should we observe any farther impertinence on his part, we shall expiscate it, in conversation with a gentleman from that district, whom we expect to have the pleasure of seeing at an early Noctes.

The article on Audubon's Ornithological Biography we have been obliged to defer till next Number—when ample justice will be done to the zeal, genius, and eloquence of that extraordinary man.

Colonel Tod's admirable work on Rajasthan will be reviewed, ere long, in a series of articles, which is the only way of doing any thing like justice to his wide and various learning in the history of India.

The interesting life of Romney the painter, by his son, is in good hands; and the article will grace an early Number.

What is our delightful Ignoramus about?

We purpose alternating our six articles on Sotheby's Homer with articles of a similar strain on the Greek Tragedians, Pindar and "the rest." We mean this as a hint to scholars to pay their addresses to Maga.

REFORMERS AND ANTI-REFORMERS—A WORD TO THE WISE FROM OLD CHRISTOPHER.

WE do not belong to the desponding, much less to the despairing School of Politics; and therefore are cheerful though grave on the Dissolution of Parliament. It is dead as mutton in the shambles; we are alive as red-deer on Shehallion. It has had its day; and we still have ours, above the power of Lords and Commons, nor obedient to the breath of Kings. Its life was spent "now in glimmer, and now in gloom;" sometimes in darkness that might be felt; and, though occasionally visited with sunshine, assuredly never was it "dark with excessive bright." It was, with all due respect be it spoken, not perhaps an unprincipled, but certainly a prating and a palavering Parliament. The whole body was at last painfully inflated; and we have seldom or never seen or heard such symptoms of a wind-cholic as those with which it distressed our sympathies immediately previous to its late Dissolution.

We forget how many Ministries were served under by the defunct. But they were not a few; and none of them all found her a very refractory Parliament. The old lady was anxious to prove pleasant to all her Lords and Lovers, in succession; and though she never so far forgot her sex as to confer her favours—especially the last ones—on those who had taken her conscience into their keeping, without the due and decent quantity of "foud reluctant amorous delay,"—yet she was sure finally to yield, and, in spite of considerable vociferation wasted by her in periodical appeals to heaven and earth, to sink languishingly into the arms of her successive and successful seducers. At last the old Parliament plucked up sufficient courage and coldness effectually to resist the Betrayer, who had the effrontery, in the face of Day and Martin, to insult her traitly with a hypocritical proposal of Reform. But the effort was too much for her; a patriot King took compassion on her refractory weakness; and at his beck she not unwillingly gave up the ghost. And now that the funeral howl is hushed, we beg leave to borrow an expression from the last article in the last number of that most pious of all the Periodicals, the Edinburgh Review, that now we can see no Parliament at all, unless like "Lord Liverpool, it should vouchsafe to come to us from those blessed regions where no House of Commons ever sits, where Committees of Enquiry cease to trouble, and the Press is at rest."

In short, the Public, at all times pensive, need not, we opine, be plunged into the depths of a green and yellow melancholy on this Dissolution. We see no "deep damnation in her taking off;" and who knows, though she had not the reputation of being a bird of that spicy nest, that a phoenix may not arise from her ashes?

People are too prone to "prophetic strains so full of woe," on each chance and change in the political world. Many a thousand times within our memory has this kingdom stood on the brink of destruction.

Indeed, in the opinion of many who pretend to be much wiser than we are, the kingdom has been standing there, without intermission, since the hour they had been able, by means of the acquired perceptions of eight, to distinguish a hawk from a handsaw. Yes—indeed—there has the unfortunate kingdom been shivering on the edge of an abyss, over which though a pigmy might have pushed her with the tip of his little finger, impotent to effect that wicked purpose have been all Heaven's and all Earth's most thunderous storms. The reason is, that the kingdom does not stand on the brink of that abyss, even like a deep-foundation'd pillar, though that be strong; but like a deeper-rooted oak that clasps the cliff with its everlasting ligatures, and serenely hangs its ancient umbrage over the chasm that boils magnificently below with all its cataracts.

In political discussion we love occasionally to be, if not poetical, at least picturesque. Fancy is one of Feeling's best allies; and Reason is never so strong as when backed by Imagination. Therefore, we are partial to that image, though it be as old as the island—the Ship of the State. It is an image that presents itself in many lights and shadows. See the Ship of the State, how she strains, and how her seams appear to open as she pitches! Land-lubbers, looking at her from the shore, swear that she is about to go down. But an old Tar like Christopher gives her three cheers as she sweeps along with all her streamers. Ay, while her hull is hidden in the hollow, he sees the "meteor flag of England" aloft in heaven—and to his excited spirit these ups and downs are full of power and glory. See the Ship of the State in a storm—close-reefed and close-hauled—yet with more than an inch of canvass—for she has not taken in every rag—not she indeed—of her weatherbeaten and weatherbeating Russia duck,—but wings her way still exultingly against the wildest wind. The shore shrieks, "She will founder." But lo! the Ocean Queen has caten for herself a foamy path out of the wind's eye close past the surges roaring along that range of cliffs, and having a free offing now, lo! how she whitens as she stands out to sea, herself her own sunshine in the storm she loves! See the Ship of the State scudding under bare poles, and her poop pursued by mountains. Let but one overtake her, and down she goes to Davy's locker. But her Wheel is "instinct with spirit;" and sullenly she swings and sways along the snow-crested pitchiness of her rolling path, not perhaps quite so smoothly or steadily as the Rocket on the rail-road between Liverpool and Manchester, but as safely—and most majestically, as becomes her who holds in fee the roarings of the Atlantic. See the Ship of the State on a lee-shore close in among the breakers. She must go to sticks now, "like ocean weeds heaped on the surf-beaten shore." No, she must not; for who ever saw her, even when taken aback in the trough of the sea miss stays? Her jib fills—and now her foresail—there she has it—and away she moves on another tack, along with the seamew, as fair and as fearless, while the very air is black as the sea, and the sea, but for catheads, as black as Erebus. See the Ship of the State with all her masts gone by the board! Now she must settle down in death. No. She is brought up by her sheet anchor—and shall ride out the storm all night—while stretch and spring her cable—still Neptune lays his head in a hull on Thetis' bosom, and at morning the bay shall be bright with boats—many of them bum ones—gliding all round her steadfast shadow. Or see her—since the worst will come to the worst—driven ashore! The crews of the whole fleet have got her off again;—she floats—she floats—for what signifies the bruise in her bottom, and a few hundred tons bilge-water? Taken into dock, and laid down for repairs, like a hillside in the sun, soon shall her forefoot again be in the foam—

"Her march upon the mountain wave,
Her home upon the deep."

Having thus quoted Campbell, let us conclude with Wordsworth, and finish the poetical or picturesque part of this our political article, by bidding, for a while, farewell to the Ship of the State in these beautiful lines—

"Like a ship on some calm day
In sunshine sailing far away,
Some beautiful ship that bath the plain
Of ocean for her whole domain."

Or let us conclude in the words of a Poet whom we frequently remember, though the world has forgotten him,

"No fears hath she; her giant-form
O'er wrathful surge, through blackening storm,
Majestically calm will go,
'Mid the deep darkness white as snow."

To leave, then, our heroics, allow us to say that we have been watching the progress of the Reform bill with much equanimity; and are confident that the upshot will be salutary to the state. The bill is indeed a bad one—a more mishapen bill no man might dream of after pork-chops, in the shape of nightmare. It is just such another nightmare as Fuseli saw, when he painted that "Moon-eyed herald of dismay" sitting upon the breast of a matron—like Maga—flung wildly across her bed, and moaning under the weight of the monster. But the Pensive Public will soon awake from her distempered sleep—heave the abortion off her chest—and thenceforth resolve to desist from heavy suppers, and to devote herself to dinners heavier still—and to those "material breakfasts" which have shed a glory over the name of Scotland.

The world knows well—there is nothing it knows better—that we have all along, for these fifteen years, been consistent without being violent in our political creed. So consistent indeed have we been, that, in an age distinguished for its apostasy, we have by many been called bigots. "We own the soft impeachment." But the charitable, at a distance from our sphere of personal action, will forgive us much when they hear our confession. We have more than once done all we could to become apostates. But it would not do. Aware of our singular appearance among "the universal British nation," who seemed at one time to rise up as one turncoat, we would fain have appeared in the same dress as that worn by twenty millions of the finest people upon earth. And for one single sunshiny day—not the day of publication—we made the experiment. Yet we took nothing by our motion. For ilka loon we forgathered with held up his hands in one attitude, and with one interrogatory, exclamation, and interjection—"What! old Kit a turncoat too!" People would not believe their eyes; or if they did, suspected us of mockery; and thousands turned upon their heel, and went off in the sulks, saying, "they did not understand such liberties." In squares and streets where our person was not known, we still overheard the nation harping on the same string—as each passer-by (laughing in his sleeve) whispered to his crony, "Would you believe it? North is one of Us?" What with the greeting of doubts, fears, hopes, condolences, congratulations, curses, threats, and one or two abortive efforts at personal violence, assailing us on all sides, and what with the fretful and feverish out-side-in feel of our clothes, a sensation which sorely tries the most sincere and resolute turncoat in the very prime of life, but is utterly unendurable to the fine-skinned old man, who facetiously plays a game at tergiversation for a single forenoon, and, as we say in Scotland, "i' the horn way," (a style, by the way, impossible to the Galloway Stot or his Stirk,) we were so sorely fatigued on our return to the Lodge, that we had to go, on the spur of the moment, to bed. We awoke next day with a sick-headach—the whole world glimmering before our eyes like mirage—and have, ever since, in spite of the occasional ridicule of scamps and cockneys, worn our coat in the old-fashioned way, and not with the buttons inward, than which nothing can be more inconvenient, for the poor turncoat is left sprawling at the mercy of every wind, and Dismal Duds is seen veering disconsolately to and fro, envying the stationary scarecrow on the potatoe-field, who, proud though poor, is seen wearing his habiliments in the same independent style that had so long distinguished his progenitor, (if he will allow us to call him so,) the Irish beggar—by whom they had been as originally stolen, as originally bestowed; for in any thing Pat does, you discern an air of genius. He borrows, begs, steals, so as to blind your eyes into a belief that he is the original owner of the article; whereas Sawney, whether a borrower, a beggar, or a thief, carries the curse of commonplace on his very countenance, and is seen through, without spectacles, at second-hand.

We are not, then, called apostates—that charge will not pass current even in Cockaigne—but bigots. Bats accuse us of blindness; which is foolish in Flitter-mice. These creatures see insects in twilight, and, we presume, eat them, else why keep they “flitting by on leathern wing?” But they have no idea of eagles, like us, in sunshine. Not seeing us among the hawks of their native barn, or the branches of their native bole, they suppose we cannot, like them, stand the full blaze of meridian eve; and they keep cheeping and hissing through the gloaming amphibiously, neither flesh nor fowl, as if against us, who are both flesh and fowl, and also fish into the bargain. The reader, who is not versed in natural history, would be amazed were he to be told of the vast number of bats that have been discovered congregating in dark places, all clustering together in bunches—the fetid bear-eyes! We have at divers times, and in sundry manners, slain scores upon scores—yet still the wretched race survives; and of late years they seem to have grown to a larger size than of yore. Popular ignorance used to suppose them, not unreasonably, mouse-bred; but now they seem rather to have their origin in the rat—a cross between the rat and the tom-tit—unhallowed mixture! The product not of improvement in the species—though of Reform.

With the exception of a few such creatures, whom it is not easy to catch without cruelty, but whom, when they are accidentally caught by fluttering against us, we always humanely kill—we know of no other opponents. People who do not like us, and there are a few, keep out of our way now; and when we chance to meet, politely give us the wall. We bow, and pass by with mutual suavity; for we wish to quarrel with nobody—and though commonly called Kit, “yet our name is easy John.” Even now, when there are so many patry persons who will not keep a good tongue in their mouth, but who, out of place and out of time, blutter most offensively about the “Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill,” we have been loath to use the knout. Not that it is out of repair—quite the contrary—it has positively, comparatively, superlatively,—literally, figuratively, and metaphorically, renewed its youth. In wood and leather, in timber and thong alike,

“It is not a child of Time,
But daughter of th’ Eternal Prime!”

Should any Pelops doubt it, let him but shew his shoulder, and we engage to cut out of it, at a single stroke, a piece like a child. Reformers indeed! from whom hold they their credentials? What are their instructions? and by what means avow or intend they to achieve their ends?

These questions, gentle reader or grim, you and we can easily answer—and suppose we do so now for the benefit of our patroness the Pensive Public.

On the great question of Reform in Parliament—for it either is or seems to be great—looming as it now does on the horizon—we who are liberal in politics—though ‘tis the first and shall be the last time we ever applied, or will apply to ourselves that presumptuous epithet—allow that among conscientious men there must needs be many important differences of opinion. Liberal! ay, it is an epithet worse than presumptuous; for it is almost always self-applied by blockhead or black-guard; insolent as it is silly, and not more foolish than it is false. Why say not men and women as well—that they belong to sets distinguished for other virtues besides liberality? Why say they not that they are graceful, or beautiful, or honest, or chaste, or virtuous, or religious? They do. Some there are who lay exclusive claims even to Christianity. All but they are Heathens—Pagans—black lost sheep—Satan being their shepherd. But now we are alluding to the Liberals. “I am liberal in my politics,” says some sumph, in the naked dormitory of whose unfurnished numskull no waif and stray idea ever took up, among vermin, a night’s sleepless abode, at twopence the foul straw. “I am liberal in my politics,” says some swindler, who, if suffered by a flunky to share his bed in the garret, will not neglect the opportunity, while his unuspicious chum is singing o’er his master’s shoes, as the thirsty leather is imbibing the matchless blacking of the member for Preston, of letting the chaff out on the floor, and being off with the ticking to a gypsy-craal. "I am liberal in my politics," says some twenty-times tergiversated turn-coat of an editor of some rascally radical newspaper—alike out at the elbows and the knees—and who has been so habituated to creeping and crawling, that he feels himself to be a beetle—so that meet him when and where you will, he seems always bent post-haste, through dry dust or wet, towards his hole—his cozy chink or cranny in the wall, concealed by the hanging drapery of cobweb. "I am liberal in my politics," says the bankrupt—but not beggar—fattening on a composition with his creditors, who are as lean as straws. "I am liberal in my politics," says the bloated son of a sinecure, abusive of the bounty that raised his father from the filth. "I am liberal in my politics," says the "trembling coward who forsook his master" for easier work, and larger wages, and reviles the system of which, though the old stock be dead, he, a sort of scion, still encumbers the ground as an excrescence, in the shape of a stinking fungus. "I am liberal in my politics," says the profligate prodigal, who squanders the hereditary hoard of a line of obscure money-scriveners, on such swinish satisfactions as you hear guzzling and grunting in styes. "I am liberal in my politics," says the inhuman niggard, who would not give a doit to famished dotage wandering in the misery of houseless starvation, or sitting on the dirt-heap, from which it is too feeble to fumble itself up on its feet with a bending crutch by the wayside. "I am liberal in my politics," says the savage sire, who drives his only daughter in desperation to run away with his groom. "I am liberal in my politics," says the traitor who would behead the King whose feet he licks;—but for the present let these few stuffed specimens suffice to shew our scorn of the self-dubbed liberals; and let them suffice, too, to shame out of the use of a degraded epithet—thus made disgraceful and disgusting—all those men of worth whom personal vanity or party spite has rendered equally blind to the folly of appropriating it, in its first and high sense, to themselves, the injustice of excluding from it persons no whit their inferiors in any thing, and the profanation of bestowing the praise it implies on so many of the basest, meanest, and wickedest of mankind.

But we were observing, when we broke off into this castigation of the pseudo-liberals, that we can well imagine many and great differences in opinion, among conscientious men, on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. Not a few, and these not inconsiderable, differences in opinion exist among Ourselves; and as they have been, so will they be expressed in Maga, without subjecting her to any reproach. We are—all of us—attached to our institutions in church and state—and believe that, as the best of them are well-built with durable materials on a foundation of rock, they will stand secure in their time-honoured strength against all enemies. But we care not—except as antiquaries—about old rubbish; and in many cases would lend a helping hand, shovels, and wheelbarrows, for its removal to some more appropriate place than the outer court of a temple, not to say its inner shrine. But we would hesitate to send in workmen even from a mechanics' institution, to make havoc with axes and hammers of its carved work—or even after the decay wrought by the tooth of time among its ancient devices, to trust them with the work of renovation. It is easier to innovate than to renovate—to alter than to restore. We confess we love the ancient—in towers—in trees—in charters—and in acts. Old towers we would repair—old trees on no account transplant—old charters reverence—and old acts eternize—save and except only towers tottering to their fall, and these we would assist gently down to the dust—trees too damp in the hollow interior of their rottenness even for owls, and these we would hew down for fire—chart-ers of which the letters are alive but the spirit dead, and these we would allow in their chests a peaceful oblivion—acts obsolete, because gone or changed the times which gave them power, and these we would with little reluctance erase when we saw that they would not wisely be renewed—and were "good people all of every sort" of our way of feeling, and thinking, and acting, what a World after the Flood would this appear—how strong and beautiful by land and sea!

And here we are brought to put and answer the question—How is the nation—the people—affected towards Reform?

Many enlightened men, how many we may not say, are on principle against all, that is any, Parliamentary Reform. Take for specimens of their representatives, the Duke of Wellington,—the Author, whoever he may be, and he is manifestly no ordinary person, of a celebrated political essay, in a late number of the Quarterly Review—the Author of a series of articles in this Magazine, one of which will be thought by thousands to strengthen our present Number, and some other able writers. The Duke has not yet given the grounds of his opinion, but the other politicians have; and it is safer to stand without than within the wind of their weapons. Their arguments have not and will not be refuted, by such persons as are now predominant over the political press—predominant, not by the legitimate power of reasoning, but by the despotism of abuse. That their arguments have convinced thousands and hundreds of thousands, not only that there is no necessity for Reform, but that any change in our representative system would be dangerous and hurtful, we have no doubt whatever; nor yet that many more needed not to be so convinced, for that they have always been of the same mind with these powerful writers. Nor let any man, whatever be his own opinions, start at this assertion; for they have said no more than has been said by the wisest British statesmen of ages as wise, though perhaps not in their own conceit, as this age of the march of intellect. What the wise then uttered the good approved; and for the preservation of such blessings the patriot and the martyr died. Is it so long since Britons believed the British Constitution to be the best ever built up by the hearts and hands of the free, that they who declare that it is so still, seem to be repeating an ancient fable? Were they all fools whose eloquence kindled on that theme into such a blaze as “pales not its ineffectual fires,” but burns brightly even when brought in comparison with the Greek and Roman glow? 'Tis no old story; the orators who so spake were of our own age. In Westminster Abbey, millions now alive saw their funerals. It is not pretended that the British constitution is not now all that then it was; but its proportions, deemed so fine and stately, now offend scientific eyes and patriotic souls; and the same people, it would appear, are now eager to pull down what—not their forefathers alone, for they were barbarians—but their very fathers, whose bones, if buried, are unmouldered, and who were as civilized as their children—lived, and not a few of them died too to preserve, and in life and death hoped and prayed that it might be eternal.

But great wits have short memories—and all this is forgotten even by many who formerly joined them in those prayers for—as unsenselessly we fear as they join now in these execrations against—the integrity of the British constitution.

Unquestionably there are many enlightened persons—apart from any active share in politics—who see what they calmly consider defects in the representation, and would be happy to see them removed or remedied; but who see, at the same time, signs and portents in the troubled and lowering aspect of the horizon all round Europe, warnings against attempting at present such improvements, lest agitation should lead to disturbance, and disturbance to revolution, and revolution to the utter overthrow of those institutions which, though in their eyes not perfect, are yet, with all their faults or defects, most sacred, and not to be touched even with a hand of healing, except in a period of peace, the proper working-time for renovating wisdom.

There are many, again, who see these faults and defects in a stronger light, who are less disposed to regard the present time as unfavourable, or dangerous, for their correction; and who therefore are desirous of Reform—and that too of a decided character. But, Reformers as they are, they abhor the proposed measures of the Ministry as much as they fear them; and would rather—far rather let things remain as they are, than substitute a system that is even in their eyes not amelioration, but reversal—not correction, but subversion—not restoration, but overthrow.

Had not that Great Party which alone could have carried a moderate Reform, seemingly ceased to exist, we should have been now in the ranks of such Reformers—and so will we, should ever that great party be revived into the possession of any thing like its former power—and we would vain hope that that is yet possible.

Disensions wide and deep among the good were caused by one fatal measure, which was carried, alas! by the sacrifice, with too many, of sacred principles, and by apostasy from liberty and truth, invaded in their guardian shrines. On many other measures too, of mighty importance, they who should have stood fast, foot to foot, fell away into the adverse ranks, or continued together feebly and distrustfully—and thence fear and impotence, almost as disastrous as desertion to the enemy. But why now recall to remembrance such sad and sorry things as these? That they may lead to shame, remorse, and repentance in their perpetrators—and so be half-forgotten and half-forgiven by the country; and a Political Reunion effected that will yet carry the day.

There is yet power and principle left—in spite of the weakness brought on both by these wretched proceedings—sufficient to overwhelm this revolutionizing Ministry under total and irretrievable defeat, from the ruin of which they shall not be saved even by a succession of dissolutions, till the hearts of evil counsellors sicken and their voices be mute.

We have said enough to expose the foolish, and worse than foolish, the audacious and dishonest assertions of most of the friends of a radical reform, that the whole nation are with the ministers in this their grand measure. A vast body of the nation is against them, and every day waxing into more resolute and active opposition. Small knowledge, indeed, of human nature is required, and of the character of the political parties in this country, to understand why at first there was a rush, as it were, in favour of the Bill. The more furious reformers—and they are many, and have long been in a political union that needed not the aid of an avowed name—gave tongue, with a sudden burst, like hounds let loose on a trail-hunt; and though not perhaps very musical,—for the pack, though mustering many stanch and well-bred ones, involved a miscellaneous rabble of mongrels,—the echoes were loud and long, reverberated from the gable-ends of hills and houses; while huntsmen, whippers-in, and the hunt in general, some of whom sported scarlet cloth, some plush, and others corduroy, and who exhibited all the varieties of which mounting is susceptible, clapped their hands to their ears, not exactly after the fashion of Nimrod, and yelled, “hark forward, tautiv,” till the Daughter of the Air was hoarse in her vain attempts to do justice to the confusion of tongues of man and beast, undistinguishable in the monstrous mêlée. This was said, at the time, to be the voice of the Nation. ’Twas but the yell of the radical Hunt—as foolish, though perhaps somewhat more formidable, than that of Epping. Had the chase been alive, he must have been alarmed; but the pack were pursuing but a trail of annisced, or a red berring; and yet such hounds as were not thrown out by being entangled in brambly thickets, or capsized in stony streams, ran in upon the stopped stink with as much ferocity as if it had been an absolute Fox; and the gentlemen and flunkies, who composed the remnant of the Hunt, the Field forsooth, were all proud as Punch of being in at the death of—a bundle of smell, in the shape of rag or speldrin.

In short, the hullabaloo was prodigious in favour of Reform.

“While many cracked bells did so loud and so clear ring,
You’d have given ten pounds to be out of their hearing.”

Meanwhile, honest people, who had no ambition to become members of the Radical Hunt, as the chase swept by, eyed it from door or window with mixed emotions of wonder, fear, contempt, and disgust: while rural apothecaries fell strenuously to the preparation of plasters and clysters for broken head and bruised bottom, and their apprentices kept pestle and mortar going at top speed in a thousand villages.

But let us "check our hand," and "change our measure." We say then, that we have proved ourselves, by all we have ever written, to be the Friends of the People. Their vital interests we have ever advocated—their character we have ever vindicated from all aspersions thrown on it by purse-pride, or birth-pride, or rank-pride, or talent-pride, or piety-pride—each in itself a Lucifer. We have lent our feeble hand, along with other lovers of our kind, to bring out their virtues from the shade into the light, and according to our strength made way for them, that they might of themselves take their due place—the highest of all—on the scale of civilisation. A darling theme for our tongue and pen has ever been—the Education of the People. Their kirks and their kirkyards, their houses and their hearths—if but grateless hovels,—we love and venerate for the virtues burning, or buried there, for the high religion, the pure morals, and the decent manners of their domestic life. Few radical reformers could say a tenth part of that, without their lives and their libels giving them the lie. But we should be basely sacrificing our love of truth to our love of the people, were we to say that the majority of them could, by any possibility, be good, or even indifferent judges of this question. If left to themselves, they would not believe they were so, notwithstanding the somewhat too presumptuous spirit which has been of late years instilled into too many of them, by that very education which, like every other earthly good, is not without its drawbacks and its flaws.

The people have a voice, and it is heard, and influences our national councils. But it breathes—it does not yell over the land. The attentive ears of humane wisdom hear it perpetually, and in the heart of humane wisdom it is treasured up—and then it is, to use the words of one of the sages of men, that its "still and voice,"

"Not harsh nor grating, but of simplest power To soften and subdue," is indeed holy—then it is that we can with truth say, "Vox populi vox Dei." But while the people may thus be calmly breathing their sentiments and opinions, as they are at all times entitled and prompted by their condition to do, when that condition is, as it is in this land, on the whole, sound, natural, and healthy, making just allowance for all evil influences whencesoever borne in upon their lives,—the populace may be yelling—not their sentiments, for sentiments on such a subject they can have none—not their opinions, for by demagogues they are crammed but with poisonous wind—but their passions fiercer for that they have no aim but the vague one of mischief, and because the hollowness of the head aggravates the rottenness of the heart, making them dangerous alike in life and in death. In troubled times they murmur "as they go, for want of thought;" and, in times of wilder distraction, from the same want, would they murder.

That the populace of our great towns and cities, and town-like villages, and above all the suburban, are for Reform, is as true as that they are for Revolution. But what honest and humane reformer would wish such allies? Heaven forbid that we should ever apply any insulting epithet to the People. But look there—behold the swinish multitude. Look at their tails contorted in desperate obstinacy, that will neither be led nor driven—and telling as plainly as tails can tell, that it is an equal chance whether the bestial herd will make a charge upon women and children, or higglety-pigglety go headlong, in demoniac suicide, into the sea. Look, we beseech you, at their eyes—their small red eyes so fiery with greed and lust! Their snouts scenting all the airs for garbage, and their tusks stone-whetted and sharp as the mower's scythe—their hoofs—say rather their cloots—"oh, call them pale, not fair"—raking the mire fore and aft! And their hides horrid from nape to rump with angry bristles, at once the terror and delight of cobblers;—and if you still have your doubts whether or no these be indeed such reformers as you would choose either to send you to, or represent you in Parliament, why you have only to solicit their voices—their most sweet voices—and your wavering mind will be settled be one unanimous grunt from the old boars and sows, and by a multifarious and multitudinous bubble-and-squeak from all the infant schools of piggies, on recovering from which, if you are a Christian, you will exclaim in soliloquy, "The voice of the swine is the voice of the devil."

That all those we have been now speaking about, by whatever name you choose to call them, pigs or populace, should be for the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill, is really more than we should have expected, either a priori, or a posteriori; although there would be some difficulty, we suspect, in taking their votes at a general election, especially on the scheme of Universal Suffrage. Were there likewise Annual Parliaments, the land would be a-grunt the whole year; and there would be no ascertaining "the scope and tendency of Bacon." The ballot would be impracticable—and we should pity from the bottom of our hearts the scrutinizing members of his Majesty's Privy Council.

Mr Baring Wall, in his "Few Words to the Electors of Guildford on Reform," remarks well on a popular error which is in so many mouths—"I am against Reform, but the country is for it; can I put my opinion in competition with theirs?" Now, this bill of Reform, he says to them, is, or is believed by the people (he is not now speaking of the pig-populace) to be, a bill to take the power from the hands of the minority, and place it in the hands of the majority; and he puts it to the common sense and understanding of his constituents, whether such a bill, with such a supposed object, can fail to be popular in the country? There is, he holds, a gross fallacy in this supposition; for in point of fact it is a bill for the disfranchisement of a large proportion of the people in favour of a small minority—which, according to his estimate, would not exceed 150,000 persons in England and Wales. Let the real nature of the bill be what it may—and we are not now discussing it—whatever will be its effects, near or remote—it is beyond all doubt—as Mr Baring Wall says in other words—that immense multitudes imagine that it confers a boon on each of themselves individually, and lifts him up to an elector.

Nay, many are the idiots in the middle and lower ranks who, on writing their names, already see at the close of their signatures, those magical letters M.P., inspiring them with the pride of Nebuchadnezzar. They are learning already to forget their distinct shop-handwriting, and to scrawl franks like senators. But they ought to remember that poor Bucky's nails grew into claws, in punishment of his pride, and that ultimately he fed, not on asparagus, but on downright and upright grass—such of it as grew in ditches, probably Fiorin. Glasgow, we understand, is to be represented by a crazy coxcomb, who, for some reason or other which we cannot conjecture, has been cognomen'd by the citizens, so full and so fond of geg-gery, (see Kingan,) the Glasgow Gander.

Lord John Russell, with great dignity of mouth and manner, told the House of Commons, that the object of his motion was demanded by the majority of the people of England. When reprehended for this mean and monstrous admission by Sir Harry Inglis—of whom Oxford has reason to be proud—we believe he mumbled in his words; but once spoken, they shew the spirit of the orator. Had that spirit been worthy of his ancestors and of himself—we say of himself, for we esteem the character of Lord John Russell—such senseless syllablings could never have drivelled from his lips, which, though ineloquent, have often given utterance to sentiments worthy an English nobleman—the same being a gentleman and a scholar. Yes—true it is and of verity, that the mos does demand payment in full of their own bill. They will allow no discount—nor a late day. They point their fetid forefingers to the "tottle of the whole"—and, "grinning horribly a ghastly smile," growl "PAYABLE ON DEMAND." And what—in case of refusal? Ask the press. Pike and bayonet—ball cartridge and grape. But these, indeed, are commodities—articles in which debtors—if debtors they be—deal as well as creditors. The demand in this case will create a supply; and ten quiet citizens are more than a match at that game any day of the year for a hundred ruffians.

True it is, as Sir Harry Inglis, in his statesmanlike speech, forcibly declares, that though it is the first time for fifty years that the advisers of his Majesty have thought fit to pledge themselves, and to endeavour to pledge their sovereign, (alas, too successfully!) before his people, to the doctrine, "that the House of Commons is unworthy of the confidence of the people," unworthy to stand between their fellow-subjects and the throne,—yet the doctrine itself is not new, but as old as the race of demagogues. "Demand their rights," indeed! A House, not of Commons, but of Cowards, would that be, that despised not the wretched threats of a rebellious populace! A pretty deliberative assembly that should absolutely mute—sit mute, we mean, through fear! All the world knows that the cry for Reform has been as loud as now—and louder too—many a time and oft between the 1731 and 1831; but that ministers, though but of average nous and nerve, despised the "brutum fulmen." Not to go farther back than the close of the American war, look, says Sir Harry, "at the declaration of a Lord-Lieutenant, that the houses of counter-addressors (counter to those of the leaders of the people) should be marked; the exhortation to householders to provide themselves with arms; the advice that "each man should keep a fire-lock in the corner of his bedroom, and should learn to fire and charge with bayonet firmly and regularly" against those who in his day resisted Reform. An advice given by no less a man than Dr Parr's most celebrated pupil, and a great Oriental scholar, though great in nothing else but languages, mediocrity having marked him for her own, Sir William Jones. What said Horne Tooke when this very Bill of Reform was in the House in 1782? Why "the Bill—the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill," or death and destruction from that giant, the Mob, the blackguard Briareus, with the unwashed unnumbered hands. But Mob kept all his paws in his fob; and it was well for him then, as it will be for him now, that he did not enter his ring,—against whom?

Why, against the Peorix, who then as now, had he chosen to strip, would have knocked that great hulking fellow, Ignobille Vulgus, out of time in a couple of rounds, nor prided himself on settling the hash of the White-Feather. Again, in 1793, what was the cry? Hear Condorcet, a high authority with all Reformers. "This people [the English] who at once fear and desire such a revolution as ours, will necessarily be drawn along by those courageous and enlightened persons [the leading Reformers] who always determine the first steps; the opening of the Session of Parliament which approaches will infallibly become the occasion of the reforms which are the most urgent; such as those which regard the national representation; from thence to the entire establishment of a republic, the transition will be the less tedious, because the foundations of liberty have long existed in England." "That cry for Reform," says Sir Harry Inglis, "was then raised by sympathy with revolutionary France; it was said triumphantly in France to lead here to a republic; it was urged on here, as at present, by men of at least as much talent as the present; it was subdued, under a good Providence, by the firmness and virtue of the government." And it will be subdued now, in spite of the firmness and virtue of the government, were they even increased tenfold.

Public opinion is a mighty agent, now, in the world's affairs; but we have said enough already to shew that its voice is neither a grunt nor a growl. Public opinion, we presume, is the aggregate opinion either of the majority, or of the whole of the nation. Now, supposing you hear two voices—not "one of the sea, one of the mountains,"—but two voices sent from two loud-throated Giants, one dwelling in the mist of hills, and the other in the smoke of houses—and each uttering a cry, which, being interpreted, mean two things as opposite as the poles. Which, pray, is the voice of public opinion? Is it that of the modern brick houses? Or is it that of the ancient heather hills? We are not the wizard to answer that question; but we say, with all the caution of old age, that the discordant dust

"must give us pause;" and that the ministers who, obedient to the babble of the Bricks, counselled their King to dissolve the Parliament who hearkened to the voice of the Hills, proved thereby their passion for place and power, but left not problematical their purity and their patriotism.

But suppose public opinion to sing a solo. What then? Why, often, when pressed to sing, she is mute as a mouse in a cat-ridden, or a woman in a priest-ridden house, who opens not her lips but for cheese or kisses. While often, when it is insisted on that she shall not sing, she sets up such a squall, that the lark drops from the sky, presuming that it is the Peregrine. Yet in neither case, perhaps, is this expression of public opinion, whether chanted audante—affettuoso—or con amore, little more than an old song.

Public opinion is like a perpetual fire—sometimes it smoulders—sometimes it bursts into a blaze. The Spectator, when it chooses to be asleep, swears it is dead; the Rambler, when it thinks proper to be awake, believes it will burn the woods. Both are mistaken. The worthy old fire follows the law of its own element; and what that law is, political philosophers are to find out, and by it to square their conduct. The difficulty lies in people sticking to the proper point between recklessness and alarm; so that there shall be no absurd bawling for water, when there is no intention on the fire's part to devour so much as even a little dry straw; and no demand for wind, when, with the aid of such light airs as may be going, the rampant Fire-king feels himself sufficiently strong to burn down the Modern Athens.

Look at the Literature of this Age. What, pray, has been the behaviour of public opinion about its various fashions? Lord help you, the Pensive Public has changed her opinion of poetry, for example, oftener than Magna her wrapper, or than the Moon her horns. And if of Poetry, why not of Prose, and more especially that kind of it, the most prosaic of all—politics? The truth is, that the Pensive Public is as a flirt—nay, a jilt, a jade—or even something worse—which shall be nameless; and they who are too solicitous of her golden opinion, of standing high in her good graces, will find, as they clasp her to their enamoured bosoms, not that she is a soft showery cloud like the Juno Ixion embraced, but a hard miry clod, out of which by mortal man nought was ever begotten, but a pain in all his bones, distinguished by all the symptoms alike of acute and chronic rheumatism, and terminating in gout, beyond the power of Teau medicinal—so beware of counterfeits.

In illustration of this, turn to Mr Croker's admirable speech, in which he tore that of the Lord Advocate to rags. Public opinion expresses itself in petitions—at present in petitions for Parliamentary Reform. Reform is now her ruling passion, which, like Lord Cobham, she will feel "strong in death." Now, a ruling passion is not like an ordinary affair of the heart, familiar matter of to-day, or yesterday, or to-morrow—a flash in the pan—swift as lightning in the collied night. It is permanent. Alas! then, for the ruling passion for Reform in the heart of the Pensive Public, as expressed in petitions! In the year 1821, nineteen petitions only were presented in favour of Reform; in 1822, twelve; in 1823, twenty-nine; in 1824 none at all. In 1825, 6, 7, 8, and 9, the Pensive Public was cold as a vestal virgin, nor once petitioned the House to gratify her passion for Reform—for her ruling passion was dead—and she had no more heat in her veins than an oyster. But mercy on her and us!—On St Valentine's day, 1831, her amorous propensities, like those of the other choristers of the grove, revived with unconscionable ardour, and she presented unblushingly—for what it is hard to say—650 petitions!

"For what it is hard to say," but Mr Croker lets us into the secret of her loves. She petitions for her just right of having all placemen dismissed from the House of Commons—a request which, considering from whom it comes, and to whom it is addressed, is a sweet and soothing specimen of modesty and moderation. She petitions for the right of having annual, or at least triennial, Parliaments—but most earnestly and frequently for the first. She petitions for the right of having all the large towns and populous districts of the country represented in the House of Commons, and that those close and decayed boroughs containing but few inhabitants, which now return members to Parliament, should be disfranchised. She petitions for the right of every man to have a vote in the election of members of the House of Commons, who is in any way called upon to contribute to either national or local taxation, either direct or indirect; and she petitions fervently and frequently for vote by ballot. In short, the Pensive Public expresses her public opinion, by means of 650 petitions, for annual Parliaments, vote by ballot, and universal suffrage. Nor does she conceal her opinion of kings, and nobles, and priests, of taxation and tithes, which is far from flattering; nor is she at pains to dissemble her desire and hope—the slut—that at no distant day, crowns, mitres, and cassocks, may be thrown into the deep, deep sea—tythes, whether tu pig-flesh or pig-iron, diffused among the laity—and taxes paid by those who are silly enough to submit to them, they being unnecessary under a good government—such as will direct the affairs of this country after a judicious Reform.

Now, we humbly think, that his Majesty's Ministers have no right to quote the public opinion, as it has been expressed in these 650 petitions to which they have exultingly referred, as an irresistible argument in favour of their Plan of Reform, unless it be such a plan as the Pensive Public has in these her 650 petitions, to use Lord John Russell's word, *demand*ed. Is then the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, such as will satisfy the fair petitioner? Not it indeed. She will abuse them all as a pack of old grumbling impotent dotards—or Greybeards—or Durham oxen. Soon will the infuriated Beldam put her hands to her hips, and call them all Tailors—Fractions—with a face an epitome of those of the Three Furies—and at the same time involving a strong resemblance to that of Medusa the Gorgon.

But the public opinion speaks "with most miraculous organ," not through those 650 manuscript petitions, but in printed papers—thrown hastily off from as many Presses—some clanking away calmly—'tis a beautiful invention—by steam. There is the power of the Reformers. Can any one believe that the continual misrepresentation, the gross partiality of the daily press of London, has not a tremendous effect adverse to the cause of truth and right principles at the present crisis? Why is it not met—and written down? Why are its trash and falsehood not daily hung up to be scorned and detested as they would be, were they properly exposed? Is there any one so egregiously absurd as to suppose that could not be done? And would it not be done if the Tory party were animated by the spirit that ought to animate them now? Their own existence as a powerful party, their country's welfare is at stake. It rests upon the decision of this reform question, which will ultimately depend upon the press; and yet the press is neglected; the STANDARD itself, though in itself an host, and floating far and wide as a rallying point in the field, receives no succour from many who ought to fight under it—succour which indeed it needs not for its own sake—for it may even scorn it—but which all true Tories are bound to afford, as they value the cause in which it is fearlessly unfurled. Let it go on in its noble career; and prosperous, too, be that gallant paper, the Morning Post, most able and patriotic. The John Bull is admirable as of old.

As for ourselves, we are remote provincials—and our mouth opens but once a month. Yet it is heard, we believe, from Kirkwall to Cornwall—and the Radicals turn pale and tremble with mingled rage and fear at the trumpet-tones of old Christopher—the crow of the Cock of the North, as the Atlas, spite of our vital differences in political opinion, had the honesty to think and the boldness to call us who have trampled the Cockneys under our spurs and claws. The Press is neglected by the Tories. Nor is this all. The People too are neglected. That is the truth. Tory principles are perishing away from amongst them, because they look up and find no Leaders—no combinations of influential men whose object it is to encourage and disseminate those principles. They have no natural taste for the new doctrines which are so industriously promulgated amongst them; on the contrary, they have a hereditary respect for aristocracy, and monarchy, and the church. But they who should defend these stand aloof from them; they only see them afar off, while the industry of the revolutionary party is ever on the watch, and its members are ever personally assiduous in promoting its sway over the people. If firm, united, governed by one spirit, the Tory Party in this country would still be irresistible. They have but to come forth and shew themselves banded together, and ready to do battle for the country, and their enemies would quail and crumble before them. But if they will not combine their strength, and bring it forth in open array against the enemy,—if they will not make sacrifices of personal ease and tranquillity, ay, and of personal feeling too, in the public cause, they may possibly, though not probably, be suffered to enjoy themselves in a private station, while they live, but their children will not be the inheritors of their political power, their aristocratical honours, nor their vast possessions.

We began cheerfully, almost, some might think, with levity, but we follow our own humours—the moods of our own mind—and we close our “say” for the present in a grave spirit. It was worthy of a reforming Whig Ministry, during all the debates on this measure, to shew themselves, along with all their menials, abjectly servile, and basely slavish, to the nod, beck, lip, finger of their lord and master—the King. Never may such loyalty as theirs, false and hollow in spirit, as it is crafty and insidious in words, effect a lodgement in one Tory breast. “Fear God and honour the King,” is our religious and political creed in one. But theirs is, omitting the first clause—“Fawn on the King.” Never before were so many hyperbolic and hypocritical eulogies heaped on the name and nature, the duty and the diadem of a king, and all for a party purpose, in assemblies of free men. Sir Francis Burdett did not scruple to slaver his Majesty all over with the nauseous and monstrous falsehood, that “William the Fourth was the noblest king that had sat on the throne of England since Alfred.” Lord Brougham himself, who once brutally abused the “breed” of which his Royal Master is come, as a breed debased by the curse of hereditary idiocy, defied, while yet alive to enjoy his own apothecosis, the son of that sire on whose grey hairs and dim eyes he had vented his Jacobin rage, to the disgust and horror of all English hearts. Sir Thomas Denman, who had drawn a parallel between the character of his Majesty’s brother, who was himself “every inch a King,” and that of the pathic Nero, the madman and matricide, must needs too lay his forehead at the Royal feet, a lick-spittle of the footstool before the Throne, talking unintelligibly about Harry the Fifth, and his Lord Chief Justice who had reproved his youthful follies when Prince of Wales—between which fine old story, and that of his own truculent transgressions as a hired libeller, vanity of vanities alone could have discovered any similitude either in lawyer or in King. While Shiel, who when another brother of his Majesty’s was lying on his death-bed, enduring with more than heroic fortitude, with Christian resignation, soul-sickening agonies that to the uncomplaining sufferer lengthened many a sleepless night, laughed at the Duke because he was dying of a dropsy,—why Shiel too must be forthcoming with his offering of fetid flummery, at which the Royal Stomach, however strong by nature and fortified by habit, must have scunnered, and at the first swallow thrown up in energetic nausea the revolting load.

We have not to decide here, whether or no all this king-slobbering was constitutional; but simply whether it was manly; whether it was more becoming British senators or Turkish slaves; whether it was such as was to have been naturally expected from men who worshipped Magna Charta as the guarantee of their liberties, or eunuchs who knew no writing but the Firman black with the doom of death.

Then, what Ministry, even Whig, did ever before strive to intimidate a House of Commons into any measure, by declaring, in good set terms, that if they resisted and defeated it, the populace, or the people, would cut their throats? Yet so argued the unprincipled poltroons. For unprin-ciples they are, and proved themselves to be at the hour of dissolution. Yet poltroons they are not—for they are Englishmen. But to whom had they the audacity to address—not once, but a hundred times—that argumentum ad timorem? To Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, who never yet feared the face of clay, except perhaps some of them that of a bumbailiff before they had got a seat in the House. That truly noble character, Sir Richard Vyvyan, flung from him with disdain such insults, in a style becoming one who can, either in mental or bodily conflict, meet his adversary with a Cornish hug; and Sadler, the most eloquent of the eloquent, and many others besides, withered the wretched supposition with a freeman's scorn. The press echoed the coward cry; and has over and over again warned us anti-Reformers, that the Reformers, rather than that the bill should be lost, will fight for it. Are they—the gentlemen of the press—cravens? No. Neither are we; and while we pity the fools who could for a moment dream of frightening us, who claim no more courage than belongs to themselves, we despise the knaves who, in the rage and malice of foreseen defeat, could strive to urge on a desperate rabble to death.

Of the ferocity of the metropolitan press towards all opponents of the Revolutionary Bill, we have now neither time nor room to speak; nor of the wretched ravings of some of their provincial plagiarists, not forgetting two or three of our own insolent ignoramuses here, who in good time shall undergo their chastisement. Shame to Scotland, that a few unworthy creatures, whose lips had all life-long drank the pure waters of the Tweed and the Tiviot, should have been so denationalized and unnationalized by the lessons of the Cockney crew, as to hiss the noblest man among us all, standing somewhat stooping in a meeting of his countrymen, under the weight of his world-honoured age. That sin is beyond expiation, but not of punishment; and the discreants, whose names are known to us, must not hope that their obscure lot may shield them from that infamy which shall be imperishably recorded, in these pages, over their ignoble and dastard dust.

We have lived long enough to have witnessed many periods of great and awful political interest to other countries and to our own. We have seen almost all the governments of continental Europe made the sport of fortune, and a tyrant's will, and the stability of our own momentarily put in peril by popular discontent. We have seen kingdoms and principalities, and thrones and dynasties, tossed and scattered like chaff in the wind; but we have seen no time when for the fate of our own country there was so much cause for deep and anxious solicitude, as there is at the present moment. We are in a state of dangerous uncertainty respecting all things, such as we never saw before; change is expected everywhere; rumours are afloat everywhere; and we are reminded every day of that condition of the Roman people which Tacitus describes to have existed when the death of Augustus Cæsar began to be expected—“Pauci bona libertatis incassum disserere, plures bellum pavescere, alii cupere; pars subito maxima imminentes dominos variis rumoribus discebant.” Such is our condition at present—every one talks—no one takes the lead—no one stamps the image of his mind upon the nation, and gives life and energy, and a determinate end to its endeavours. In other periods of danger, when the people imagined vain things, and were led away by the frantic violence of speech-makers, or of the press, we still had the constitutional legislature to look to as a power possessing sufficient courage and force to reassure the timid, and to lead the well-disposed and firm in the line of honourable exertion. We had, moreover, not only the strength of the aggregate legislature to rest upon, but particular members of it so rose above the mass of ordinary men in intellect or in character, that they were as leading stars, giving light and confidence to the nation, shewing to others the way that was right, and themselves never swerving from the direct line of their lofty course. But now this foundation of security rocks beneath our feet—these lights of our course have become extinct, or are dim, and we know not on which side to look for safety. The executive government has sought for aid in the power of the multitude, and this united force has flung itself headlong against the constitution of the House of Commons, and it has now become a question whether that Assembly, the parent and guardian of all our great institutions, shall not be immediately and totally changed in form, character, spirit, and even numerical amount. Men will naturally ask what object the Executive could have for an experiment which seems on the face of it to be rather the last resort in a desperate emergency, than the course of a firmly established and powerful state; or what hope they could have of being able to accomplish what they had the temerity to attempt? As to their object, it appears to us, after the most careful examination we have been able to give the subject, to have been to produce such an alteration in the system, and method, and combination of interests, by which this country has been hitherto governed, that the Tory Party who so long possessed exclusive power, might be prevented for a series of years from returning to it, by the annihilation of the whole machinery with which they worked. They know that by erecting a paramount democratical authority, the power of the Tory Party would be for ever destroyed; but they had the egregious and most mistaken vanity to suppose that they would be able to manage such an authority, and to render it subservient to their own purposes.

"Rebusque fidentes, avite Tecta velint reparare Troj."

Herein lay the capital error which makes the danger so great. So long as the contest lay between Whig and Tory, it was nothing but healthy exercise for the constitution, and there was no fear of fatal blows being struck; but the present government, wishing to knock the stage from beneath the feet of the Tories, have embarked in a scheme which would produce a like accident to themselves, and then the democratic mob would rush in, and tear monarchy and aristocracy to pieces in the struggle.

Sanctum, April 25th, 1831.

PARLIAMENTARY SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AT the close of the debate on Reform, of which a sketch was given in the last number, the bill was read a first time, without a division. Why it was that, after such a debate, in which the preponderance of argument, of eloquence, and of national feeling, was so strongly against the project of the Government, the bill should have been allowed, without resistance, to find its way within the House—why it was that a bill, embodying propositions so monstrous, as to excite laughter in the first instance, then alarm, and at last disgust, should have been permitted quietly to take up a position within the vestibule of the Legislature, we leave to be answered by those managers of party affairs, who deem that there may be a more expedient course in politics than that of bold and straight-forward honesty. There are, we know, persons of such prodigious sagacity about little things—mere formalists, with minds better fitted for arranging points of etiquette with antiquated dowagers, than for the management of any concerns of more weight, who would tell us, that the more regular and methodical course was to have the bill upon the table of the House before it was resisted, because until then, there could, according to strict form, be no certain knowledge of its contents—but such men as those ought not to guide a body in whose hands are the destinies of the nation. If they did not know what the bill was, why had there been seven nights of speeches about it? If they did know, why hesitate to spurn it from the House with the indignation natural to men who felt that it was a desperate project of those in office to retain power and place at the hazard of convulsing the country and destroying its institutions? But, as if we were fated to destruction, like Troy of old, the bill was suffered to obtain a footing even by those who knew, or said they knew, the mighty danger which it involved.

"Instamus tamen immemores cæcique furor, Et monstrum infelix sacrata sistimus arce."

The opposition to the bill, so far as the making of speeches went, was most able, but there lacked the lofty spirit of other days, to lead the way in action worthy of the vindicators of the old constitution of England. The enemy was parleyed with, when he should have been stricken down; and even young men may remember with a sigh the leaders they have seen, who would not have suffered the common sense of the nation to be insulted for seven nights, with talk about a proposition so outrageous in all its parts. Whoever took the lead of the friends of order, security, and the established constitution, should have had the spirit to call upon the House at once to negative the motion for bringing in the bill, when its dangerous extravagance became known, through the statement of that puny changeling, Lord John Russell—he, the scion of a noble house, who had the wretched meanness to falsify and stultify himself, by arguing directly in the teeth of what he had written and published, with his name.* But a bold decisive course of opposition did not * A few extracts from the Chapter on Parliamentary Reform in Lord John Russell's book on the English Constitution, will best shew the faith which should be placed in the views which he now takes; or pretends to take, upon the same subject. In a detached form they necessarily lose much of their force, but the chapter, taken as a whole, is the most direct contradiction to the Lord John of 1831, that can possibly be given.

"You complain of the formation of the House of Commons, such as it has existed from the Revolution to the present time. You prove that the frame of our Government, during that time, has been a corrupt combination for private purposes. Now our fathers and our grandfathers have told us, that during that time they were very free, and very happy. Their testimony is confirmed by the wisest lawyers, the greatest philosophers, the most enthusiastic poets of the times. Your theory goes to overturn the testimony of Blackstone, Montesquieu, Voltaire, Thomson, Cowper, and a hundred others, who have declared England to be, in their time, in the enjoyment of complete freedom. Now, government is a matter of experience and not of speculation, we will therefore not believe a word of your theory. Such an objection as this, appears to me to be sound."—P. 243-4.

suit that kind of genius which cannot discriminate between the moments that may save a kingdom, and those that may be devoted to the study of a speech, so the bill passed on to a second reading: the debate upon which it is proposed to give some account of, first noticing, however, the preceding debate on the new timber duties, and that respecting the Times Newspaper, both of which are of too much importance to be omitted in a record of Parliamentary proceedings, however limited.

An alteration of the timber duties, so as to increase the tax upon the consumption of that article, was one of the propositions in Lord Althorpe's most absurd and ill-starred budget, for which, as well as for several of the other items of this never-to-be-forgotten financial plan, his lordship was evidently indebted to the deep sagacity, and modest disinterestedness of Mr Powlett Thompson. Coming from such a source, the policy of the measure may be easily guessed at—it was to sacrifice the important shipping trade between this country and North America, and to ruin our Canadian colonies, in order to carry into effect a theory of the Economists, and to serve the interests of those engaged in the Baltic trade, a class towards whom Mr Thompson seems to have a sympathy so lively, that most of his attempts in politics have a curious connexion with their advantages. While all the other important features of the budget were abandoned, in consequence of the storm of dissatisfaction and contempt which was raised by their announcement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought proper to manifest some vaillance on the subject of the timber duties, and intimated the determination of Government to adhere to their plan. When, however, the night came for taking the sense of the House upon this question, the Minister suddenly changed his plan of attack upon the established interests of the country, and, relinquishing that part of the scheme which went to increase taxation, contented himself with a plan for effecting gradually the destruction of the trade with Canada, and transferring our demand for timber to those places, on the shores of the Baltic, which maintain the inviting system of a strict exclusion of our manufactures. By this sudden alteration, of which no previous notice was given, it was hoped to catch the votes of those whose opposition was merely to an increase of taxation, and thus to effect the favourite object of encouraging a trade with foreigners, at the expense of destroying that with our own subjects. Mr Attwood rose at once to resist the plan, upon the broad principle of the necessity of affording justice and protection to those embarked in the Canadian trade. "Our merchants," he said, "on the faith of the protection offered to them, exerted all that enterprise which has ever belonged to them; they invested their fortunes in the recesses of the Canadian Forests; erected mills and machinery; cut canals, and built wharfs and warehouses, all of which will be useless, if this protection be withdrawn. But we are deceived if we think such a measure will not bring

"All parts of the country, and all classes of the people, ought to have a share in elections."—P. 247.

"The aristocracy of talent arrive at the House of Commons by means of the close boroughs, where they are nominated by Peers or Commoners, who have the property of these boroughs in their hands. In this manner the greater part of our distinguished statesmen have entered Parliament, and some of them would never have found admittance by any other way. The use of such members to the House itself and to the country is incalculable."—P. 253.

"In my mind, the greatest objection of all to the adoption of any broad general plan of Reform, is the danger it would bring with it to every other institution."—P. 261.

"By such means" (the disfranchising of boroughs proved to be corrupt) "the balance of the House of Commons might be thrown once more on the side of the people, without so violent a measure as declaring the privilege of the small boroughs to be forfeited."

"Upon the whole, the authority of our greatest statesmen seems to lean to a partial and not a general reform."

"We ought to have as good, and as strong, and as cogent reasons for disfranchising Old Sarum, as we had for expelling James II."—P. 266.

evil upon ourselves. It is bad economy which has not justice for its basis. His Majesty's Ministers, by the measures they had proposed, were exciting the violence of the violent; and urging men to further demands, and I tell his Majesty's Ministers, that the discontent in the country has been owing to a long series of legislative proceedings, which, by treading down the property of the productive classes, and sacrificing it to an abstract philosophy, are leading to results, the extent of which are not to be seen." The reply of Mr Thompson was no more than an amplification of the plausible falsehood, that cheapness to the consumer was the one paramount object to which all others ought to be sacrificed. It would take more space than can be bestowed upon it here, to demonstrate the error of this theory, and to examine what right we have to consider the "cheapness" of a commodity to be measured by its money price; but an appeal to experience will be a more brief, and to men of sense a more satisfactory, answer to Mr Thompson's position, than any theoretical argument. Are the trade and manufactures of this kingdom, and the general condition of the people, as prosperous now as when the greater part of the articles of consumption were from 50 to 100 per cent higher in price? Certainly they are not; for then employment was abundant in every department of industry, and wages were high. If, then, with the fall of prices to the consumer, we have fallen in prosperity, and our common people in comfort and happiness, of what avail is the argument for change, which consists only of an attempt to demonstrate that prices may be made to fall still lower by the sacrifice of the shipping interest, and the Canadian timber trade? Really the presumption of theorists, in the face of facts and the plainest experience, is more disgusting than words are able to express.

Mr Herries described the sudden change of the ministerial plan as a mere political trick, and proposed an enquiry by a Committee before such a proposition was agreed to. This proposal being declined by the Treasury Bench, the feeling of the House immediately became strong against them, and Mr Attwood moved the most decisive and contemptuous of all courses for their defeat, namely, to turn the chairman of the Committee (the debate was going on in a Committee of the whole House) out of the chair, and thus quash the whole proceeding ab initio. Strangers were ordered out, but a sharp debate continued with closed doors. Sir Robert Peel was roused into a vigorous attack on Ministers, and, upon the division, 236 members voted against them, and only 190 for them.

There are several observations of important application to another question, which may be derived from the result of this debate. First, Ministers were accused of blundering, of injustice, and of political trickery, and a large majority confirmed the accusations; yet such men claim to be intrusted with the altering of the constitution. Secondly, Upon a practical matter where experience could assist the judgment, these Ministers were convicted by a large majority of attempting a pernicious alteration in the guise of a theoretical improvement; yet they, whose wisdom is despised, and integrity questioned, upon the subject of a commercial regulation, are believed, and their skill confided in, to make the most astounding changes in the legislative government, founded upon abstract theory merely, and the practical results of which no man can fully calculate. Thirdly, It was seen that a complete union of all the divisions of the Tory party defeated the Ministry by a majority of 46; and, lastly, a spirited and direct resistance, without any delay or compromise, was found to be the most effectual that could be offered. This ought to have been, and should yet be a lesson. It is absurd to carry all the cautious habits which belong to Government, and Ministerial responsibility, into the business of an opposition—union, spirit, decision are the points to which it should look:—to yield, or to waver, is to lose all

It had been well if a right hon. gentleman we could name, had remembered and acted upon this piece of Homeric wisdom, on the night of the debate respecting the language of the Times Newspaper; but he chose to remember Hudibras instead, and, in a fit of lofty prudence, determined to take the advantage held out to him, "who fights and runs away."

But it is time to say something of that debate, and the language of the newspaper which led to it. Most people look at the Times occasionally, because it is well supplied with news and with advertisements. Those who look at its leading articles need not be told of its ordinary beastliness of style, and the way in which it bellows out lies, like a great big cockney brute, who talks big as he swaggers along in the open sunshine, half drunk with beer, after a gross dinner at one o'clock in the day; but certainly the Times has surpassed itself in falsehood and brutality since the provisions of the Reform bill have been laid before the public. Sir Robert Inglis, who, no doubt in vindication of his taste, stated to the House that he was no habitual reader of the paper, having been made acquainted with the series of gross libels on the House of Commons which it contained, provided himself with some of the recent numbers, and moved a resolution that their contents were false and scandalous libels, directly tending to deter members of the House from the discharge of their duty. Upon the first part of the proposition, containing the affirmation of the fact, no person in his calm senses could have a second opinion after hearing the extracts which were read in the House. It appeared that the polite and popular journal described the members of the House who opposed the Reform bill as "public enemies—usurpers of the people's franchises—cutpurses—robbers—plunderers—hired lackeys of public delinquents," and indulged in other terms of equal elegance and gentleness. It also imputed to them "the systematic conversion of the fruits of other men's industry to selfish or criminal uses;" and at the reading of this passage Mr O'Connell cheered. If a sense of the truth of what was said were the motive, one can perfectly understand why he should have cheered, and congratulate him on his candour; but taking the whole matter, as it applied to the House generally, it is melancholy to think that, after all this language had been formally complained of by one of its members, it should have been allowed to pass unpunished. We blush with shame to confess it, but the fact cannot be disguised, that the bullying of the Times and the press generally, seems not only to have the tendency described in the resolution of Sir Robert Inglis, but upon this question to have effected the object towards which such tendency inclined.

Mr Calcraft set up the little rag of character he had left, as a sail to enable him to make one more tack in his political course, and said that "he would say boldly that the press of this country must continue free, and therefore he was against the motion." He said "boldly!" He put himself foremost in a matter where the honour and dignity of the House of Commons was concerned! and such miserable trash too, as if the liberty of the press were to be upheld by aiding the publishers of brutal threats against the liberty of Parliament. Mr Baring said, "he would maintain, that, if the lower House of Parliament, as now constituted, or in the altered shape proposed by Lord John Russell, suffered itself to be insulted and trampled upon by the press, the liberty of discussion within the walls of the House must necessarily be infringed upon and shackled;" but then, as if afraid of the straight-forward plainness of this declaration, as if "scared at the sound himself had made," he added, that though the paragraphs which had been read went very far, and were perhaps extremely injudicious—so much so, that if they referred to another subject, it might be the bounden duty of the House to notice them—yet upon this subject he had no disposition to do any thing calculated to impede discussion out of doors. It is very hard to have common patience with this lame and impotent conclusion. When a gentleman is, in his public capacity as a Member of Parliament, called "robber," "cutpurse," "hired lackey," one who "intrudes into the House of Commons, and infests its proceedings," it is a somewhat singular moderation which leads him to describe the paragraphs where such libellous insults are found as "going very far," and being, "perhaps," (we particularly admire this "perhaps,") "extremely injudicious." Moreover, we are utterly at a loss to see how the punishment of gross abuse, which has not so much argument in it as commonly belongs to the scolding of fishwives at Billingsgate, should be in the least calculated to "impede discussion," either in or out of doors; but Mr Baring is a cautious man, and phrases himself upon seeing nice distinctions. Sir Francis Burdett made a speech upon this occasion, which abundantly proved that his quiescence of late years has been no more than a politic moderation; and now that there is something probably to be gained by returning to his old vomit, we find the fierce, coarse radicalism of the notorious baronet, no whit less than in times past, when there was more force and spirit in the leaders of the conservative body than there is now, and consequently the Westminster hero was sent to indulge his patriotic meditations in jail. At present he no doubt expects, and perhaps with reason, that he will be sent to the House of Peers, instead of to the King's Bench prison or the Tower.

The motion of Sir Robert Inglis having been negatived, the House proceeded to the debate on the second reading of the Reform bill, and Sir Richard Vyvyan rose to offer it his opposition. We would that there were more men like this in the House; for, with the assistance of a few such men, no good English cause could fail. He possesses sound sense, combined with high gentlemanly feeling—the spirit of a young man, without the rashness which sometimes accompanies it—firmness of purpose, without obstinacy of manner—and a forcible and fluent method of speaking, without the elaborateness, or professional air, which those whose oratory is the result of art without genius are so apt to exhibit. His speech was listened to with deep attention, only interrupted by cheers, which were particularly long and loud upon the announcement of his amendment, that the bill should be read that day six months. He stated, that he was aware he should not please his constituents by the course he was taking, and that upon no ground could the rejection of the measure be any personal benefit to him; but he thought the measure one so full of danger to the institutions of the kingdom, that, before God and his country, he felt bound in conscience to oppose it. He objected to the time as most inauspicious for a measure productive of such vital change, when the excitement and irritation were so great in our own agricultural districts—when foreign affairs were full of difficulty, uncertainty, and embarrassment, and Ireland in a state very far from one of composure. He did not deny that changes had been necessarily made in the constitution, nor would he contend that the constitution, as it stood, should go down from century to century, without any modification, or that Parliament had not the power to make any expedient changes, but he opposed the present bill, from his conviction of its revolutionary tendency, because so large an extension of the democratical power had never been suddenly made in any state, without causing revolution. He then adverted to the real causes of the discontent in the country, which vented itself in the outcry for Reform; and, dwelling on the unredressed evils of the monetary system, and the neglect of the common people which the House shewed, by denying the existence of distress when it was so severely felt, he contended that the practical evils which the people suffered, would not be mitigated by the proposed bill, and therefore its result would be disappointment and farther discontent. He next shewed what the probable practical results would be of this measure; and in this part of his argument he did not go beyond what the candid radicals themselves admit in conversation, though they do not yet venture to print so much. The first effort of such men as would obtain the preponderance in a Parliament elected on Lord John Russell's plan, would be to confiscate the property of the church. Then rents would be attacked, on the philosophical principles of Mr Mill, and other political economists; and next would follow the property of the fundholder. Such, and a thousand times worse, were the results which followed from the first change, under the name of reform, in the French legislature, in 1788; and the King, who gave his consent to these measures, was called "the patriot King," and Te Deum sung throughout all France, to celebrate his concessions to the people. "Is all this," asked Sir Richard Vyvyan, "nothing in the way of example?" Is it no lesson to those individuals who are now urging forward this measure? There could not be a monarch more popular than was at that time the French King, and yet that same monarch, within three short months after this date of his popularity, was forcibly brought back into Paris in his carriage, while the heads of two of his gens-d'armes, who had lost their lives in defence of their sovereign's liberty and person, were borne along, one on each side, by his savage captors, in triumph. Is there no warning in all this to those who advocate the present revolutionary measure?" These allusions to the circumstances of the French Revolution, and the parallel which they brought to the minds of every one who listened to the speaker, drew forth the loudest cheers from every part of the House, as did also several succeeding parts of the speech, which our limits will not permit us further to dwell upon. That which excited most attention, was his declaration, that he thought the great interests, and the places which had grown up in wealth and population since 1688, should have representatives in Parliament, though he was not for the disfranchisement of boroughs, and also the announcement of his intention, in case the second reading of the bill should be rejected, to move resolutions which would give an assurance to the country that the House was determined to strengthen the representation.

Upon the whole, no speech delivered during the debate on the Reform bill, gave so much, or deserved to give so much satisfaction; for, though other speeches brought forward arguments as good, and as well arranged and powerfully expressed against the bill, yet they wanted something of the high-minded fairness and candour of manner which belonged to Sir Richard Vyvyan's speech; and none but he evinced a business-like determination to take up a measure of rational reform in good earnest, if the dangerous and revolutionary measure proposed by the Ministry were thrown out. Mr Cartwright seconded his motion, and the notorious Mr Shiel rose to reply to him. It will not be supposed that we could wish to throw any slight upon borough members, merely as such; but really there was a something transcending common self-confidence, in a person of Mr Shiel's character, station, ability, and standing in the House, rising to put himself forward as the champion who was to answer such an English county member as Sir Richard Vyvyan. He (Shiel), who turned from the writing of bad bombastic plays, to the business of political agitation, which he carried on amongst the lowest of the low, appealing to their worst passions by the meanest, bitterest, most malignant vituperation, which a fancy fertile in virulence could suggest; he, the jester upon the agonies of the dying Duke of York; he, against whom a prosecution for sedition has commenced by the government; he, who, after the Emancipation bill was passed, talked sedition still, till bribed to silence by a silk gown; he, whom no portion of his own countrymen, that he boasted so much of having set free from bondage, would intrust with their confidence as a representative in Parliament; he, who appealed to the suffrages of the freeholders of the Catholic county of Louth, and was rejected; he, who might have sought to enter Parliament till doomsday, without success, unless some patron of a close borough sent him there by the power of his nomination; he, who, but three days before, had taken his seat for a place, where, if all the inhabitants in a body had met him and an ourang-outang walking together in the street, no man would have known which was Shiel.—He rose to answer and to ridicule Sir Richard Vyvyan, the member for Cornwall, and to descant on the abomination of boroughs—consistent, modest gentleman, that he is!

Mr Shiel is a person of remarkably mean diminutive appearance; his face flat and sallow, and his features insignificant. His voice in public speaking is a harsh scream, and his vehement gesture, like that of an infuriated monkey; yet is the man not destitute of a certain description of genius, and there is some appearance of it in his small, dark, fardarting eyes. He very nearly broke down in the House of Commons—for a few minutes it was doubtful whether his first speech would not be his last; but, at the critical moment, he hit upon one or two smart things, which took the ear of the House, and then he was permitted to scream away with that kind of brilliancy which the Shiel tribe can produce. He talked, for example, of the "fertility of Cornwall in legislators," and, in allusion to the report of some boroughs being made the subject of marriage settlements, spoke of the future possibility of a lady having "old Sarum for her dower, and Gatton for her pin-money." One may have seen worse things than these in a modern farce, and we wish to give the member for Milborne Port all due credit for them. Sir Robert Peel had the honour of being complimented by this speaker for having "nobly done his duty" on the Catholic question, while the thing which he had done was brought forward as an example against himself in the Reform argument. This was an appropriate Hibernian addition to a compliment, and must have rather neutralized its sweetness.

Mr Pendarves, the colleague of Sir R. Vyvyan, made a short speech in favour of the bill. Lord Villetort spoke against it. Mr C. Grant, the quality of whose speeches is as uncertain as that of some men's singing, spoke of a curse in favour of the bill, but not at all in happy mood. There was something very drowsy and commonplace in his remarks; but no foolishness;—he wondered at Sir R. Vyvyan for countenancing any degree of Reform; though all the political world but Charles Grant himself must have known that the honourable baronet was for an amendment of the representation of the people (properly so called) in the Commons House of Parliament; he complimented Sir Robert Peel on his reforming spirit; censured the Duke of Wellington; touched on foreign affairs; talked of "delay" as a thing which would "sow seeds that soon would spring up in an abundant crop," and then he sat down.

Mr William Bankes addressed the House against the bill, in a speech which was much applauded. It was remarkable for force, vivacity, and point, and convinced while it amused. The bill, he said, was admitted to be an experiment, but in one thing it was deficient of the characteristics of experiment, namely, the precaution of retaining power to remain in the same state in which we now were, or to return to it, if the experiment failed; but the experiment which they were then called upon to make admitted of no return. This is a very important view of the question. In other matters, if the Parliament should make an error, the same Parliament is there to rectify it; but in this, if an error be made, it is one which will only be discovered when the existence of the power which made it has terminated, and when there will be no means of redress.

Mr Slaney spoke in favour of the bill, and made much allusion to Mr Baring's speech, delivered many nights before. He asserted the absurd proposition, that those who voted against the second reading of the bill, must be opposed to all reform. Lord Norreys answered in the fitting way, by stating that the bill then before the House was gross deceit and delusion, but he would support the plan for substantial effectual reform, which Sir R. Vyvyan was pledged to bring forward. Mr V. Stuart made a strange and very foolish speech about the necessity he was under of voting against the second reading of the bill, though he would much rather vote for it. It is plain he knows nothing about the constitutional duty of a member of Parliament; he is elected to judge and act for his constituents, and he violates his duty, if, in obedience to their will, he votes against his own judgment. The Solicitor-General (Sir W. Horne) spoke like a Chancery lawyer in a heavy cause, and was very dull. Sir Edward Sugden replied, and was much less lawyer-like and more spirited than usual. He argued that mere Parliamentary Reform was not the object of those who clamoured for it, and entered into the details of the bill, to shew its evil tendency. He concluded his speech with a chastisement of Mr O'Connell, and a promise to bring the affair of that gentleman with the Irish government shortly before the House. This speech, though not one of the most attractive, either in delivery or in print, was considered to be one of the most practically effective which was made against the bill; Admiral Sotherton took the first opportunity the next evening of announcing his conversion to the side of the opponents of the bill, in consequence of it, which nettled Lord John Russell extremely. He said, the course pursued by the admiral was consistent neither with fairness nor justice; for which the noble lord was rebuked by a brother admiral, Sir J. Yorke, who insisted, that a more manly and straight-forward course than that of his gallant friend, it was impossible to pursue. After some skirmishing about the delay of the Irish Reform bill, the debate on the second reading of the English bill was resumed by Lord Mahon, in a speech of much earnestness and eloquence; he argued from example, that anomaly in theory was no proof of practical error or inconvenience; and, in reply to the argument deduced from the alleged cry of the people for Reform, he boldly declared that, if the voice of the country was loud, it was his Majesty's Ministers that had influenced it. If those Ministers had taken half the pains to allay and to quiet the public mind that they had taken to excite it, there would have been no cry for this measure. Sir John Shelley strongly opposed the bill, and stated, that if, in voting against it, he should give his last vote in that House, he should have the consolation of knowing that he had done his duty. Mr Cavendish, the member for Cambridge university, who so distinguished himself as a science-scholar, and from whom so much was expected in the senate, failed completely in his speech. He and all the members of the Devonshire family are in favour of the bill. Mr Gore spoke against the bill, and Captain Pophill said a few words in its favour. Mr W. Ward, the only one of the city of London members against the bill, spoke at some length. Alderman Thomson, who was of two or three different minds upon the subject within two or three weeks, has, for the present, settled down into a decided reformer. Mr Wyse talked of Blackstone—Locke—Revolution, and the History of England; he was in favour of the bill, but was not heard with such patience as usual. Sir R. Bateson was, although a reformer, against the measure; then followed two young lords, of whom the first, Lord Mountcharles, (not without a "con-si-de-ra-tion,") was in favour of the measure; and the next, Lord Castlereagh, against it. Mr Shaw followed also against the bill; and there was then a very clever speech from the Attorney-General, (Denman,) in reply to Sir E. Sugden's of the previous night. He was followed by Sir James Scarlett, to whom, whatever cloud may have, of late, fallen upon his public character, it is impossible to deny, in this instance, the highest credit for a manly straight-forward course, which he pursued even at the expense of his seat in Parliament. His speech, like most of those which he delivers, whether in or out of Parliament, was cleverly and closely reasoned, touching, with great tact and exactness, upon the most vulnerable points of the measure, both in a legal and practical view, and insisting, that if expediency were taken for a guide, so large a disfranchisement would not be attempted. As to energy of feeling, or force and eloquence of expression on this or any other subject, it seems not to belong to the nature of Sir James Scarlett. Sir T. Acland made a speech full of compliment to the Ministers, and of apology for his intention to vote against them; this is a half-and-half method of proceeding, which we think rather insipid, but his vote went the right way.

Lord John Russell then replied, and received the cheers of his party when he spoke exultingly of the French Revolution of last July, which he represented as the consequence of the opposition of Charles and his ministers to popular opinion, and endeavoured to cast an imputation on the anti-reformers, of holding views similar to theirs. By such sophistry are men deceived. Had Charles and his ministers only opposed popular opinion by such fair and constitutional means as the anti-reformists resort to, they had saved France and their own stations and fortunes. The principle of constant yielding to popular opinion is the weakest and most worthless that a government could dream of adopting; popular opinion must often be opposed, if the popular good be consulted; but it is no marvel that a weathercock, like Lord John Russell, should seek, in some such principle as this, an excuse for his own twistings and turnings.

At the conclusion of the noble lord's reply, there were more members in the House than had been ever known to be crowded together within its walls before—exhausted with waiting, and with impatience for the issue, they divided; when there were found in favour of the second reading of the bill 302—against it 301—leaving Ministers upon this mighty question with a majority of one man, or rather one Calcraft, which is perhaps a more cautiously correct method of expression. Of such a majority as this, upon so vitally important a question, it is difficult to speak with gravity. It is ridiculous to suppose that a preponderance of one, in an assembly of six hundred and three, should have the effect of overturning the legislative constitution which has existed for centuries. Such a majority on the other side, might be a reasonable justification for remaining as we are; but where mighty changes are proposed, which, if effected, must alter the character and circumstances of the whole nation, it is monstrous to suppose, that a single voice preponderating in the balance, should away the community to a course of experimenting upon the form of government under which they and their ancestors have lived. Again, had the majority been against government, it would, at least, have been certain that it was a majority of votes freely and fairly given; but in a house where there are so many paid servants of the crown, it is clear that a considerable number of votes are given as a part of the service of office, and therefore, it has hitherto been considered by every government, that any majority of a very small number, should be looked upon in the light of a defeat. Our present Ministry, however, are not sensitive; and whether in a minority of forty-six, or with a majority of one, hold fast to their places, undisturbed by the nice scruples of less enlightened periods.

The division in the Commons took place between three and four in the morning of the 23d of March, and in the evening an animated discussion took place in the House of Lords upon the subject of Reform, growing out of the presentation of petitions against it. Lord Grey, proud in his majority of one, was very peremptory and decisive in his tone. In reply to Lord Roden's observation, that "he was hostile to any revolutionary measure," the Premier, in his severe and haughty manner, answered, "I say on the contrary, that the bill offers the best means of putting a stop to all revolutionary tendency, and therefore, I am determined to support it." On the succeeding evening (the 24th), both Houses were occupied by the engrossing subject. In the Lords, the discussion arose upon the presentation of a petition from Down, which led to a speech from Lord Londonderry, and an answer from the Premier, in which he put forth the full force of his great ability as a Parliamentarian. It is impossible not to be strongly impressed by the clear, vigorous, and commanding tone of the noble earl's oratory; but it must be confessed, that in this speech, notwithstanding the complaint which he made, of others having used assertion in place of argument, he fell into the same fault himself, and was content with stating strongly what he would do, without condescending to prove that he would be right in so doing. The following passage, as a good example of his lordship's style, and for another reason, which a future time will develop, is worthy of particular note: "I have no objection to say that I consider myself completely committed by, and identified with, the measure, and by this measure I shall stand or fall. That in so complicated a scheme, formed upon such a large and extensive subject, something may not require to be altered, is certainly more than I can undertake to assert; but this I will say, that as far as depends upon me, I will suffer no alteration to be made that will detract from its efficiency. As an efficient measure, I will stand or fall by it; and without throwing out any threat of dissolution, I have no objection to say, that in order to support and carry into effect this measure, as an efficient measure, there are no means sanctioned by the principles and practice of the constitution, and by a devoted sense of public duty, from the employment of which I will shrink. The noble marquis has said, that he supposes I have too great a regard for my order, to desire to promote any revolutionary measure. I have supported, and will support that order, because I think that it is necessary to the preservation of the constitution that it should exist. I am by station, and still more by disposition and habit, a member of the aristocracy. But I support it as an order, only because it is a necessary order in the state—because it is a necessary link between the crown and the people—and because its existence contributes to the good of the community. Whenever the aristocracy ceases to be this, then I am no longer a member of the aristocracy; but while it continues to be this, and while its rights and privileges are conducive to the preservation of the rights and privileges of all, I repeat that I am ready to stand or fall with it."

This is no doubt a fine specimen of the bold proud language of a British Peer; but it may be well questioned, whether the same proud feeling which inspires such language, does not blind him to the danger of the course he is pursuing. With his lofty conception of his order, and the high idea of his own ability, which he not unjustly entertains, he feels no apprehension of the power which he is throwing into the hands of the democracy; but calmer experience looks with a more apprehensive eye upon his proceedings. The Duke of Wellington was wont to be called peremptory and despotic in his style;—let us take a passage from his speech also on this occasion, and compare it with the tone of the proud Earl Grey: "I beg your lordships to believe that I feel no interest in the question, excepting that which I have in common with every individual in the country.

I possess no influence or interest of the description which will be destroyed by the measures now proposed. I am an individual who has served his Majesty for now, I am sorry to say, nearly half a century. I have been in his Majesty's service for forty-five years:—for thirty eventful years of that period I have served his Majesty in situations of trust and confidence, in the command of his armies, in embassies, and in his councils; and the experience which I have acquired in the situations in which I have served his Majesty, enables me, and imposes upon me the duty to say, that I cannot look at this measure without the most serious apprehensions, that from the period of its adoption, we shall date the downfall of the constitution."

Here, indeed, is a testimony—a powerful and affecting testimony, to make the nation pause ere it plunges into the course to which Lord Grey pledges himself with such haughty confidence. If words of solemn warning from one, who, above all others, has a right to speak of his experience, be of any avail, this declaration of the Duke of Wellington ought to have, and we are persuaded it has had, a most powerful effect to confirm the minds of the respectable people of these kingdoms against the revolutionary reform of the King's Ministers.

In the House of Commons, the Reform bill for Ireland was brought in, which, after some discussion by the Irish members, led to a renewal of the debate on the general question. Very able speeches were made by Sir Charles Wetherell, Sir Henry Hardinge, the Lord Advocate, and Sir Robert Peel, of which we regret the limits of this article will not permit a sketch to be given. Sir Robert Peel's speech on this occasion, was considered to be almost, if not altogether, the best he ever made in the House.

In the House of Commons, on the evenings of the 25th and 28th, the presentation of petitions led to renewed discussions of the Reform measure, but no important speeches were delivered. On the latter evening, the question was brought on in the House of Lords by Lord Wharncliffe, in moving for population returns, and discussed at length. The debate was irregular and ill timed, but brought forth a great deal of ability of the first order. Giving Lord Wharncliffe all due credit for a speech in which he produced a whole host of powerful arguments against the Ministerial measure, we must say, that he suffered his desire to take the lead in this matter, to betray him into about as injudicious a course as he could possibly have adopted, if he was sincerely desirous that the bill should not succeed. There are some men who set such value upon a good speech, particularly if it be made by themselves, that they imagine their duty to their country is discharged by making a speech, whether in season or out of season, and whether in unison with others who hold similar views upon the question or not. Now there is no more pernicious mistake than this, and we do not in the least thank Lord Wharncliffe for having made a display, however marked by ability, in which it was but too plain that he had himself as much in view as the cause in which he spoke. It is not from detached talkers throwing in a speech at their own time, that we are to expect a successful opposition to the dangerous measure of the Ministry—it is from a united, well-arranged, well-timed effort of the whole body of the Opposition, and therefore a friend like Lord Wharncliffe is more a hindrance than a help. Moreover, we by no means admire the kind of candour which his lordship manifests, when he tells us the reason of being no longer the anti-reformer that he used to be. "I have always," he said, "been ready to fight the battle of anti-reform, while there was a party out of doors to back my exertions; and let not those who shrunk from the contest while there was a prospect of success, now come forward and complain that I and others, who fought the battle while there was any use in fighting it, have now ceased to engage in so hopeless a contest." If his lordship was an anti-reformer on principle, we cannot see how the want of a party out of doors should make him cease to be so; and if his exertions were not upon principle, what security is there that he may not be by the time next session arrives, a partisan of Lord John Russell's bill? So far, however, as a speech goes, Lord Wharncliffe deserves all the credit that can be awarded him—to give even an outline of it is impossible, for it was very long, but it is throughout pregnant with matter, and worthy of more than one perusal.

At the close of his speech, an attempt was made to stop the discussion as irregular, while the bill was pending in the other House; but the effort was unsuccessful, and the debate went on. Lord Durham replied to Lord Wharncliffe in a long speech, marked by the harshness and presumption which have ever distinguished his harangues. The atmosphere of the House of Peers has not been sufficient to imbue his spirit with the amenity which is more looked for in that region than in the Lower House, where, as Mr Lambton, he was in the habit of offending by his superciliousness.

We are disposed to speak of the Duke of Richmond more in sorrow than in anger, yet it was something too much to hear him endeavouring to make little of Sir Charles Wetherell, and to defend his own consistency. In common prudence, the less he says about consistency the better.

Lord Plunkett did all that first-rate ability as a logician and an orator could do, in support of the Ministerial measure, thereby balancing the account which had the Chancellorship of Ireland on the debtor side. His lordship seldom exerts himself without a substantial motive, but no one can more effectually repay by his services any matter of favour which may have been bestowed upon him, or which may be in prospect. What can be better than this? "Surely the noble lord, who I know was warmly attached to Mr Canning, was as much opposed to Reform at one time as that gentleman was. But we are not to be terrified by the shadows which are reflected from the tombs of great men. We are called upon to consider the nature of the question before us now, without reference to what might have been the opinions of those who are not in existence to speak for themselves."

Lord Chancellor Brougham followed, in a speech full of misrepresentation and transcendent

For the first time he met as a colleague, in the House of Lords, his great rival in the Lower House in former days, Lord Plunkett; and while he bestowed upon him the most flattering compliments, he seemed desirous to shew that he was still a match for him in the noble art of eloquence. The whole of his speech, but particularly the passionate description of injustice, its progress, and its effects, was worthy of the best days of the eloquence of the British senate.

After the chancellor arose the Duke of Wellington, and made the best speech he ever made in his life — so clear—so forcible—so immediately applicable to practical matters, that we wonder how any one could possibly have listened, and not have been convinced by it. The view which he seemed principally to wish to impress upon the House was, that if a Parliament were constructed on the new plan, it would be too strong for the Government, that the Government, in short, would be in the House of Commons, and be taken away from its constitutional seat. Lord Grey made a very long speech in reply, but we cannot afford room now to follow him, and will conclude with the admirably simple and energetic conclusion of the Duke of Wellington's address. "I am sorry to differ on this subject from so many of my friends, but having a strong opinion on it, and feeling no desire for any thing but the interests of the country, and to make myself useful to the country in any way I can, there is no reason why I should conceal my views, or why I should not speak openly what I think. I wish to God I could convince the noble earl [Grey] of his error. I believe the noble earl is acting with good intentions, but that he has fallen into a great error on this subject; for it is my full conviction, from all I know of the condition of this and other countries, and all the examination I have been able to give the proposed plan, that if carried into effect in its present shape, it will place the interests of this country in the greatest possible peril."

The reassembling of Parliament after the Easter recess brought Lord John Russell again before the House, with a notice of a very material alteration of the intention of Ministers with regard to the measure of legislative revolution with which they are pleased to visit the people of the British empire.

As the intimation was given with all the hesitation and obscurity which may belong either to a politic reserve or to actual instability of purpose, it is difficult to form a decisive opinion either of the new motives or the new intentions of the Ministry; but this much at least is evident, that their vaunted determination is altogether false and hollow, and that they have been forced to feel the rashness of the headlong measure which they ventured to propose. Lord John Russell said, that "Ministers had not altered their minds on the subject of the number of representatives, but that, if it should appear to the sense of the House that the whole number of 658 members should be retained, the Government would not feel that they were altering a vital or essential part of the measure by agreeing to that proposition." It is not worth while to split hairs upon the question of what are strictly the principles, and what the details of the bill. It is now understood that the numerical amount of the House will not be interfered with; but whether or no, the lovers of the principles of our mixed constitution should, less or more, approve the measure on that account, depends entirely on the way in which the members to be added to the number lately contemplated by the Ministers, would be distributed.

If it be attempted to give them to the democracy, the measure will be worse than it was before—if to the property and intelligence of the country, it will be less bad. But we have no inclination to trust any measure of reform to the tinkering of the present Ministry—they have shewn a disposition to accomplish revolution if they could, and it is not because they are found to be less able than they calculated upon, that we will take from their hands a patched and mended Reform bill, in place of our present constitution. Such Reform as may be fitting for the time, we must have from abler, more prudent, and more trustworthy hands: and we share in the country's expectation, that ere long such hands will undertake the task. It would be idle, however, to seek to disguise the fact, that for the present the large body of the friends of conservative principles feel disappointed of that unanimous and active spirit on the part of their political friends, which the urgency of the occasion seems to demand. The time has gone by when it would be safe to leave the dangerous projects of rash or interested innovations to perish through the working of their own inherent evil. A persevering spirit is abroad in the cause of revolution—a union of bad means for bad purposes, is in all directions agitating the country and disseminating principles adverse to peace, order, security, and happiness. How can men, whose united exertion would certainly save the country from the perils which threaten it, justify themselves to their own consciences for holding back, or for suffering lighter matters to occupy them at such a time? If the call of friends will not arouse them, how long do they think their enemies will suffer them to enjoy this indolent composure? The wholesale spoiler is advancing—where do they think he will stop, or how do they suppose he is to be checked? He terrifies the weak by threats, he seduces the wavering by misrepresentation, while the spirit of those who could and would effectually resist him, is suffered to perish away, unencouraged, unaided, by those whose interest and whose natural duty it is to bestir themselves, to unite together and to lead the way boldly, manfully, and unanimously, in the cause of the time-honoured constitution of Great Britain. We expect that this apathy—this inactivity, will not continue, and that some sure and certain hope will soon appear, for the body of the people, yet untainted by revolutionary principles, to rest upon. So far as the Reform bill has gone in the House of Commons, it is plain that the union of its opponents is only against that measure, not in favour of any other. But it is not in Parliament alone, that we look for more unanimity, more spirit, more condensation of political force. They should be found operating everywhere that the public voice can be heard, or the public press can penetrate. Let but the good principles of the people be appealed to with as much energy, zeal, and industry, as has been used to pander to their prejudices and to inflame their passions, and the salutary effect would soon be found in the Sayings and Doings of Parliament.

London, April 13.

ON PARLIAMENTARY REFORM AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

No. V.

"AMIDST the turbulence and disorders of faction," says Adam Smith, "a certain spirit of system is apt to mix itself with that public spirit which is founded upon the love of humanity. The leaders of the discontented party seldom fail to hold out some plausible plan of reformation, which they pretend will not only remove the inconveniencies, and relieve the distresses immediately complained of, but will prevent, in all time coming, any return of the like inconveniencies and distresses. They often propose, on this account, to remodel the constitution, and to alter, in some of its most essential parts, that system of government under which the subjects of a great empire have enjoyed perhaps peace, security, and even glory, during the course of several centuries together. The great body of the people are commonly intoxicated with the imaginary beauty of this ideal system, of which they have no experience; but which has been represented to them in all the most dazzling colours in which the eloquence of their leaders could paint it. These leaders themselves, though they originally may have meant nothing but their own aggrandizement, become, many of them, in time, the dupes of their own sophistry, and are as eager for this great reformation as the weakest and foolishlest of their followers. Even though the leaders should have preserved their own heads, as indeed they commonly do, free from this fanaticism, yet they dare not always disappoint the expectation of their followers, but are often obliged, though contrary to their principle and their conscience, to act as if they were under the common delusion. The violence of the party, by refusing all palliation, all temperaments, all reasonable accommodations, by requiring too much, frequently obtains nothing; and those inconveniencies and distresses which, with a little moderation, might in a great measure have been removed and relieved, are left altogether without a remedy."*

One would have imagined that this illustrious philosopher was here portraying the history of the present Reform Bill, instead of calmly reflecting on the effects of public folly in former times; so exactly do its consequences coincide in all ages and parts of the world.

When we last discussed this question, we conceived that the danger was as yet remote; and it was rather the ultimate consequences of the movement of which it formed the commencement, than its immediate effects, which was the object of apprehension. But the case is very different since the Reform Bill has made its appearance. The evils which we then contemplated as remote, are now staring us in the face; a new constitution is proposed for the British empire; and at the very time that other nations are suffering under the evils of rapid changes of government, we are preparing to follow their bad example.

The disfranchisement of boroughs sending 168 members to Parliament; in other words, the almost total destruction of the influence of the aristocracy in the House of Commons; the reduction of 63 members from England; the transference of the right of returning 70 new members to boroughs hitherto not represented, and almost all in the manufacturing interest; the extension of the right of voting everywhere to the L10 householders; constitute the principal features of a constitution bearing less resemblance to the British, than to the visionary fabric of the National Assembly.

No such alteration has been projected since the Norman Conquest—a change greater than was contemplated by Vane, Pym, or the republicans of the Long Parliament; an innovation from which Lord Somers and the authors of the Revolution in 1688 would have shrunk with apprehension, is seriously brought forward at a time when no practical domestic grievance calls for its adoption, and every thing in external affairs forbids its being made the subject of agitation. We do not say that Government intend to bring about a revolution; we only assert a fact, which is undeniable as to the magnitude of the innovations which they have proposed.

* Moral Sentiments, li. 96, 98.

In all these great changes, the close boroughs were retained as a constituent and essential part of the constitution. When the Petition of Right was framed, which practically amounted to a revolution; when the Long Parliament made open war against Charles I.; when the race of the Stewarts was finally expelled by an unanimous effort of all classes, no similar invasion of private right, no such reconstruction of the Government, was attempted. These great innovators left the representation of the country untouched, well knowing, that to disturb its proportions was to destroy the equilibrium in a way which could never be restored. Erroneous measures of finance may be departed from; oppressive laws may be altered; injurious commercial systems abandoned; but a great concession once made to the popular part of the representation, and there is no retracing our steps. The ground once lost will never be regained; the power relinquished will be seized by reckless and tenacious hands; we are launched upon an unknown sea, from which there is no return.

When the French, in consequence of the successful revolt in July, established, in Lafayette's words, "a throne surrounded by republican institutions;" when the principles of French republicanism, long smothered, again burst forth, and framed a constitution suited to the utmost verge of modern democracy; the greatest length which the framers of the new constitution deemed it safe to go, was to concede the elective franchise to 220,000 persons in all France. They had had, under the constituent and legislative assemblies, full experience of the evils of an extension of the right of voting to a more numerous and inferior class, and well knew, that under the name of freedom, it in truth establishes the worst kind of tyranny.

By the proposed new constitution, the elective franchise is to be extended in this country to 1,000,000 voters; one half of whom are to receive this privilege now for the first time. The population of France is 30,000,000,—that of the British empire 22,000,000,—France, therefore, receives one voter in every one hundred and forty souls; Great Britain one in every twenty-two. In other words, the new constitution of Great Britain is to be about seven times as popular as the new constitution of France.

Republican France deems it only safe to lower the elective franchise to a person paying two hundred and fifty francs, or about £10, of direct taxes. Monarchical England lowers the qualification to a £10 householder, most of whom do not pay 5s. in the year of direct taxes. Ten pounds a-year of direct taxes in France is equivalent, from the difference in the value of money in the two countries, to about £15 in this country; and a man who here pays £15 a-year in direct taxes, is certainly, at an average, worth £300 a-year. The general income of £10 householders probably will not exceed £60. The French system, therefore, lowers the right of voting to a minimum of £300 a-year; the English to a minimum of £60. In other words, in this view the new constitution of England is to be five times more democratic than that of France.

Considered with reference, to the population, therefore, and the national wealth combined, the new constitution of Britain is to be six times more democratic than that of France.

Is France, under the influence of the present régime, a monarchy or a republic? Confessedly the King has but the shadow of authority; the whole power of the state is vested in the National Guard, the army, and the mob of Paris: a new revolution is daily looked for by all classes in the capital. This is the state of things there, even before the new and more democratic constitution of July has come into full operation. If such be the effects of popular sovereignty in that country, what may be anticipated here with a body of electors seven times as numerous, with reference to the population, and with only a fifth of the income, with reference to the public wealth!

There are in England and Wales fifty-two counties, returning one hundred and four members, and by the new constitution there are to be in the United Parliament about four hundred and thirty English members. The new county members are to be fifty-four, therefore there will be one hundred and fifty-eight county members, and two hundred and seventy-two for boroughs. In other words, the borough members will be to the county not quite as two to one.

In Scotland there are to be twenty-eight county members, and twenty-two for boroughs.

In Ireland there are to be one hundred and three members, of whom sixty-two are for counties and forty-one for boroughs.

Thus in the Imperial Parliament there will be, upon the whole, three hundred and thirty-five members for boroughs, and only two hundred and forty-five for counties;—that is, the borough members will be to the county as three to two nearly.

Under the present constitution this numerous class of borough seats represent the whole intelligence and wealth of the empire which is not engrossed by the county representation. All the ablest statesmen who have sat in Parliament for the last half century have obtained their places through these boroughs. "The use of such members," says Lord John Russell, "is incalculable."*

The important and weighty interests of the East and West Indies, of Canada, of the shipping interest, of foreign commerce, are thus enabled to obtain a due representation in the Legislature; and an immense empire of 120,000,000 of inhabitants, embracing all the quarters of the globe, held together under a legislature placed in a little island in the German Ocean.

Who are to be the principal electors under the new system? The L.10 householders over the whole island; in other words, the most democratic, and at the same time the most venal class in existence.

Persons of this class, whose income varies from L.50 to L.60 a-year, are, of all others, those who, in periods of tranquillity, are most accessible to corruption. Mr Hunt, who professes himself the representative of that class, has made this declaration in the House of Commons, which coincides with universal experience; and added, that so strongly is he impressed with this truth, that rather than have the new constitution without the ballot, he would go on with the House of Commons constituted as it at present is. He supports the Reform Bill, being well assured that if it passes, the vote by ballot, and all that the radicals wish, will speedily follow.

Small boroughs, containing four or five thousand inhabitants, are, of all others, the most easily bribed, because they are too large to be entirely under the dominion of the proprietor, and too small to be beyond the reach of external wealth. They are the places where men of fortune strive to outbid each other by the promise of a large gratuity to each elector. It is unnecessary to refer to examples of so well-known a fact. Every man's experience must furnish him with instances of its application. Lord John Russell's bill may be entitled "A Bill for the extinction of the close, and the increase of the venal boroughs."

In other words, it is a bill to close the avenues which admitted the greatest statesmen of whom England can boast, "which afforded an entrance," in Mr Shiel's words, "to the dignified energy of Chatham, the splendid oratory of Pitt, the impassioned eloquence of Fox, the learned humanity of Romilly, the philosophic wisdom of Mackintosh, the gifted energy of Burke, the grasping intellect of Brougham;" which still furnishes a safe and secure channel of representation to all the great interests of the empire, without going through the disgraceful and demoralizing process of actual bribery, in order to augment boroughs, which, closed against all these interests, unless when supported by gold, are open only to the seduction of democratic ambition, or the stream of polluted corruption.

This would be the state of matters during ordinary and pacific times; but what would be its operation in periods of excitement? during those periods of periodic recurrence, when the lower orders, pressed by scarcity, or thrown out of employment, are naturally disposed to turbulence, and when the democratic press, ever following in the rear of distress, like vultures on the skirts of a destroying army, stimulate, for their own base purposes, the passions which suffering has produced? Nothing can be clearer than that, in such periods, the great majority of the borough members would be returned in the radical interest, and thus the great barrier erected by the constitution against the inroads of democracy, would be converted into the rampart of the revolutionary party. In vain would the county members struggle against the successive inroads of democratic ambition during such periods of excitement; stimulated by the revolutionary press, urged by suffering and insane constituents, the tribunes of the people, sent forward by the boroughs, would successively abolish the corn laws, the church, the funds, and every interest which promised the prospect of spoliation in this great and complicated empire. In making this prophecy, we are not indulging in unauthorized speculation; we are only supposing that the causes, when brought into operation in this country, would produce the same effects as they have already produced during the French Revolution.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland has asked on what principle the conservative party can express apprehensions of the extension of the right of voting to L.10 householders, when they bewail in such piteous terms the disfranchisement of the potwallopers in the popular burghs? He must have had a low opinion of the intelligence of his audience, when he could broach such an argument. Is there no difference between ten radical members and two hundred? between Middlesex, Southwark, Preston, and a few similar places, returning radical representatives, and a hundred boroughs making such a return? The opponents of reform make no objection to a proportion of radical members in the House of Commons; on the contrary, their principle is, that they should be there, because the radicals, like every other interest in the state, should be fairly represented in Parliament. What they object to is, that the constitution should be so altered as to give them a majority. Mr Hume, Mr O'Connell, and Mr Hunt, form a valuable part of the House: but what would be the effect of an hundred Hunts, an hundred O'Connells, and an hundred Humes?

This consideration points to the fundamental and irremediable defect of the proposed constitution, that it votes an overwhelming majority in the populace of these islands, to the exclusion of all the other great and weighty interests of the British empire. By vesting the right of returning members to Parliament in forty shilling, and ultimately L.10 freeholders in the county, and L.10 householders in towns, the command of the legislature would be placed in hands utterly inaccessible, save by actual bribery, to the approach of the commercial, colonial, or shipping interests. If such a change did not soon produce a revolution, it would infallibly lead to the dismemberment of the empire. The East Indian and Canadian dependencies would not long submit to the rule of the populace in the dominant island, indifferent to their interests, ignorant of their circumstances, careless of their welfare. What do the L.1st householders of the English borough either know or care about the colonial dependencies of the empire? A radical in their neighbourhood who would promise them relief from taxes, poor-rates, tythes, and corv<sup>ee</sup> laws, would carry the day against the remote or colonial interests of the world.

This evil is inherent in all plans of uniform representation, and must to the end of time render it unfit for the legislature of a great and varied empire. Being based mainly upon one class of society, it contains no provision for the interests of the other classes: and still less for the welfare of the remote but important parts of the empire. The great majority of electors being the possessors ors of houses rented from L.10 to L.20 a-year, that is, possessed of an income from L.60 to L.120 per annum, the representatives will be persons inclined to support their local and immediate interests. The remote possessions of the empire can have no influence on such men, save by the corrupted channel of actual bribery. The most valuable feature of the British constitution, that of affording an inlet through the close boroughs to all the great and varied interests of the empire, will be destroyed. The Reform Bill in this view may be entitled, "a bill for disfranchising the colonial, commercial, and shipping interests, and for investing the exclusive right of returning members to Parliament in the populace of Great Britain and Ireland."

The radical papers have pointed with exultation to the division on the second reading of the reform bill, which shewed 209 members for boroughs, voting against the bill, and 108 for it. It is not surprising that the division stood as it did. These members were the representatives not only of the boroughs, but of the interests, which were threatened with disfranchisement. Not the borough-managers, but the borough-purchasers, found themselves on the verge of destruction. And who are the borough-purchasers? The great merchants and bankers of London: the manufacturers of Lancashire, the shipping owners of Hull, Bristol, and all the principal harbours: the West India proprietors, the Canadian merchants, the East Indian judges, commanders, and civil servants. The fact of their having combined to resist the bill, is the strongest proof of its dangerous nature; of its obvious tendency to close the avenues by which all these great interests have secured their place in the legislature, and to vest an overwhelming preponderance in Parliament in the representatives of the lower orders in Britain.

This is precisely the rock on which the republics of the world have hitherto split: the fatal vesting of preponderating power in the populace of a limited district, to the exclusion of all the other parts of the empire. Athens, Carthage, Sparta, Venice, Florence, Genoa, Milan, have all been ruined by the same cause: the exclusive enjoyment of legislative power by the lower orders, in a particular city or district, without any representation of the other interests of the empire; the necessary consequence of which was, that on the first reverse, they all revolted against the parent state, and it speedily found itself reduced to its own resources.

With a magnanimity, on the other hand, as extraordinary as it was unexampled, the Romans, from the first foundation of the republic, admitted the conquered or allied states to a participation of the privileges of Roman citizens. They received in return the empire of the world. But for the virtual representation of the British dependencies, through the medium of the close boroughs, the British empire would long ago have been destroyed. That representation which Roman wisdom gave to the conquered provinces and colonial dependencies, fortune, or rather the providence of God, has given to the far more extensive and scattered dependencies of this vast empire over all the world, by means of the gateway which is now to be closed for ever. America was lost by refusing it a direct voice in the legislature: the other colonies have only been preserved by the unobtrusive but spacious channel which admitted their representatives to the British Parliament. Nominally professing to extend, this bill is really destined to contract, the representation, to base the legislature, not upon the empire, but the island: and in lieu of the collected voice of British prosperity from every part of the world, render it the organ of democratic ambition in the populace of the heart of the empire.

It is not surprising that the close boroughs have been the avenue by which the talent, as well as the wealth of the empire, have been represented in all former ages. Great men never have, and never will submit to the degradation of mendicating votes from a venal rabble. Mr Canning never would have done so in the earlier part of his career, or before his contest at Liverpool had become the arena for contending faction through the empire. "In turbis et discordiis," says Sallust, "persumo cuique plurima vis.—"Through all the discord of faction," says Thucydides, "I have uniformly observed, that the worst, the most dissolute, and dangerous men, were the idols of the populace; and invariably prevailed over men of rational or virtuous dispositions."—"Enfin, je vois," said Danton, when about to be led to the scaffold, "que dans les Révolutions l'autorité toujours reste aux plus scélérats."* The same bitter truth was extorted from the witnesses of Grecian, Roman, and French democracy, in three distant ages of the world.

The other hemisphere forms no exception to the principle. Talent seldom seeks the American Congress. Men of honourable and upright dispositions disdain the servile adulation to popular sovereignty required of their representatives; and so low is the situation of a Member of the Legislature fallen in public estimation, that it has become a separate profession, forming an outlet to superfluous barristers and attorneys, who are paid a regular salary of seven dollars a-day, to defray their expenses during the sitting of Congress.

Could we suppose that men of great and powerful minds would submit to the degradation of becoming Members of Parliament for populous places, under such a system, the time of the representative would be so completely absorbed by attending to the demands and correspondence of his constituents, as to render him incapable either of the study requisite to form a great statesman, or of the attention necessary to master all the multifarious objects which are presented to the consideration of the British Legislature. Twenty years previous study—unbroken leisure at the moment—a mind unharassed by minute considerations, are indispensable to an accomplished orator and statesman. The close boroughs have hitherto both admitted such men, and afforded them the leisure requisite to train their minds, and discharge their duties. The representatives of populous places know whether their constituents afford them such leisure as is requisite for these purposes.

It is accordingly extremely well worthy of observation, how rapidly the character of the French legislature degenerated in proportion to the extension of the number of the electors; and what a deplorable ascendancy democratic violence, and intemperate character, soon acquired over virtue, wisdom, or humanity. In the Constituent Assembly, chosen under the monarchical régime, was found a great mass of talent, more benevolence of intention, and splendour of eloquence, than perhaps ever was collected in one assembly since the beginning of the world. In the Legislative Assembly, chosen by the suffrage of every man in France, who was not a minor or a pauper, and worth the produce of three days labour, the diminution of talent and increase of violence was most apparent. Lastly came the Convention, chosen after the 10th August, under republican institutions; and there Virtue, Genius, Eloquence, and Humanity rapidly fell beneath the incessant attacks of democratic ambition. Danton triumphed over Vergniaud and Roland—Robespierre over Danton—and the Reign of Blood terminated the career of visionary improvement.

It is another deplorable effect of a considerable accession of popular representatives to the House of Commons, that it would infallibly lower the standard of sense, and elevate the standard of popular flattery in that important branch of the legislature. When several demagogues are incessantly trumpeting forth the majesty, purity, and worth of the people—when the Press, adapting itself to the taste of the great body of its readers, is following the same base course of popular adulation,—no member who depends on popular constituents will dare to hold the language of truth on any question which excites the public mind. If he does, he will infallibly lose his seat on the next election. None will be returned but those who promise submission to the public voice, and barely sacrifice their principles and independence at the altar of popular adulation.

We cannot express the dangers of such a state of the representation, than in the words of an article, from the pen, we believe, of Lord Brougham, which appeared twenty years ago, in the Edinburgh Review. "There was in France at the time of the meeting of the States General, no legitimate, wholesome, or real aristocracy. The persons, such as deputies to the Assembly, were those chiefly who by intrigue and boldness, and by professions of uncommon zeal, for what were then the great objects of popular pursuit, had been enabled to carry the votes of the electors. A notion of talent, and an opinion that they would be loud and vehement in supporting those requests upon which the people had already come to a decision, were their passports into that Assembly. They were sent there to express the particular spirit of the people—they were not then hereditary patrons, but the hired advocates for a particular pleading,—they had no general trust or authority over them, but were chosen as their special messengers, out of a multitude whose influence and pretensions were equally powerful. In this way, instead of the great basis of rank and property, which cannot be transferred by the clamours of the factions, or the caprices of the inconstant, and which serve to ballast and steady the vessel of the state, in all its wanderings and disasters, the Assembly possessed only the basis of talent or reputation. The whole Legislature may be considered therefore as composed of adventurers, who had already obtained a situation incalculably above their original pretensions, and were now tempted to push their fortunes by every means that held out the promise of immediate success. They had nothing, comparatively speaking, to lose, but their places in that Assembly, or the influence which they possessed within its walls; and as the authority of the Assembly itself depended altogether on the popularity of its measures, and not upon the intrinsic authority of its members, so it was only to be maintained by a succession of imposing resolutions, and by satisfying or out-doing the extravagant wishes and expectations of the most extravagant and sanguine populace that ever existed. For a man to get a lead in such an Assembly, it was by no means necessary that he should previously have possessed any influence or authority in the community, that he should be connected with powerful families, or supported by opulent and extensive associations; it was only necessary that he could obtain the acclamations of the mob of Versailles, and make himself familiar to the eyes and ears of the galleries of the Assembly. The prize was too tempting not to invite a multitude of competitors, and the Assembly, for many months, was governed by those who outvied their associates in the impracticable extravagance of their patriotism, and sacrificed most profusely the real interests of the people at the shrine of a precarious popularity.

"More popularity at first was the instrument by which this unsteady Legislature was governed; but when it became apparent that whoever could obtain the direction or command of it, must possess the whole authority of the state, parties soon found out that violence and terror were infinitely more effectual and expeditious than persuasion and eloquence. Encouraged by this situation of affairs, the most daring, unprincipled, and profligate, proceeded to seize upon the defenceless legislators, and, driving all their opponents before them by violence and intimidation, entered without opposition upon the supreme functions of government. The disposal of the legislature thus became a prize to be fought for in the clubs and conspiracies of a corrupted metropolis, and the institution of a national representation had no other effect than that of laying the government open to lawless force and flagitious audacity.

"It is in this manner, it appears to us, that from the want of a natural and efficient aristocracy, to exercise the functions of hereditary legislators, the National Assembly of France was betrayed into extravagance, and fell a prey to faction; that the institution itself became a source of public misery and disorder, and converted a civilized monarchy first into a

sanguinary democracy, and then into a military despotism." *

Such were the cool and dispassionate sentiments of Lord Brougham and Lord Advocate Jeffrey upon the causes which destroyed the French Constituent Assembly.

The errors of the French reformers are thus pointed out by the same powerful pen:—"The parade which they made of their popularity, the support which they submitted to receive from the menaces and acclamations of the mob—the joy they testified at the desertion of the royal armies, were so many preparations for actual hostility, by which all prospects of establishing an equitable government were finally cut off. They relied openly upon the strength of their adherents among the populace. If they did not actually encourage them to threats and acts of violence, they availed themselves of those which were committed to intimidate and depress their opponents. This was the inauspicious commencement of the sons and the sufferings of the Revolution. The multitude, once allowed to overawe the old government with threats, soon subjected the new government to the same degradation. Reason and philosophy were discarded, and mere terror and brute force harassed the mis-aided nation, till, by a natural consummation, they fell under a successful military usurper."†

As a contrast to the French Assembly, Lord Brougham powerfully and triumphantly quotes the old British constitution:—"No representative legislature can be secure, unless it contain within itself a large portion of those who form the natural aristocracy of the country, and are able, as individuals, to influence the conduct and opinions of the greater part of its inhabitants. In England, the House of Commons is made up of the individuals who, by birth, fortune, or talents, possess singly the greatest influence over the rest of the people. The most certain and permanent influence is that of rank and fortune, and these are the qualifications, accordingly, which return the greatest number of members. Men submit to be governed by those to whose will; as individuals, the greatest part of them have been accustomed to submit; and an act of Parliament is revered and obeyed, not so much because the people are impressed with a constitutional veneration for the thing called Parliament, but because it has been passed by those who are recognised as their natural superiors, and by whose influence, as individuals, the same measures might have been enforced over the greater part of the kingdom. The Long Parliament, after it was purged by the Independents, enjoyed all the form of power that had belonged to their predecessors; but as they no longer contained those individuals who were able to sway and influence the body of the people, they speedily lost all their authority over the multitude. Where the conditions on which we have insisted are wanting, the sudden institution of a representative legislature, will only be the prelude to the most frightful disorders."‡

We hold these observations of Lord Brougham's to be perfectly unanswerable; and we bring them forward not from any puerile and contemptible desire of pointing out inconsistency in so able a man, but as the strongest proof of the rapid progress of democratic opinions, during periods of excitement, and the necessity which the most powerful minds are under of bending to the force of that current which they have originally been chiefly instrumental in putting in motion. Borne forward upon the wave of popular ambition, the authors of the present bill are carried so far beyond their dispassionate opinion on a similar crisis in another state, that they have literally adopted the very measure which they condemned so vehemently in the French reformers, and set themselves to destroy that very aristocratic influence on which they had so well shewn the proud superiority of the British legislature was founded.

Do they maintain, on the other hand, that the influence of the aristocracy will not be destroyed under the new constitution—that property will still maintain its just sway over the majority of the electors?—the an-answer is to be found in the words of the noble mover of the present bill. "It is quite certain," says Lord John Russell, "that if members are to be returned entirely, or even chiefly, by the yeomanry of the country, no man will be able to stand up before them who is not known to them by harangue, and pledged to support whatever they choose to impose. The aristocracy thus will entirely lose their influence, or be reduced to the necessity, to preserve their popularity, of becoming demagogues. Either of which alternative is infinitely to be dreaded."*

Now, who are to be the electors under the new constitution? Every householder paying rent to the amount of L.10 a-year—every tenant paying rent to the amount of L.20 a-year—every copyholder having property worth L.10 a-year—every 40s., and ultimately, every L.10 freeholder. Can any man, acquainted with the state of the middling ranks, doubt what description of persons will thus have the majority? The copyholders may be harmless enough; but the introduction of the L.10 householder, is a complete change in the constitution, which is thenceforward placed on the most democratic basis. The tenants of such houses, it is always to be remembered, are seldom, if ever, possessed of any property. They are shopkeepers, journeymen operatives, or labourers of the better sort, a step above the day-labourer, but that is all. Liverpool, it is said, will produce 25,000 voters—Manchester, 20,000—Edinburgh and Glasgow will certainly have at least 10,000 each. The influence of the landed proprietors in the counties, will be generally merged in the votes of the shopkeepers and tenants in the villages and small towns in England, and in the feuars and shopkeepers in Scotland. This is precisely the class which, in every age and quarter of the world, have been found to be most democratical; and certainly their temper at present, and the tone of the revolutionary press, which they daily peruse, gives no reason to suppose that they will form any exception to the rule.

Let not the landed interest imagine that they will be protected by the fifty-four additional members who are to be given for the counties. Nominally returned by the country, the great proportion of these members will be really brought in by the L.10 householders in the small towns—the numbers of that class will render them omnipotent. Of the whole population of Great Britain, two-thirds are employed in trade and manufactures, and only one-third in agriculture. This vital fact must be constantly kept in view, in all calculations upon the probable effect of the new system. Of the L.10 householders, or freeholders, therefore, two-thirds will be found in the manufacturing or trading classes. The landed interest, even in the counties, will find it utterly vain to struggle against such a numerical superiority. Lord Brougham has said in the House of Lords, that the squires of Yorkshire were against him, but he canvassed the freeholders in the small towns, and soon convinced them that he had the superiority. If this was the case even under the old constitution, what will it be when all the L.10 householders are let in?

But, in fact, the division on the Reform Question itself affords decisive evidence of what may be looked for in the first Reformed Parliament. The Radical papers have made the following summary of the composition of the votes on that vital innovation on the constitution:—

Voted for the Bill, and paired off.

County Members.

	For the Bill.	Against it.
England,	57	31
Ireland,	39	23
Scotland,	7	14

This table the Reformers consider as decisive in favour of the Bill. To us it appears decisive against it. It certainly affords materials for the most profound meditation.

It here appears that the English and Irish county members in favour of the bill were nearly double of those against it; and that the equality was restored by the Scotch county members and the borough members over the empire, who were nearly two to one against it. This last body is precisely the interest in the House which is to be destroyed. That is to say, when in the legislature, as already constituted, the aristocratic and democratic parties are almost exactly equal, it is proposed totally to destroy the one, in order to restore the balance of the constitution!!

Can any thing be clearer than that, with forces so nearly balanced, even a small addition to one party, and especially the one supported by the revolutionary press and the popular outcry, will give a decisive preponderance to the other. The disfranchisement of ten members in such circumstances, by making a difference of twenty votes, is sufficient to give the democratic party the ascendant.—What shall we say then of 164 taken from the one side and added to the other?

From this table may also be seen how vain are the hopes of those who imagine that the county representation is to form any barrier against the democratic inroad of the manufacturing interest. Twice as many Irish and English county members, and thrice as many for open places voted for the bill as against it. This evinces, in the most convincing manner, the democratic tendency of the electors, even without the L.10 freeholders. What will be the result of the elections with that portentous addition to the popular force?

But this table furnishes another and a still more alarming subject for consideration. It appears from it that a considerable majority of English and Scotch members are against the bill, and that it was carried by the preponderance of the Irish.

	For it.	Against it.
England,	238	240
Scotland,	18	26
Ireland,	251	266
	53	37

Thus there were 266 members for Great Britain against the bill, and 251 for it; in other words, a majority of 15 members were against it. Ireland threw in her weight to cast the balance; if she does so successfully, she will more than repay by that single stroke the oppression of four hundred years.

Now, what will be the result of the next election under the new constitution in Ireland, with every L.10 householder voting for a member of Parliament? At least 60 out of the 103 members she is to return will be not only in the Radical, but the Anti-Union interest. They will, in fact, be nominated by O'Connell as completely as his son was recently named by him for the county of Clare.

Here is ample subject for serious meditation. Sixty Catholic Radicals returned by (O'Connell) That will indeed make England feel the bitterness of Irish Immigration. With a powerful body of this description, supported by the incessant clamour of 7,000,000 Irishmen on the other side of the Channel, how is the Union to be maintained? How is the empire to be saved from dismemberment? What security will remain for the institutions or property of Great Britain when the Catholics combine with the English Radicals?

Catholic Emancipation has brought the empire to the perilous position in which it is now placed on the Reform Question. The Catholic members carried the majority in the House of Commons: the Duke of Norfolk was the first peer who declared in the Upper House in its favour. The first return they have made for admission into the pale of the constitution, has been to combine with its enemies for its destruction. Here is the first effect of a great concession to popular clamour—the constitution is stung to the heart by the vipers whom she has folded in her bosom.

The unanimous support which the Radicals have given to the bill in every part of the country, is the clearest proof of its democratic tendency. Hunt and Hume, O'Connell and Gorman Mahon, the Times and the Examiner, are equally loud in its praise. These radicals know well what will increase the influence of their own party: they have an eagle's eye for discovering any thing which has a tendency, however remote, to continue the hated power of the aristocracy. Can it be supposed that they would support the bill, unless it went to subvert the power of their enemies? Their boast, their glory is, that it will have this effect: "Let this bill be passed," says the Examiner, "and the settlement of the government upon a democratic basis is certain."

Where, says Lord Brougham, were the rotten boroughs in the days of Saxon liberty? How can it be called revolution, which only restores the constitution to the days of pristine liberty? Where, we ask in reply, was the democratic press in the days of Alfred? Where was the power of the people in the days of Magna Charta, when all that the nobles who obtained it thought proper to stipulate for the cultivation of the soil, was, that their plough-goods should not be distrained in seed-time? Where the weight of the commons, when their representatives in Parliament concluded their petition with, "for God's sake—and, as an act of mercy?" When the feudal nobility lived in rude magnificence in their castles, surrounded by their armed retainers—when the commons were few in number, ignorant, and dispirited—when the greatest city in the kingdom, out of London, did not contain 20,000 souls—when printing was unknown, and the daily press unborn, it might be perfectly safe to send writs to every borough as it rose to any thing like eminence; though the same would be highly perilous at this time, when the power of the people has so enormously increased—when a democratic press incessantly stimulates their ambition—and the change in the mode of warfare, consequent on the invention of fire-arms, has caused the sword to fall from the hands of the country nobility. An increase of borough representation was then required to counterbalance the exorbitant power of the feudal nobility—an increase of the influence of the peers is now required to counterbalance the turbulent vigour of the commons.

No change can be safely introduced in favour of popular power, except what is done by slow and imperceptible additions. Lord Brougham has, indeed, ridiculed all plans of "bit-by-bit" reformers; but a greater man than Lord Brougham has pronounced them to be the only safe and beneficial innovations. "Prudenter igitur faciunt homines," says Lord Bacon, "si in innovationibus suis a tempore exemplum petant: tempus enim innovat vel maxime sed tacite pedetentim ac sine sensu. Expedit præterea experimentis novis in corporibus politicis medendis, non uti, nisi urgens incumbat necessitas aut evidens se ostendat utilitas; et sedulo cavere ut reformationis studium mutationem inducat non autem studium mutationis reformationem præstat." *

The democratic tendency of the daily press, and its prodigious influence even on powerful minds, must be calculated upon as a fixed power in future in the constitution. Its operation will be always felt, except during those periods of excitement from foreign war, when the ordinary bent of the popular mind is for a time diverted. It arises partly from the extension of the power of reading and thinking on political subjects to the mass of the community, and partly from the vast increase of our manufacturing population. Crowded together in great numbers—ignorant except of what they learn through the daily press—incessantly stimulated by abuse of their superiors, such men will always be inclined to democracy. From their vast numbers, any journals which they support must necessarily have ten times the circulation which those enjoy who support the aristocratic side of the question. If the middling and lower ranks are fifty times as numerous as the higher, the democratic press will always be fifty times as extensive as the conservative. Hence the prodigious increase of the revolutionary journals of the present day, and the alarming fact, that, with two or three exceptions, the whole press is on the popular side. It is to no purpose to say they don't influence the thinking part of the people; true, they do not—but how many of the readers of newspapers are capable of thinking? Not one in fifty.

"A democracy," says Aristotle, "is an aristocracy of orators, sometimes interrupted by the despotism of a single orator." With truth the same may be said of the demagogues and radical journals of the present time. Complaint is made of boroughmongers under the existing system; but who would be the boroughmongers under the new constitution? The popular journals and leading orators on the popular side in Parliament. One of them would return more members than are now named by any half-dozen of the great borough holders in the House of Peers. Perhaps the number of members returned by these great new boroughmongers would stand thus:—

O'Connell,	60	Spectator,	37
Times,	72	Scotsman,	13
Examiner,	32	Ballot,	35
Sun,	19	Morning Herald,	22

Whoever has attended in the circle of his own acquaintance, or on a general survey of public bodies, to the influence of daily papers in ruling opinion, will not, we are persuaded, deem this statement overcharged.

Thus the boasted and long wished for Reform will amount only to a change of masters; we will unhorse the aristocracy of rank and station, and place that of adventurers in its stead; we will be governed by a dominion more fierce and unbending than that of family or possessions; we will overthrow the hereditary influence of the Peers and proprietors of England, and fall under the government of the conductors of reviews and the editors of newspapers. Lord Brougham's bill will destroy that wholesome state of the representation which he has so well described as characterising the English Legislature, and commence in its stead that ruinous rule of adventurers and demagogues, which he has so clearly shewn brought on the horrors of the French Revolution.

By passing the present bill, it is said you will secure the numerous body of the new voters on the side of order: full reliance may be placed on them in any future contests with the inferior and unrepresented classes, and the pyramid of society placed on a broad and stable basis. It is hard to say, whether this argument, which at first sight appears most plausible, is in reality worse founded in precedent or principle.

In France, after the Restoration in 1815, the qualification of an elector was fixed at the payment of 300 francs a-year of direct taxes, which, making allowance for the difference in the value of money, is about £20 a-year. Certainly this was a very high qualification; implying, as it did, at least £400 a-year of income to each elector. Yet high as it was, it furnished no security against the demand for an extension of the elective franchise, by the very exclusive and limited class who alone enjoyed it. The Chamber of Deputies at each successive dissolution became more and more democratical, until it became so hostile to the Throne, that the government could no longer be conducted, and a dissolution ensued, under circumstances which brought about the Revolution.

But we need not resort to foreign countries for proof of this truth. What is the boast of the reformers at the present day? That the electors of England would return a great majority of reforming members: that on a dissolution no man would be able to stand up on the hustings but those who would pledge themselves to support the present bill, which makes so great an addition to the electors of the empire. If this position be well founded, and that it is so, to a great extent, no one can doubt, what comes of the argument that the new electors will immediately close the door against all new entrants, and resolutely range themselves with government in all future contests with the people? Why are the new and more extended electors to be so totally different from the present and more restricted? Human nature will be the same in future years as in the present: the same passions and desires will mislead mankind then as at this time: and the same causes which now make the existing electors clamour for a duplication of their class, will make the reformed electors demand universal suffrage and vote by ballot.

The reason is obvious, and will remain the same in all ages. The people, after obtaining the elective franchise, will soon discover that they have been deluded into the acquisition of a privilege of no practical value. The million of electors who under the new constitution are to return the Parliament of Great Britain, will soon find that their condition is no ways ameliorated by the new privilege they have acquired; that wages are as low, taxes as heavy, tithes as vexatious, poor-rates as burdensome, as under the old constitution. If their representatives in Parliament are sufficiently strong to secure the abolition of these burdens—the destruction of the church property, and the abolition of the national debt, possibly they may be contented with these great victories; but till they are gained, they will never cease clamouring for an extension of the elective franchise to a still lower class in society. The reason is, that it is thus alone that they can render the triumph of the people complete, and secure the substantial fruits of victory, in the destruction of taxes, church, and funded property. Till this is gained, as long as the influence of the higher ranks successfully resist the concession of these practical boons to the lower, the democratic electors will never cease to recruit their forces from the lower classes of society.

Finding that a privilege shared with a million other people is in effect worth nothing: that no real benefit is to be gained by siding with the upper classes, and that it is by a vigorous concentration of popular strength, and the extension of the elective franchise to a still more numerous class, that the influence of wealth is to be destroyed, the cry will be incessant for an enlargement of the constituents. Rank, property, and worth, will be buried under the waves of popular ambition.

The reformers often complain that their opponents do not fairly meet their arguments; that they get up, in their elegant language, “Hole and Corner Petitions;” and that there is a deplorable want of ability on the other side. Now, here is an argument which we call on them, and defy them, to answer. They need not pretend that they don’t know of it: there are nearly 9000 copies of this Journal sold every month, and it is read wherever the English language is understood. We call on them to answer this argument, and to point out on what principles they contend, first, that the present electors are nearly unanimous in favour of the extension of the rights to a much more numerous body beneath themselves: and, secondly, that the new electors will be converted by the Magic Wand of Reform into a phalanx determined to resist any future and similar extension of the suffrage.

On what ground of justice can such an extension be resisted hereafter? If the L.5 householders raise an outcry that they are unrepresented, how, after this great concession to their L.10 brethren, is it to be resisted? If the L.1 householders second them, how are they to be staved off? If they are successful, how is universal suffrage to be avoided? If the contest must ultimately come on, why postpone it till the strength of the friends of the constitution is broken by repeated defeats? Each successive concession will only augment the strength of the democratic, and weaken the influence of the conservative party. Extravagant speeches on the hustings, unmeasured professions of zeal for the people in Parliament, will be the only titles to popular favour, and augment the strength of that tide which already is held out as irresistible.

To those who survey in times past the delusive and absurd nature of public opinion on subjects which excited the populace, the weakness of yielding to it at the present moment will appear truly deplorable. We subjoin a few examples of these delusions familiar to every reader of history; but the errors which have overspread the world since the march of intellect began, have thrown schoolboy information into the shade.

Public opinion in Jerusalem was unanimous to resist the invasion of Titus. Every town and village in Judea sent forth its little horde to support the capital in a contest utterly hopeless, and eleven hundred thousand souls in consequence perished in its ruins.

Public opinion in Athens was clear for the banishment of Aristides. No good reasons could be assigned for this caprice towards so great and good a man. "We are tired," said they, "of hearing him called the Just."

Public opinion in Rome condemned the great Scipio Africanus, the vanquisher of Hannibal, the deliverer of his country. He died forsaken in a foreign land: on his tomb was engraved by his own desire, the mournful inscription—"My ungrateful country shall not possess my bones."

Public opinion in the Roman Republic was unanimous, save among the Patricians, for the Agrian law of Gracchus. With the contests to which it gave rise, began the civil wars which ended in the despotism of Cæsar.

Public opinion in Italy strongly favoured the aggression of that great man. Pompey in vain strove to stem the torrent: Italy was yielded up to him without a struggle: the empire of the world, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, was the reward of his audacity.

No emperor was the object of more general adulation during his life, or more universal execration after his death, than Nero. "Et vulgus," says Tacitus, "eodem pravitate insectabatur interfectum qua foverat viventem."

Public opinion in modern Europe first rose universally and vehemently in favour of the crusades. "Dieu le veut: Dieu le veut," was the universal cry: "Vox populi, vox Dei," the universal maxim: Empires were convulsed: Europe torn up by its roots, and precipitated upon Asia; hundreds of thousands set forth, without guides, on the popular enterprise; millions of men were sacrificed in the holy cause.

Public opinion in Scotland, at the time of the Reformation, was unanimous and violent for the destruction of the cathedrals. Devastation, which subsequent ages have never ceased to deplore, was committed amidst the universal applause of the people.

Public opinion in 1642 was vehement in favour of the Long Parliament; a contest which brought the king to the scaffold, deluged the nation with blood, unsheathed the sword of Cromwell, and stifled liberty for fifteen years, was commenced with a far more general feeling in its favour than now supports Reform.

Public opinion in 1725 was unanimously and strongly excited in favour of the Mississippi scheme, and the South Sea Bubble.—Thousands were ruined in consequence, and the nation brought to the brink of insolvency.

The prodigious efficacy and inexhaustible powers of the sinking fund, was for the first half of the late war the unanimous object of public admiration. The only cause of apprehension to all the bankers, merchants, and practical men, was, that it would pay off the debt too fast, and capital be left without a safe investment.

The Constituent Assembly commenced its labours amidst the unanimous applause of all France. Those rash measures of reform, which Lord Brougham has so well shewn brought on the subsequent convulsion of the revolution, were the theme of universal admiration with ninety-nine out of every hundred in that great kingdom.

When it was put to the convention to decide whether Louis XVI. was guilty or innocent, not one man ventured to absolve him. Eight hundred of the ablest men in France were unanimous in condemning an innocent monarch. On a subject, says the republican historian, on which posterity will unanimously decide one way, the convention unanimously decided another.

When the annexation of Savoy and Piedmont was proposed in the convention in October 1792, only one voice was raised against an unjustifiable aggression which entailed a dreadful war on Europe, and for the first time for 400 years, brought an invading army to the French capital.

The whole of France was unanimous in supporting Napoleon's expedition to Russia in 1812. "The youth," says Segur, "looked upon it as a mere military promenade: a party of pleasure, which would hardly last six months."

Every body recollects the general delusion in favour of joint-stock companies in 1825. From the Chancellor of the Exchequer, downwards, there was but one opinion as to the boundless wealth and inexhaustible resources of the British empire. The public as little suspected the catastrophe of December 1825, as the reformers of the present day do the probable consequence of their measures.

Examples of this sort lead the thoughtful to distrust public opinion on all occasions, when it is violently excited. Education cannot give intellect. Newspapers will not extinguish passion. The great majority of the public are now as incapable of judging on political subjects as they were in the days of Aristides. Printing has extended to the whole people the passions of a mob; it has not given them a larger share of intellect.

Suppose that Lord Goderich, during the joint-stock mania of 1824, had come forward and said, "Public opinion is irresistible; it runs with a tremendous current just now in favour of joint-stock companies. Government must head the movement, and therefore the whole resources of the empire must be forthwith embarked in a grand national joint-stock speculation." What would we now have said of such an attempt to increase, instead of subduing, the dangerous effervescence in the public mind? Which would have rendered permanent the ruinous effects of individual extravagance, and made popular delusion the means of inflicting an indelible wound on the credit and resources of the country? That is precisely what the Reformers are attempting on a far greater scale, and with infinitely more dangerous implements to effect at this time.

If the representatives of the people are to yield to all the caprices of their constituents, if the outcry of journals, or the effusions of orators at meetings, are immediately to stamp their authority on the measures of the Legislature, where is the advantage of a Parliament, where the superiority of a representative over a republican form of Government? Hitherto it has been supposed, that the great advantage of a representative form of Government was, that it prevented this sudden and perilous communication of public impulse to national measures; that it gave the passions time to cool, and rendered Government not the organ of popular excitement, but of sober thought. All these advantages, sanctioned by the experience of ages, are now forgotten. Parliament is represented as a body of delegates, not legislators; and reform, it is said, must be granted, not because it is right, but because the people will it.

That distress has existed to a very great extent in this country, for many years past, is certain; and it has existed in the most galling form; in immediate and painful contrast with extraordinary wealth and prosperity. By the operation of some great causes, as universal and irresistible as the tempests of Heaven, whole classes have been precipitated into ruin, while others have been elevated almost unconsciously into comparative affluence. The suffering produced by these great changes, has unquestionably been one great cause of the universality of the present cry for reform among the middling ranks. Now, we would ask the agitators, how they can reconcile it to their conscience, to take advantage of general distress, to rouse the people to demand a great change in Government, from which they well know they can derive no practical benefit; but from which, if conceded, the means of future convulsion are irrecoverably placed in their hands?

Ministers came into office with three pledges, Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform. The first they will not be able in all probability to keep. The passions awakened in republican France, by their favourite revolution in that country, will soon render that impossible. The second, they admit, they cannot carry farther than their predecessors have done; on the contrary, their estimates have exceeded those of former years by above £500,000 yearly. What practical benefit then will accrue from the concession of Reform to the lower orders? If the Reformed Parliament preserve the national faith, (and we cannot suppose it is intended to violate it,) how are the public burdens to be relieved? How is labour to be rendered more abundant, grain more cheap, taxes less oppressive, than at this time? Do the Reformers mean to say, they will be able to carry on Government without taxes, pay the interest of the debt without customs, teach the poor without a church establishment, relieve distress without a poor's rate. If they can do so, let them boldly proclaim the abolition of taxes, tithes, and poor's rate; if not, cease to delude the people into demanding a measure which can confer none of the benefits which are generally expected from its adoption. To say it will prevent future war, is contrary to all experience. Nations invariably grow warlike and turbulent in proportion as they become democratic. Republican Rome conquered the ancient, republican France, the modern continent.

But though a Reformed Parliament will not, without violating the public credit—that is, extinguishing the capital of the country—be able to give any relief to the poor, it may confidently be expected to furnish an inexhaustible source of agitation to aggravate the severity of future distress. We have a signal example of this in Ireland, where distress has facilitated agitation, and agitation in its turn, by paralyzing industry, and debarring the entrance of capital, has perpetuated distress. With this vicious and fatal circle staring them in the face; with the example of France and Belgium suffering to an unparalleled degree from the same cause, it is into this vortex of alternate distress and agitation that the Reformers would precipitate this country. They would create a Parliament bound to respond immediately to the clamour of the populace; compelled to give vent to every burst of public discontent; destined to become not the scene of beneficent legislation, or practical improvement, but of factious contention and querulous debate.

If there is any one duty more sacred than another in such periods of excitement, it is that on the part of legislators to moderate the public effervescence, and resolutely withstand those demands which they judge fatal to the balance of the constitution, or perilous to the institutions of the empire. Concession, in such circumstances, is the weakest, as well as the basest policy. It was not by yielding to the extravagant demands of the plebeians, that the Roman senate obtained the empire of the world, but by resolutely re- sisting them, and enduring the last extremities, rather than surrender the constitution of their forefathers. Such conduct was in the end triumphant; the nobles ultimately prevailed in every contest, and the empire, though often endangered, was never overturned by popular violence.

Concession and conciliation were tried to their utmost extent by the Britons and other inhabitants of the Roman empire, when exposed to the inroads of the Danes. The weak and timid monarchs of the Hierarchy, proceeding on the principle now urged in support of Reform, sought to buy off their enemies, by giving them sometimes £10,000, sometimes £20,000, on condition that they would depart, and not return. They did depart, accordingly, and returned invariably in six months, in greater force than before, equipped with the spoils of their weak and pusillanimous enemies. Who put an end to that ruinous system of conciliation and concession? Alfred the Great, who from the first refused to yield any payment, and fought his enemies hand to hand, till he expelled them from his shores, and founded the English monarchy.

The case is exactly the same with the concessions now so loudly recommended to the popular demands for power. The more you concede, the more daring and vehement they will become. Every successive acquisition will be made the means of a still more extravagant demand, until the last remnants of the monarchy are swept away, and bloody republicanism proclaimed in its stead. There is no evading the danger. Concession must now be stopped, or the nation may make up its mind to republican institutions; and what will then become of the church property, the national debt, the estates of the nobility, or the lives of all the higher orders?

Concession was the principle on which Charles I. acted. He first yielded the Petition of Rights, which, as Mr Hume observes, "was so great a concession to the Commons, that it in truth amounted to a revolution." He gave up tonnage and poundage; he yielded Strafford to their violence; he agreed to triennial parliaments; he allowed the sheriff to be invested with the power of summoning them, if not convoked by royal authority; his ministers were chosen exclusively from the popular party; he paid the arrears of his rebellious Scotch troops; he conceded to all the demands of the Scotch Parliament; the famous "Remonstrance" of the Commons was carried, after a vehement debate; and what was the consequence of all these concessions? Encouraged by so much success, the Commons openly declared to the Lords "that they themselves were the sole representative body of the nation; that the Peers were nothing but individuals, who held their seats in a particular capacity; and, therefore, if their Lordships would not consent to the passing of acts, necessary for the preservation of the people, the Commons, together with such of the Lords as were sensible of the danger, must join together, and represent the matter to his Majesty."* Having stripped the Crown of all its prerogatives, the Commons next insisted for the command of the Militia, which would have given them the exclusive use of the sword; the civil war ensued; the king was beheaded, the peers abolished, and Cromwell enthroned.

Louis XVI. was the next monarch who in turbulent times tried the system of concession. The nation demanded the States General—he convoked them: they demanded a popular representation—he anticipated them by, voluntarily and by a royal ordinance, doubling the deputies from the Tiers Etat: they demanded the abolition of feudal rights and personal services—he abolished them. He agreed to abandon all the prerogatives of his crown: he formed the National Guard, dismissed his Royal Guard and attendants, made war on his own brother-in-law, the Emperor of Austria, issued severe proclamations against the emigrants, granted a constitution more free than the Republicans themselves have adopted in 1831, sanctioned the confiscation of all the property of the Church. His whole life was one uninterrupted series of concessions and reforms, and, in return, he was led to the scaffold.

The nobles vied with the Sovereign in the surrender of their rights. At the first struggle, in July 1789, between the noblesse and commons as to sitting in one or separate Chambers, forty-six of their number, headed by the Duke of Orleans, joined the Tiers Etat; they voluntarily, on the night of August 4th, surrendered all their exclusive privileges; they consented to the abolition of tithes, titles of honour, entails, and dignities of every description. They concurred in a constitution of the most democratic character; and they received, in return for so many concessions, exile, confiscation, and death.

The clergy of France were the first and steadiest friends of the revolution. During the dependence of the contest as to a single or separate Chambers, 127 of their body left their own order, and united with the Commons; and, by so doing, first gave them a numerical superiority, and compelled the union of all the three estates in the National Assembly. Unbounded gratitude, universal joy, followed this first and decisive movement towards the popular side; and, in return, the Assembly confiscated their whole property, banished and proscribed their leading members, and sent them forth destitute into that very country whose freedom their adherence had been the first means of establishing.

At the very time that these dreadful scenes were passing in the neighbouring kingdom, the cry for reform, spreading as at present by contagion, became vehement in this country. Revolution, bloodshed, and massacre, were loudly threatened if it were any longer delayed. "The nation," it was said, "will no longer submit to be trifled with; the representation must be reformed, the demand for extended popular constituents must be satisfied or a revolution will inevitably ensue."† But this clamour was not met by concession. Mr Pitt resisted the popular cry. He was supported by the firmness and intrepidity of the British aristocracy; the threatened revolution came to nothing, and the constitution, with its inestimable blessings, was preserved.

"The revolution in France in 1890," says Lord John Russell, "was occasioned by a refusal to bend to the popular voice." There never was a more mistaken assertion. It was occasioned by a violation of the constitution, and by no refusal to concede Reform. Because, say the Reformers, a violation of the constitution brought on a revolution in France, therefore a violation of the constitution will prevent it in this country: because the disfranchisement of 40,000 French electors overturned the French, therefore the disfranchisement of 40,000 English electors, will establish the English throne.

If the demand for Reform were occasioned by any experienced grievance, which Reform could remedy, it would, indeed, be dangerous to refuse it. Actual evils do not pass away like the fleeting passions of the multitude. But there is no actual evil in the country to which Reform could apply a remedy. The demand for it has all grown up within these six months: it has arisen from foreign contagion, and been fanned by party ambition.

When the disunion among his adherents had brought the constitution into the highest peril; when public opinion was violently shaking, and the press, as usual, was fanning the flame, there was one man who dared in Parliament to front the danger, who threw away unequalled popularity, and abandoned supreme power to discharge his duty, who greatly dared to tell an insane nation that they were rushing on destruction—that man was the Duke of Wellington. Again we repeat what we said on 1st January last:—there never was a determination of a minister so much the subject of obloquy at the time, as his declaration against Reform in November last. There is none to which posterity will point with more exultation:

"Justum ac tenacem propositi virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis tyranni,
Mente quatit solida.
Solida neque Auster,
Dax inquieti turbidus Hadriæ,

Nec fulminantis magna Jovis manus,
Si fractus illabatur orbis,
Impavidum serient ruinæ."

The ultimate success or rejection of this measure is altogether immaterial in the estimate of the moral grandeur of this conduct. We read with more admiration the firmness of Cato at Utica, than the triumph of Cæsar at Pharsalia.

"Victrix causa Dels placuit, sed victa Cato."

But if the fatal divisions of the conservative party have brought the country to its present perilous condition, their subsequent union has nobly atoned for the error. In the long annals of British greatness, there is nothing more splendid than the conduct of the minority in the House of Commons on the Reform Bill. To say that they have nobly sustained the combat, that they have proved themselves infinitely superior to their adversaries in debate, is to bestow the lowest praise of which their conduct is worthy. The moral courage, the enduring firmness they have displayed, is its noblest quality. Placed between ministerial frowns and popular discontent, threatened with the loss of their seats in the Legislature by humane constituents, and met by the whole weight of government influence, they have never flinched from their duty. If Parliament is to give place to a Convention; if the long career of its glory is to terminate, it will not have perished in the decline either of its honour or its usefulness. —Its last acts have been the most beneficent and the most just of its existence. The names of its latest defenders, of Peel, Vyvyan, and Wetherell, will stand foremost in the lists of English patriotism; and when the delusion of the moment shall have passed away, when history shall judge the actions of men, and the voice of ages shall pronounce their doom, they will be classed by a mourning posterity with the first authors of British freedom; and the same honours decreed to those who have sought to prolong, with those who called into existence, the British constitution.

DR PARR AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

No. III.

How peculiarly painful it is to all parties—judges and juries, government, the public in general, the culprit, and his friends in particular—when a literary man falls under the lash of the law! How irritating to himself and others that he should be transported—how disgusting that he should be hanged! Such fates, however, befell some of Dr Parr's dearest connexions; he lived to see his most valued pupil expatriated, in company with felons, to "the Great Botanic Bay;" and he lived to accompany another friend (who also by one biographer is described as a pupil) to the foot of the gallows.

We mention not these things by way of reproach to Dr Parr's memory. The sufferings of his unhappy friends, after they came into trouble, called out none but the good qualities of his nature. Never, indeed, was Samuel Parr seen to greater advantage, than when animating the hopes, supporting the fortitude, or ministering to the comforts, of the poor dejected prisoner in his gloomy cell, at a time when self-reproaches had united with the frowns of the world to make the consolations of friendship somewhat more than usually trying to the giver, and a thousand times more valuable to the receiver. When all others forsook the wretched, and fled, Dr Parr did not; his ear was open to the supplications of all who sat in darkness and sorrow; and wherever the distress was real, remembering that he himself also was a poor frailty-laden human creature, he did not think it became him too severely to examine in what degrees guilt or indiscretion had concurred to that effect. Sam Parr! these things will make the earth lie light upon your last abode; flowers will flourish on its verdant roof; and gleams of such remembrances extort an occasional twinge of compunction even from us—at the very moment when we are borrowing old Sir Christopher's gentler knout [No. 3—his scutica, not his flagellum] gently to "perstringe" your errors.

Sam Parr! we love you; we said so once before. But perstringing, which was a favoured word of your own, was a no less favoured act. You also in your lifetime perstringed many people; some of whom perstringed you, Sam, smartly in return; some kissed the rod; and some disdained it in silence. A complaint therefore on your behalf would be unreasonable; that same parresia, which in your lifetime furnished a ground for so many thousand discharges of the same Grecian pun on your own name, (each duly delivered by its elated author as the original explosion,) obliges us to deal frankly with your too frequent errors, even when we are most impressed by the spectacle of your truly Christian benignity. Indeed, the greater your benignity, the better is our title to tax those errors which so often defeated it. For why, let us ask of Dr Parr's friends, should he choose to testify his friendship to men, in standing by them, and giving his countenance to their affliction, rather than in the wiser course—so suitable to his sacred calling—of interposing his gentler counsels between their frantic designs and the dire extremities which naturally conducted to that affliction? In Gerrald's case, he certainly had counselled and warned him of the precipice on which he stood, in due season. But to him, as to the chamois hunter of the Alps, danger was a temptation even for its own sake: he hungered and thirsted after political martyrdom. And it is possible, that in that case Dr Parr found no grounds of self-reproach. Possible, we say; even here we speak doubtingly, because if Dr Parr applied sedatives to his fiery nature in 1794, he had in 1790-2 applied stimulants; if, finally, when Mr Pitt and the French Reign of Terror shewed that no trifling could be allowed, he pulled vainly at the curb-rein (as his letters remain to show)—originally, it is beyond all doubt that he used the spur. Violence and intemperance, it is true, in Mr Gerrald were constitutional; yet there can be little doubt that, for the republican direction which they took, his indiscreet tutor was nearly altogether answerable.

Joseph Gerrald was a man of great talents: his defence upon his trial shews it: and we have the assurance of an able critic, who was himself present at its delivery, in March 1794, that no piece of forensic eloquence on record better deserved the profound attention with which it was received: "you might," as he assured us, "during the whole time, have heard a pin drop." Under happier auspices* than Dr Parr's, how distinguished a citizen might this man have become! As to Mr Oliver, it is Dr Parr's own statement of the case, (a statement which, at this day, we presume, few persons will be found to believe,) that he was condemned and executed for drinking Mr Fox's health, and reading Tom Paine's writings; in short, for being a Jacobin. The little trifling circumstance that he was also a murderer, with Dr Parr weighs nothing at all. Take then his own representation: who was it that countenanced the reading of Tom Paine, criticizing his infamous books as counterpoises to those of Burke, and as useful in bringing out a neutral product? Who was it that gave to Warwickshire, (Mr Oliver's part of the country,) nay, to all England, the one sole example of a "budge doctor," arrayed in the scarlet robes of the English universities, and a public instructor of the young English aristocracy, speaking cautiously and respectfully of this shallow dogmatist, who, according to his power, laid the axe to all civil government throughout the world? Who, but one man, clothed in the character of a Christian minister, could have been blinded by party violence to the extent of praising in a qualified manner, and naming amongst creditable writers, the most insolent theomachist and ruffian infidel of ancient or modern times? If Dr Parr's friends acted upon Mr Paine's principles, propagated Mr Paine's principles, and suffered in public estimation, even to the extent of martyrdom, as champions of those principles—nobody can suppose that in selecting and professing a faith so full of peril, they could be other than greatly influenced by the knowledge that a learned doctor in the Church of England, guide and tutor to themselves, had publicly spoken of that Mr Paine as an authority not altogether without his claims to consideration.

But we have insensibly wandered into political considerations at a point of our review, where the proper object before us was—Dr Parr as a man of letters. For this we have some excuse, considering that politics and literature so naturally blended in Dr Parr's practice of authorship, that perhaps not one of his most scholarlike performances, but is richly interwoven with political allusions and sarcasms, nor one of those most professedly political, which did not often turn aside to gather flowers from the fields of the muses, or herbs "of medicinal power" from the gardens of philosophy. The truth is, the Doctor wrote as he lived; heuding to momentary gusts of passion; recovering himself by glimpses to a higher standard of professional duty; remembering by fits that he was officially a teacher, spiritual and intellectual; forgetting himself too often into a partisan and a zealot.

However, as we shall consider Dr Parr's politics under a separate and peculiar head, we will, for the present, confine ourselves more rigorously to his literary character, difficult as we really find it to observe a

* And perhaps in candour it should be added, under happier fortunes and more prudence in his liaisons with the other sex. He was in some degree a dissolute man; but perhaps he might have been otherwise under more noble treatment from the woman of his heart. His unhappiness, on this point, latterly, was great; and there is reason to think that he secretly wished to lay down his life, and resorted to politics as the best means of doing so with reputation. He had a passionate love for an unworthy woman, whom he had strong reasons for thinking unfaithful to him. And at all events, like too many of her sex, she had the baseness to trifle with his apparent misery.

line of strict separation, which the good doctor himself is for ever tempting or provoking us to forget.

As a man of letters, then, what was it—what power, what accomplishment, what art that Dr Parr could emblazon upon his shield of pretence, as characteristically his own? Latin; Latin quoad knowledge; Latin quoad practical skill. "Reading," said he, "reflection, the office of a teacher, and much practice in composition, have given me a command over the Latin sufficient for the ordinary purposes of a scholar." This was his own estimate of himself: and it was a modest one—too modest: and possibly he would not have made it had he been addressing any body but a Whig lord, taught from his earliest youth to take his veneration of Dr Parr from a party who regarded him as their champion and martyr. Yet again, it is not impossible that he was sincere: for the insincere will make a general profession of humility in the abstract, and yet revolt from the test of individual comparisons: they confess how much they fall short of their own ideal; but as to John, Thomas, or William, they would spurn a claim of superiority for them. Now, Dr Parr sometimes goes so far in his humility as to "name names:" Sir William Jones, Sir George Baker—these we are sure of, and we think Bishop Lowth were amongst the masters of Latinity, to whom he somewhere concedes the palm for this accomplishment, on a question of comparison with himself. We must profess our own hearty dissent from such a graduation of the honours. Sir George Baker, from his subjects, is less generally known. He was an Etonian, and wrote at least with facility: but, to speak of the other two, who are within every body's reach, we contend that, maugre their reputation, they do not write good Latin. The kind of Latin they affect is in bad taste: too florid, too rotund, too little idiomatic: its structure is vicious, and evidences an English origin. Of Lowth we say this even more determinately than of Sir W. Jones.* Some day or other we shall make a great article on this subject; and we shall then illustrate largely: for without illustration, such a discussion is as empty and aerial as a feast of the Barmecide.

Meantime, whatsoever the mechanic hounds may say who now give the tone to education, the art of writing Latin finely is a noble accomplishment; and one, we will take upon us to say, which none but a man of distinguished talent will succeed in. All the scholarship in the world will not avail to fight up against the tyranny of modern idioms and modern fashions of thought—the whole composition will continue to be redolent of lamps not fed with Attic oil, but with gas—base gas—unless in the hands of a man vigorous and agile enough to throw off the yoke of vernacular custom

"Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life."

No custom cramps and masters a man's freedom so effectually as the household diction which he hears from all around him. And that man, who succeeds (like Dr Parr) in throwing his thoughts into ancient moulds, does a greater feat than he that turned the Euphrates into a new channel for the service of his army.

This difficulty is in itself a sufficient justification of modern Latin—coupled, as it is, with so useful an activity of thought. But, apart from that, will any man contend that the establishment of a great commonwealth can be complete without artists in Latinity?—Even rogues, swindlers, hangmen, are essential to the proper mounting of a great metropolis: a murderer or two perhaps, in the complete subdivision of employments, would not be amiss in casting the parts for a full performance of civil life. Not that we approve of murder for murder's sake: far from it! It is scandalous, and what every good man must decidedly condemn and pointedly discourage. But still, if murders are to be, and murders will be, and murders must be, then of course we might as well have them executed in an artist-like manner, as in the horrid bungling style so offensive in rude countries to the eye of delicate taste, and the mind of sensibility. Assuredly, it cannot be denied, that all sorts of villains, knaves, prigs, and so forth, are essential parts in the equipage of social life. Else why do we regard police as so indispensable a function of organized society: for without corresponding objects in the way of scoundrels, sharks, crimps, pimps, ring-droppers, &c.,—police-officers would be idle superfluities, and liable to general disgust.

But, weighing the question as stretched to this extent,—for artists who work in Latin we may plead more reasons than Mr Blackwood is likely to allow us scope for in one article,—we shall press but one argument, and that applied to our just national pride. Is it not truly shameful that a great nation should have occasion to go abroad for any odd bit of Latin that it may chance to want in the way of inscription for a triumphal monument, for a tomb, for a memorial pillar, for a public or official gift? Conceding (as, under the terrors of Mr Blackwood's pruning knife, we do concede for the moment) that Latin is of little other application—is it to be endured that we should be reduced to the necessity of importing our Latin secretary? * For instance, we will mention one memorable case. The Czar Alexander, as all the world knows, one fine day, in the summer of that immortal year 1814, went down to Oxford in company with our own regent, the King of Prussia, the Hetman of the Cossacks, and a long roll of other princely personages, with titles fatiguing to the memory, and names from which orthography recoils aghast. Some were entertained at one college—some at another.

The emperor's billet fell upon Meriton College; and in acknowledgment of the hospitality there shewn, some time afterwards he sent to the warden and fellows, through Count Lieven, his ambassador to the court of London, a magnificent vase of Siberian jasper. This vase wanted an inscription—a Latin inscription of course. This inscription was to be worked in Russia, and the workmen stood resting upon their tools until this should come out from England. Now, under these circumstances, John Bull! conceive the shame and the scandal—if Oxford, the golden seat of classical erudition, under the very eyes of the Czar and his ambassador, had been obliged to resort to some coxcomb on the continent for the small quantity of Latin required? What would Mrs Grundy have said? What would the Hetman have said? And Woronzoff, and Kutusoff, and Doctoroff, and Tchitchzakoff? Indeed we cannot think it altogether becoming to Oxford, that Cambridge should have furnished the artist—for Dr Parr it was who undertook and executed the inscription, which, after all, exhibited too Spartan a nakedness to have taxed any man very severely, except for the negative quality of forbearance; and the scandal, as between the two universities, is actually on record and in print, of a chancellor of the one (Lord Grenville) corresponding with a doctor of the other, for a purpose which exclusively concerned Oxford. Perhaps the excuse may be, that Oxford was not interested as a body in an affair which belonged personally to the warden and fellows of one society. And at all events, the national part of the scandal was averted.†

On this subject, which furnishes so many a heart-ache to a loyal-hearted Englishman, we would beg to

* We say Latin secretary, as indicating an office so far as regards its duties, which really does exist, though the emoluments do not. There is a great deal of public work to be executed in Latin, and it is done gratis, and by various hands. But, were this an age for increasing the public burdens, we should suggest the propriety of creating anew the formal appointment of Latin secretary, which sought for many reasons never to have been abolished. The Fox Ministry would have done rightly to have restored the office, and to have rewarded Dr Parr by the first appointment.

† But surely the brother of Sir Henry Hallford (as the warden of Meriton, Dr Peter Vaughan, we believe was) needed not to have gone out of his own family connections for such an assistance. For Sir Henry himself writes Latin with ease and effect.

throw a hasty glance. John Bull, who piques himself so much and so justly on the useful and the respectable, on British industry, British faith, British hardware, British morals, British muskets (which are by no means the best specimens of our morals, judging by the proportion that annually bursts in the hands of poor savages)—and, generally speaking, upon British arts, provided only they are the useful and the mechanical arts—this same John Bull has the most sheepish distrust of himself in every accomplishment that professes a purpose of ornament and mere beauty. Here he has a universal superstition in favour of names in ano and in. Every foreigner indeed, but more especially every Italian—it is John's private faith—is by privilege of nature a man of taste, and, by necessity, a knave. Were it only of music that he thought this, and only of Italian foreigners, perhaps he might not be so far amiss. Oh! the barbarous leaning of British taste as regards music! oh, the trashy songs which pollute our theatres, and are allowed to steal into the operas of Mozart! Strange that the nation whose poetry and drama discover by degrees so infinitely the most passion, should in their music discover the least! Not ~~more~~ <sup>more</sup>, however, in arts, technically so called, but in every branch of ornamental knowledge, every thing that cannot be worked in a loom, weighed on a steel-yard, measured by an ellwand, valued by an auctioneer, John Bull secretly distrusts himself and his own powers. He may talk big when his patriotism is irritated; but his secret and sincere opinion is that nature has made him a barbarian as regards the beautiful; if not for sensibility, at any rate for performance; and that in compensation of this no-verbal usage, fortune has given him a long purse to buy his beauty ready made. Hence it is, that, whilst openly disavowing it, John is for ever sneaking privately to foreigners, and tempting them with sumptuous bribes, to undertake a kind of works which many times would be better done by domestic talents. Latin, we may be sure, and Greek, fall too much within the description of the ornamental—to be relished of home manufacture. Whenever, therefore, a great scholar was heard of on the continent, him John Bull proceeded to buy or to bargain for. Many were imported at the Reformation. Joseph Scaliger was courted in the succeeding age. A younger friend of his, Isaac Casaubon, a capital scholar, but a dull man, and rather knavish, was caught. Exultingly did John hook him, play with him, and land him. James I. determined that he would have his life written by him: and, in fact, all sorts of uses were meditated and laid out for their costly importation. But he died without doing any thing that he would not have done upon the continent; the whole profit of the transaction rested with the Protestant cause, which (but for English gold) Casaubon would surely have abandoned for the honours and emoluments of Rome. Cromwell again, perfect John Bull as he was in this feature, also preserved the national faith; he would have his martial glories recorded. Well; why not? Especially for one who had Milton at his right hand. But no; he thought little of him—he would buy a foreigner. In fact, he was in treaty for several; and we will venture to say that Salmasius himself was not more confounded upon finding himself suddenly seized, bound, and whirled at Milton's chariot wheels, in a field where he was wont to career up and down as supreme and unquestioned arbiter, and at most expecting a few muttered insults, that would not require notice,—than Cromwell was on hearing that his own champion, a Londoner born, and manufactured at Cambridge, had verily taken the conceit out of the vain-glorious, but all-learned Frenchman. It was just such another essay as between Orlando and the Duke's wrestler—as well for the merits of the parties, as for the pleasant disappointment to the lookers-on. For even on the continent all men rejoiced in the humiliation of Salmasius. Charles II., again, and his favourite ministers, had heard of Des Cartes as a philosopher and Latinist, but apparently not of Lord Bacon, except as a lawyer. King William, though in the age of Bishop Pearson, and Stillingfleet, and Bentley, in the very rare glances which he condescended to bestow on literature, squinted at Grævius, Gronovius, and other Dutch professors of humanity on a ponderous scale. And, omitting scores of other cases we could bring in illustration, even in our own day, the worthy George III., thinking it would be well to gain the imprimatur of his own pocket university of Göttingen, before he made up his mind on the elementary books used in the great schools of England, dispatched a huge bale of grammars, lexicons, vocabularies, fables, selections, exercise-books, spelling-books, and Heaven knows what all, to that most concinnous and most rotund of professors—Mr Heyne. At Cæsar's command, the professor slightly inspected them; and having done so, he groaned at the quality of the superb English paper, so much harder, stiffer, and more unaccommodating to domestic purposes than that soft German article, prepared by men of feeling and consideration in that land of sentiment, and thereupon (we pretend not to say how far in consequence thereof) he drew up an angry and vindictive verdict on their collective merits. And thus it happened that his Majesty came to have but an indifferent opinion of English school literature. Now, in this instance, we see the John Bull mania pushed to extremity. For surely Dr Parr, on any subject whatever, barring Greek, was as competent a scholar as Master Heyne.* And on this particular subject, the jest is apparent, that Parr was, and Heyne was not, a schoolmaster. Parr had cultivated the art of teaching all his life; and it were hard indeed, if labours so tedious and heavy might not avail a man to the extent of accrediting his opinion on a capital question of his own profession. Speaking seriously, since the days of Busby—that great man† who flogged so many of our avi—abavi—stavi—and tritavi, among the schoolmasters of Europe, none could, in those days, stand forward as competitors in point of scholarship with Parr. Scholars more eminent, doubtless, there had been, but not among those who wielded the ferule; for the learned Dr Burney, junior, of Greenwich, and the very learned Dr Butler of Shrewsbury, had not then commenced their reigns. How pointed, then, was the insult, in thus transferring the appeal from a golden critic at home to a silver one abroad: or rather, how strong the prejudice which could prompt such a course to one who probably meditated no insult at all. And let no man say, on this occasion, that Parr, being a Jacobin, could not be decently consulted on the scruples of a king; for Heyne was a Jacobin also, until Jacobinism brought danger to his windows. If the oracle at Hatton philippized, the oracle of Göttingen philippized no less, and perhaps with much less temptation, and certainly with less conspicuous neglect of his own interest. Well for him that his Jacobinism lurks in ponderous Latin notes, whilst Dr Parr's was proclaimed to the world in English!

It is fitting, then, that we people of England should always keep a man or two capable of speaking with our enemies in the gate, when they speak Latin; more especially when our national honour in this particular is to be supported against a prejudice so deep, and of standing so ancient. These, however, are local arguments for cultivating Latin, and kept alive by the sense of wounded honour. But there are other considerations more permanent and intrinsic to the question, which press equally upon all cultivated nations. The language of ancient Rome has certain indestructible claims upon our regard: it has a peculiar merit sui generis in the first place; and secondly, circumstances have brought it into a singular and unprecedented relation to the affairs and interests of the human race.

* We cannot fancy Heyne as a Latin exercises. The last time we opened a book of his, (perhaps it was his Virgil,) some sixteen years ago, he was labouring at this well-known phrase—" regione viarum." As usual, a rhapsody of resemblances, more or less remote, was accumulated; but if we may be believed, that sole meaning of the word regio which throws light upon the expression, that meaning which connects it with the word rego in the mathematical sense, [i. e. to draw a strait line,] was unnoticed. All the rest was nothing. We closed the book in disgust.

Speaking carelessly of Latin, as one of two ancient languages, both included in the cycle of a perfect education, and which jointly compose the entire conservatory of all ancient literature that now survives, we are apt to forget that either of these languages differs from the other by any peculiar or incommunicable privilege; and for all the general advantages which can characterise a language, we rightly ascribe the preference in degree to the Greek. But there are two circumstances, one in the historical position of the Latin language, and one in its own internal character, which unite to give it an advantage in our esteem, such as no language besides ever did, or, in the nature of things, ever will possess. They are these:—The Latin language has a planetary importance; it belongs not to this land or that land, but to all lands where the human intellect has obtained its rights and its development. It is the one sole Lingua Franca, that is, in a catholic sense, such for the whole humanized earth, and the ~~total~~ family of man. We call it a dead language. But how? It is not dead, as Greek is dead, as Hebrew is dead, as Sanscrit is dead—which no man uses in its ancient form in his intercourse with other men. It is still the common dialect which binds together that great imperium in imperio—the republic of letters. And to express in a comprehensive way the relation which this superb language bears to man and his interests, it has the same extensive and indifferent relation to our planet, which the moon has amongst the heavenly bodies. Her light, and the means of intercourse which she propagates by her influence upon the tides, belong to all nations alike. How impressive a fact would it appear to us, if the great Asiatic family of nations from Teherán, or suppose from Constantinople and Cairo (which are virtually Asiatic) to Pekin and the remotest islands on that quarter of Asia, had some one common language through which their philosophers and statesmen could communicate with each other over the whole vast floor of Asia! Yet this sublime masonic tie of brotherhood we ourselves possess, we members of Christendom, in the most absolute sense. Gradually, moreover, it is evident that we shall absorb the whole world into the progress of civilisation. Thus the Latin language is, and will be still more perfectly, a bond between the remotest places. Time also is connected as much as space; and periods in the history of man, too widely separated from each other (as we might also have imagined) to admit of any common tie, are, and will continue to be, brought into connexion by a vinculum so artificial (and, generally speaking, so fluctuating) as a language. This position of the Latin language with regard to the history of man, would alone suffice to give it an overpowering interest in our regard. As to its intrinsic merits, the peculiarity of its structure, and the singular powers which arise out of that structure, we must leave that topic undiscussed. We shall say only, that, for purposes of elaborate rhetoric, it is altogether unrivalled; the exquisitely artificial mould of its structure, gives it that advantage. And, with respect to its supposed penury of words, we shall mention the opinion of Cicero, who, in three separate passages of his works, maintains, that in that point it has the advantage of the Greek.

Many questions arise upon the qualities of Parr's Latin in particular, and upon the general rules of style which he prescribed to himself. The far-famed author of the "Pursuits of Literature," has stigmatised the preface to Bellendénus* (we beseech you, courteous reader, to pro-

* William Bellenden, a Scotch writer, flourished at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and is said to have been a Professor in the University of Paris. At Paris he published, in 1608, his Cicero Princeps, a singular work, in which he extracted from Cicero's writings, detached remarks, and compressed them into one regular body, containing the rules of monarchical government, with the line of conduct to be adopted, and the virtues proper to be encouraged by the Prince himself; and the treatise, when finished, he dedi-nounce the penultimate short, that is, lay the accent on the syllable lend) as "a cento of Latin quotations;" in which judgment there is a double iniquity; for, beyond all other human performances, the "Pursuits of Literature" is a cento, and in any fair sense, Parr's preface is not. In fact, with all its undeniable ability, all its cloudy amplifications, tortuous energy of language, and organ notes of profounder eloquence pealing at intervals through the "sound and fury" of his political vaticinations,—merits which sufficed to propel that bulky satire through nearly a score of editions,—yet, at this day, it cannot be denied, that the "Pursuits of Literature" was disfigured by much extravagance of invective, much license of tongue, much mean and impotent spite, (see his lying attempt to retort the jest of Colman* by raising a Greek dust,) but above all, (and ated, from a principle of patriotism and gratitude, to the son of his master, Henry, then Prince of Wales. Four years afterwards (namely, in 1612) he proceeded to publish another work of a similar nature, which he called Cicero Consul, Senator, Senatus Romanus, and in which he treated the nature of the consular office, and the constitution of the Roman Senate. Finding the work received, as they deserved, with the unanimous approbation of the learned, he conceived the plan of a third work, De Statu Prætoris Urbis, which was to contain a history of the progress of government and philosophy, from the times before the flood, to their various degrees of improvement, under the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. He had proceeded so far as to print a few copies of this work in 1615, when it seems to have been suggested, that his three treatises, De Statu Principis, De Statu Republicæ, De Statu Urbis, being on subjects so nearly resembling each other, there might be a propriety in uniting them into one work, by re-publishing the two former, and entitling the whole, Hellenæus de Statu. With this view, he recalled the few copies of his last work that were abroad, and after a delay of some months, he published the three treatises together, under their new title, in the year 1615.

In the British Museum, one copy of the book De Statu prætoris Urbis, dated in 1615, still exists, which the author had probably sent into England as a present, and could not recall; and in all the others the date appears, on a nice inspection, to have been originally MDCXV., and to have had an 1 afterwards added, on the alteration of the author's plan. The editor has shewn great ingenuity in making up this typographical difficulty. The great work being now completed, Hellenæus looked forward with a proud well-grounded expectation for their appl— which were disappointed by— of the—nts that no art of man can losses—only. The vessel in which the whole impr— was embarked was overtaken by— which could reach the English coasts, and—undered with all her cargo.

A very few copies only, which the learned author either kept for his use, or had sent as presents by private hands, seem to have been preserved from the destruction which awaited the others; and this work of Hellenæus has, therefore, from its scarcity, often escaped the notice of the most diligent collectors.

It is not to be found in the library of the Duke of Argyll; nor in that of the late Dr Hunter; neither Morhoff or nor Fabricius had ever seen it; the Observationes Literariæ

Frankfort in 1728, which treat learnedly and copiously on scarce books, makes no mention of it. In a word, the single treatises are so rare, that not above ten of them are to be found in all the libraries of England. And of the larger work, it does not appear that more than six copies are known to exist; one in the public library at Cambridge, a second in that of Emanuel College in the same university, long admired as a well-chosen collection of excellent books; a third in All-Souls' Library at Oxford, and two in the possession of the editor.†

* Colman had said, that the verse in the Pursuits of Literature was only "a peg to hang the notes upon." Too obvious, perhaps, but also too true, for the irritable author, who had the meanness, amongst some impotent attempts at affecting a grin of nonchalance, to tell his readers that the jest was stolen—and stolen from Pindar! Great was our curiosity on hearing this. A Pindaric jest! What could it be, and where? Was it an Olympic, or a Pythic jest? Why, Pindar, it seems, "said long before Mr Colman, ἄνευ κρηναῖα φεγγυῖα λαβὴν." And what then? He took down his harp from a peg; that is to say, a literal harp from a literal peg. What earthly connexion could that have with Mr Colman's jest? Now this, though in re hirsutissima, we regard as a downright villainy.

† There is another in the library of Shrewsbury School, left by Dr Taylor, editor of Demosthenes, to that foundation.

in a degree which took all colour of propriety from his sneers at Parr,) by a systematic pedantry, without parallel in literature. To Parr it was open, at least, to have retorted, that in no instance had he left it a matter of doubt what language it was that he professed to be writing, whether it were Greek enamelled upon an English ground, or a substratum of Greek tessellated by English. That boast was something: more by a good deal than the learned satirist could pretend to. Such a mosaic as his hyper-Menippean satire, was never seen by man; unless, indeed, it were in one imitation (the Millennium) where the author, apparently determined to work in more colours than his master, had strewed his pages with Arabic and Persian, and actually pressed upon the particular and indulgent notice of the Lord Mayor, and aldermen in common council assembled, various interesting considerations in Coptic.

By such an accuser, then, Parr could not justly be placed upon defence. But really at any bar he did not need a defence. Writing professedly as a rhetorician, he caught at the familiar commonplaces of Roman rhetoric, and golden ornaments of Ciceronian mintage, just as in English we point our perorations with the gorgeous tropes of Jeremiah Taylor, relieve the austerity of our didactic speculations with the great harmonies of Milton, or lock up our sentences with massy keystones of Shakspearian sentiment. Thus far the famous Preface was no further arrayed in borrowed plumage than really became it as an avowed bravura of rhetorical art, deliberately unfolding its "dazzling fence" in passages of effect, and openly challenging admiration as a solemn agonistic effort of display and execution. What probably misled the unfriendly critic were the continued references in the margin to Cicero, or other masters of Latinity. But these were often no acknowledgments for obligations, but simply sanctions for particular uses of words, or for questionable forms of phraseology. In this Dr Parr was even generous; for though he did sometimes leave traps for the unwary—and this he acknowledged with a chuckling laugh—still in many more instances he saved them from the snares which were offered by these suspicious cases in Latinity.

Dismissing, however, in his own contemptuous words, this false and malicious exception to Dr Parr's preface, "Quare suo, per me licet, sale nigro ille delectentur, suarque superbie morem gerant, qui me dictitant, veluti quendam ludimagistrum, ex alienis orationibus librum meum composuisse," it is very possible that there may be others with better foundation. Amongst these there is one, which we have heard most frequently pressed in conversation, and it is connected with a questio vexatissima on the general principles of modern Latin diction; was not the style hybrid, that is a composite style, owned by no one age in particular, but made up by inharmonious contributions from many? We answer firmly—No. Words there are, undoubt-

For the "absolute silliness," amongst many hundred passages of pure trifling, or exquisite nonsense, let the reader look to his long note upon Mr Godwin, and his "gun of generation;" where, under an impression that he was lashing some peculiar conceit, or caprice of that gentleman, the satirist had unconsciously engaged himself with Hume, and his Doctrine of Causation.

We say so much upon this author, because, (though almost forgotten at present,) in our younger days, he had a splendour of success, not much surpassed even by the most popular writers of this present more literary generation; and because, spite of his bad taste, his pedantry, and his mystical affectations, he had a demon of originality about him, which makes him, after all, worthy of preservation.

A strange fact it is, in Dr Parr's literary history, that this same malicious satirist, from whom he received insults so flagrant and so public, at an after period became his all but idolized friend. In saying this, we assume it as a thing admitted universally, and now scarcely needing a proof, that Mr Mathias, and the satirist in question, were one and the same person. Letters from this Mr Mathias are spoken of by Dr Parr in another period of his life, with a fervour of devotion, such as a Roman Catholic limits to the very holiest class of reliques.

edly—single words, and solitary phrases, and still oftener senses and acceptations* of words, which can plead no Ciceronian authority. But the mould—the structure—the turn of the sentence, that is always Roman, always such as Cicero would have understood and countenanced. Nay, many passages there are which Cicero could not have beat for his ears. Every sentence or period moves upon two principal determinations: its external connexion in the first place—how does it arise, upon what movement of the logic or the feeling from the preceding period? And, secondly, its own internal evolution. These moments (to speak dynamically) in the construction of sentences according to their treatment, (but, above all, in a language the most exquisitely artificial that human necessities have created,) become the very finest tests of their idiomatic propriety. In the management of these primary elements in the art of composition, Parr is a master. As to words, or separable parts, which a stroke of the pen can remove and supply, the effect, upon the whole, is little, and to modern ears, untrained by colloquial use to apprehend spontaneously the discordant association of archaisms and neologisms, scarcely any at all. Yet it is observable, that, to words only, and single phrases, the purists in Latin composition have most unwisely directed their attention.

Above all, the Ciceronian purists were famous in their day; a volume might be written on their history.

Fierce sectarianism bred fierce latitudinarianism. Was a writer Ciceronian in his words and phrases? That, for some critics, was the one demand. On the other hand, many piqued themselves on throwing off a restriction so severe, and for many subjects so disadvantageous. Some valued themselves on writing like Tacitus; some, with larger and more natural taste, like Livy. Some even were content with a model as modern as Lipsius or Strada.

In such disputes all turns upon the particular purpose which a writer has in using the Latin idiom. Why, on what considerations, honouring what old prescriptive usage, or looking to what benefit, has an author used Latin at all? For evidently, in foregoing his own mother tongue, he has wilfully forfeited much ease and some power. His motives, therefore, must be very determinate in a choice so little for his own immediate interest. If, which is the commonest case, he writes Latin merely as a lingua franca—as the general language of the literary commonwealth of Christendom, and, therefore, purely to create an extended circulation for his thoughts,—it is probable that his subject in these days will be derived from some branch of science, or, at all events, some theme treated didactically; for, as an orator, an essayist, or, generally, as a fine writer, he can find no particular temptations in a language, which, whilst it multiplies his difficulties, must naturally limit his audience. On a mere calculation of good sense, we may predict that * Dr Parr, but on what particular sense of necessity, we pretend not to conjecture, has used the words textus for text, and margo for margin; and he apologizes for them in the following words:—

“Quod textum et marginem, et alia istiusmodi verba sine ulla præfatione, et quasi ex æquo usurpavi, id ne hilem moveat inter eos.” (for inter eos we should have substituted

id he goes on to say, that spiteful critics of shallow discernment make these cavils, which possibly they would not make if aware of the answer made to them by Henry Stephens: “Item vir ille doctus et ingeniosus huc deduxit,” “nimum sane fuerit delicatæ aures, quæ talia vocalibus ferre non poterant, quum præsertim alia desint.” Well, let the question then be rested on that footing, and so decided. Nobody in the world, as the reader will collect from another part of this paper, has less sympathy than ourselves with idle cavillers, or less indulgence towards the scruples which grow out of excessive puritanism in style. Yet in these instances we do not perceive that the scruples are of that character. For we cannot perceive that the questionable words are protected by the reservation of Stephens—quum alia desint. Surely ore libri express margin, and orationis perpetuitas, or continuitas sermonis, might serve to express the idea of text, (for the body of the composition, as contradistinguished from its notes.)

his subject will, in nine cases out of ten, be one which is paramount, by its matter, to all considerations of style and manner. Physics, for example, in some one of its numerous branches, mathematics, or some great standing problem of metaphysics. Now, in such a case, if there be one rule of good taste more pressing than another, it is this—to reject all ornaments of style whatever,—in fact all style; for unless on a question which admits some action of the feelings, in a business of the pure understanding, style—properly defined—is impossible. Consequently, classical Latin, whether of gold, of silver, or of brass, is, in such a case, equally to be rejected. The reason upon which this rule stands is apparent.

Why is it that in law Latin we say, murdravit, for he murdered,—marcavit,—homagium, and so forth?—Simply because the transcendent matter in all legal discussions, the great interests of life and property which law concerns, the over-ruling importance of the necessities to which law ministers, making intelligibility and distinction of cases to be the absorbing consideration, cannot but throw into the shade every quality of writing which does not co-operate to that end; and for those qualities, which have a tendency even to clash with it, cannot but reduce them to the rank of puerile levities. The idea of felony, under its severe and exclusive limitation, according to our jurisprudence, could not be adequately reached by any Ciceronian term whatsoever; and this once admitted, it is evident that the filigree frost-work of classical fastidiousness must be allowed to melt at once before the great domineering influences of life in its elementary interests. Religion again, how much has that been found to suffer in the hands of classical precisians, to whom the whole vocabulary of Christianity,—all the technical terms of its divine economy, all its idioms*—such as grace, sanctification, sacrament, regeneration, &c., were no many stones of offence and scandal for the terms, even where they did not reject the conceptions. Now, one law of good sense is paramount for all composition whatsoever, viz. that the subject, the very ideas, for the development of which only any composition at all became necessary, must not suffer prejudice, or diminution, from any scruples affecting the mere accessories of style or manner. Where both cannot co-exist, perish the style—let the subject-matter (to use a scholastic term) prosper!

This law governs every theme of pure science, or which is capable of a didactic treatment. For instance, in Natural Philosophy, where the mere ideas under discussion, the bodies, the processes, the experiments, the instruments, are all alike almost in a region unknown and unsubjected to any jurisdiction of the classical languages,—how vain, how puerile the attempt to fight up against these natural, and for us insurmountable difficulties, by any system of clever equivocations, or ingenious compromises between the absolute barbarisms of the thing, and their nearest classical analogies. By such misdirected slight-of-hand, what is effected? We sacrifice one principle without propitiating the other. Science, defrauded of her exactness, frowns; and the genius of classical elegance does not smile. Precision is wilfully forfeited; and no real ornament is gained. Whosoever a man writes not for a didactic purpose, but for effect, whosoever the * Upon this subject, in its relation not to Latin, but to classical English, we have an Essay in our own times from a writer of great talent, Mr Foster, the Baptist clergyman. It is strange to say, that the tendency of that essay is in direct hostility to his own peculiar views; doctrinally, he contends earnestly for the peculiar tenets and mysteries of the Christian economy. Yet, on the other hand, as a man of taste, he would banish all the consecrated terms which express them. Now, this is contradictory. With the peculiar and characteristic language would vanish the peculiar and characteristic doctrines. But, apart from this consequence, it is strange that Mr Foster should overlook the analogical justification of a separate terminology, derived from so many similar cases of far less importance. For example, who complains of the Platonic theology for its peculiar vocabulary? Or, what reproach has it ever been to Jamblichus, to Proclus, to Plotinus, to Synesius, &c., that they wrote almost a sealed dialect to the profane?

composition is not a mere means for conveying truths, but its own end and final object, there, and there only, it may be allowable to attempt a happy evasion of some modern barbarism by means of its nearest Roman equivalent. For example, in a sepulchral inscription, one of the finest modes of the serious epigram, where distinction for the understanding is nothing, and effect for the natural sensibilities is all in all, Dr Parr might be justified in saying that a man died by a ballista, as the nearest classical weapon of offence to that which was really concerned in the fatal accident. But the same writer, treating any question of Natural Philosophy, could never have allowed himself in so vague a term. To know that a man perished under a blow from some engine of war acted on by a mechanical force, without distinguishing whether gun or pistol, bomb, mortar, howitzer, or hand-grenade—might be all that was required to engage the reader's sympathy. Some little circumstantiality, some slight specification of details, is useful in giving direction and liveliness to a general tone of commiseration; whilst too minute an individualization of objects, not elevated enough to sustain any weight of attention, would both degrade the subject and disturb the natural current of the feelings by the disproportionate notice it would arrogate under the unwieldy periphrasis that might be necessary to express it. But, on the other hand, in pure physics, the primary necessity of rigorous distinction would demand an exact designation of the particular implement; size, weight, bore, mode of action, and quantity of resistance, might here all happen to be of foremost importance. Something, in fact, analogous to all this, for the case itself, and for the law which it suggests, may be found in the art of gardening, under its two great divisions of the useful and the ornamental. Taste was first applied to the latter. From the art of gardening, as cultivated for picturesque effects, laws and principles of harmonious grouping, of happy contrast, and of hidden co-operation in parts remote from each other, were soon derived. It was natural that some transfer should be attempted of these rules to the humbler province of kitchengardens. Something was tried here, also, of the former devices for producing the picturesque; and the effects were uniformly bad. Upon which two classes of critics arose, one who supposed kitchengardens to be placed altogether out of the jurisdiction of taste, and another, who persisted in bringing them within it, but unfortunately by means of the very same rules as those which governed the larger and more irregular province of pleasure gardens. The truth lay between the two parties; the last were right in supposing that every mode of exhibiting objects to the eye had its own susceptibilities (however limited) of beauty, and its own rules of good taste. The first, on the other hand, were equally right in rejecting the rules of the picturesque, as applicable to arrangements in which utility and convenience presided. Beauty, "wild without rule or art, enormous bliss," (that is, bliss which transcends all norma, or artificial measurements,) which is Milton's emphatic summing up of the luxuries of Eden, obey a much wider law, and in that proportion more difficult to be abstracted than the elegance of trim arrangement. But even this has its own appropriate law of ornament. And the mistake is, to seek it by translation from some province, differing essentially, and by its central principle, from itself. Where it is possible (as in ornamental gardening on the English plan it is) to appear as an assistant, and in subordination to nature, making her the principal artist, and rather directing her efforts than positively interfering with them—there, it is certain, that the wild, the irregular, the illimitable, and the luxuriant, have their appropriate force of beauty; and the tendency of art is no more than simply to assist their developement, and to sustain their effect, by removing whatever is inharmonious. But in a system of which utility is the object, utility must also be the law and source of the beauty. That same convenience, which dictates arrangement and limitation as its own subsidiary instruments, ought to dictate these same principles as the presiding agents for the creation of appropriate ornaments. Instead of seeking a wild picturesque, which delights in concealing, or in revealing only by fits, the subtle and half evanescent laws under which it grows, good taste suggests imperatively, as the object we should court, a beauty of the architectural kind, courting order and symmetry, avowing, not hiding its own artifices, and absolutely existing by correspondence of parts.

Latin composition falls into the same or analogous divisions; and these divisions obey the same or corresponding rules. The highest form of Latin composition, ornamented Latin, which belongs to a difficult department of the higher belles lettres, clothes itself, by natural right, in the whole pomp and luxury of the native Roman idiom. Didactic Latin, of any class, in which the subject makes it impossible to sustain that idiom for two consecutive sentences, abandons it professedly, and creates a new law for itself. Even the art of annotation, a very extensive branch of purely didactic Latin, and cultivated by immense numbers of very able men, has its own peculiar laws and proprieties, which must be sought in the works of those who have practised it with success.*

For an example, in support of what we have been saying, and illustrating the ludicrous effect, which arises from a fastidiously classical phraseology employed upon a subject of science, we might refer our readers to the collection of letters between Leibnitz and various correspondents in different parts of Europe, published at Hanover by Feder, among which are some extra superfine letters by a certain Italian Abbe.

It is really as good as a comedy, to see the rope-dancing tricks of agility by which this finical Italian petit-maitre contrives to talk of electricity, retorts, crucibles, and gas, in terms that might have delighted the most delicate ears of Augustan Rome. Leibnitz pays him some compliments, as he could do no less, upon his superfine apparel; but evidently he is laughing in his sleeve at the hyperbolical pains and perspiration that each paragraph of his letters must have cost him. This Italian simply carried a pretty common mistake to a ridiculous excess. The notion is universal, that even in writing upon scientific subjects, it is right to strive after classical grace, in that extent to which it shall be found attainable. But this is false taste. Far juster, better, and more self-consistent, is the plain, unpretending Latin of the great heroes of philosophy—Lord Bacon, Des Cartes, and Leibnitz.† They court no classical ornaments, no rhetorical phrases; yet the Latin idiom, though not studiously courted, is never harshly violated. Philosophic ideas, philosophic dogmas, of modern birth, are not antedated by giving them pagan names. Terms of modern science, objects of modern discovery, are not disguised in a ridiculous masquerade of classical approximations, presenting a conjectural travesty, rather than a just and responsible translation by fair equivalents. The interests of the sense, and the demands of the primary purpose, are everywhere made the governing considerations; and whilst the barbarisms of some amongst the schoolmen are never imitated, and no idioms positively modern are adopted, the pure Roman idiom is only so far courted as it favours the ends of expedition and precision. In short, we shall not much err in making this general assertion, that a philosophic Latin style, suited to the wants of modern speculation and modern research, has gradually matured itself in the hands of the great * Amongst whom, by the way, Bentley stands foremost; whilst Porson is the least felicitous in giving a scholarlike expression to his notes.

† We may add, as equal with the very foremost of them, Immanuel Kant, whose Latin is of the best philosophic character. He had studied as a fellow-pupil with the celebrated Latinist, Ruhkenius, and had a true sense of elegance in this particular accomplishment. By the way, on this occasion we may observe, that Hobbes was a villainous writer of Latin; and the common story of Lord Bacon's value for him in that character is undoubtedly false. Not a line of the Latin De Augmentis could have been written by Hobbes.

philosophic reformers; an ancient language has bent to the pressure of new circumstances, and of modern revolutions in thinking; and it might be shewn, that it has, in fact, thrown off a new and secondary idiom, neither modern nor antique, and better fitted for dispatch, though less shewy, than that of ancient Rome; and this secondary idiom has been created in the same way, and by the same legitimate agency, as any language whatsoever, viz. by the instincts of feeling, and the necessities of the human mind. Voluntarily and consciously, man never did nor could create a language.*

The great men we speak of, as all men engaged in that function, were controlled by circumstances existing out of themselves, viz. the demands of human thinking, as they have gradually been unfolded, and the needs of experimental philosophy. In maturing their product, that neutral diction of philosophy which is neither modern nor ancient, they were themselves controlled by the circumstances we state: yet, again, as they started with a scholarlike knowledge of the ancient Roman idiom, they have reciprocally so far reacted upon these circumstances, and controlled their natural tendency, as not to suffer their own vernacular idioms to impress themselves upon their new diction, or at all to mould its shape and character.

Into these discursive notices we have allowed ourselves to wander, from the interest which attaches to every phasis of so imperishable a monument of Roman power as survives for all cultivated nations in the Roman language: and also from its near connexion with our immediate subject. Recalling ourselves, however, into that branch of our theme which more particularly concerns Dr Parr, who wrote little (if any thing) in the neutral or didactic form of the Latin idiom, but came forward boldly as a performer on the great classical lyre of that majestic language,—we have said, that in our judgment he was a skilful performer: we will add, that, in spite of his own modest appreciation of his own claims, he was much more skilful than those who have been most accredited for this accomplishment in modern England: particularly, he was superior, as a master of Latinity, to Sir William Jones and Bishop Lowth, the two most celebrated English composers in Latin through the course of the eighteenth century.

Whilst thus limiting our comparison of Parr to English competitors for the same sort of fame, we are reminded that Reiske, the well-known editor of the Greek Orators, a hasty and careless, but a copious scholar, and himself possessing a masterly command over the Latin language, has pronounced a general censure (Preface to Demosthenes) of English Latinity. In this censure, after making the requisite limitations, we confess that reluctantly we concur. Not that the continent does not keep us in countenance by its own breed of bald composers: but our English deficiencies are the more remarkable when placed in opposition to the unquestionable fact, that in no country upon earth have the gentry, both professional and non-professional, and the majority even of the higher aristocracy, so large a tactical knowledge. We have no remarkable, some of our scholars have been masters of Latinity. In former, the eminent civil editor of Demosthenes, it was, to the best of our remembrance, in connexion with some ill-natured sneer at Wolff, that furnished the immediate provocation to Reiske's remark, was a poor composer in Latin; and Porson, a much greater scholar than any of these men, as a Latinist was below the meanest of them. In fact, he wrote Latin of any kind,—such Latin even as was framed on his own poor ideal, with singular want of freedom and facility; so much we read in the very movement of his bald disjointed style. But (more than all that) his standard and conception of Latin style was originally bad, and directed to the least valuable of its characteristics. Such an adventurous flight, and a compass so wide as that of Parr, was far beyond Porson's strength of pinion. He has not ventured, in any instance that we are aware of, to trust himself through the length of three sentences to his own impulses; but, in his uniform character of annotator, timidly creeps along shore, attached to the tow-line of his text, and ready to drop his anchor on the least summons to stretch out to sea. In this, however, there is something equivocal: timidity of thinking may perhaps be as much concerned in his extreme reserve, as penury of diction. But one most unequivocal indication of incompetence as a Latin composer, is to be found in the structure of his sentences, which are redolent of English idiom. In reality, the one grave and mortal taint of English Latinity is—that it is a translation, a rendering back, from an English archetype. In that way, and upon any such principle, good Latin never can arise. It grows up by another process. Good Latin begins, as well as terminates, in itself. To write like an ancient Roman, a man must think in Latin. Every translation out of an English original must necessarily fail of becoming good Latin by any mode of transmutation that an ordinary activity can ever hope to accomplish: from its English shape, the thoughts, the connexions, the transitions, have already received a determination this way or that, fitting them for the yoke of an English construction. Even the most absolute fixtures (to use that term) in an English structure, must often be unsettled, and the whole framework of the period be taken to pieces and recast in a thoroughly Latin composition. The interrogative form must often be changed to the absolute affirmative, and versa vice; parenthetical intercalations must often be melted into the body of the sentence; qualifications and restraints added or omitted; and the whole thought, its succession, and connexion altered, before it will be fitted to receive a direct Latin version.

* Lord Bacon's style is so much moulded by his own peculiar plastic intellect, that it is difficult to separate the elements of the total compound, that part which represented individually himself, and that which belonged to his era, and position which he occupied as a revolutionary philosopher under a dominating influence of circumstances. But from the planner of a less splendid, though perhaps more sublime, mind of Des Cartes, we receive a diction which better reflects the general standard of his era. Of this diction we venture to pronounce, that though far removed from classical Latinity, it is equally far from the other extreme of barbarism, and has an modus, or modus in genere, and its own peculiar laws.

This part of our subject, and, in connexion with it, Dr Parr's singular command of the Latin idiom, we might easily illustrate by a few references to the Bellenden Preface; and there is the more propriety in a studious use of this preface, because Parr himself declared to one of his friends, [Dr Johnstone's Memoirs, p. 263,] that "there are in the preface almost all the phraseological beauties I know in Latin."

But this task we must reserve for a separate paper, which we meditate on modern Latinity. For the present, we hasten to a class of the Doctor's Latin compositions, in which his merits are even more conspicuous—because more characteristically his own.

In the epitaphs of Dr Parr, as amongst the epitaphs of this country, where a false model has prevailed—the lapidary style and arrangement, and an unseasonable glitter of rhetoric—there is a rare, almost a unique body of excellence. Indeed, from these inscriptions, we believe it possible to abstract all the negative laws which should preside in this species of composition. The sole defect is in the positive qualities. Whatsoever an epitaph ought not to be, that too frequently it is; and by examining Dr Parr's in detail, we shall find, by the uniformity of his abstinence in those circumstances which most usually offer the matter of offence, that his abstinence was not accidental; and that implicitly, as the scholastic phrase is, that is, by involution and silent implication, all the canons of a just theory on this branch of art are there brought together and accumulated. This is no light merit; indeed, when we reflect upon it, and consider how many and how able men have failed, we begin to think that Sam was perhaps a greater man by the intuition of nature, than our villainous prejudices have allowed us to suppose. But with this concession to the negative merits of the Doctor, let it not be thought illiberal in us to connect a repetition of our complaint as to the defects of the affirmative in this collection. Every art is there illustrated which can minister to the gratification of the judgment: the grand defect is in all that should affect the sensibility. It is not enough in an epitaph, that it does not shock or revolt its taste or sense of propriety—of decorum—and the convenances arising out of place, purpose, occasion, or personal circumstances. The absence of all this leaves me in the condition requisite for being suitably affected: and I now look for the positive which is to affect me. Every thing has been removed by the skilful hand of the composer, which could interfere with, or disturb, the sanctity or tenderness of my emotions: "And now then," as Lady Rodolpha Lumbercourt demands, the ground being cleared, "why don't you proceed to ravish me?" Why don't you launch your spicula and arrows, and stings of pathos? The Grecian epigrammata—that matchless head-roll of tender expressions for all household feelings that could blossom amongst those for whom no steady dawn of celestial hopes had risen—that treasury of fine sentiment, where the natural pieties of the human heart have ascended as high as a religion so unimaginative, and so little suited to the necessities of the heart, could avail to carry them—do not rely for their effect merely upon the chastities of their composition. Those graces act simply in the way of resistance to all adverse forces; but their absolute powers lie in the frank language of natural grief, trusting to its own least elaborate expression, or in the delicacies of covert and circumstantial allusion. Of this latter kind, we have a frequent example in Dr Parr himself:—when he numbers the hours even of a young man's life, he throws the attention indirectly on the affecting brevity of his career, and on the avaricious love in the survivors clinging tenaciously to the record of his too fugitive hours, even in their minutest fractions. Applied to elder persons, it becomes too much of a mechanical artifice. But, at all events, the pointed expression by any means, or artifice whatever, of the passions suited to the occasion, is far too rare in the Parrian inscriptions. One might suppose even that pious grief and tender considerum, the final cause, and the efficient cause, at one and the same moment, of epitaphs, was, in Dr Parr's estimate, no more than a lucro ponamus, something indifferent to its essence, and thrown in casually, and to boot, as a bonus beyond what we are entitled to.

Allowing, however, for this one capital defect, all the laws of good composition, and of Latin composition, in particular, are generally observed by Dr Parr; the spirit of them always:—and other important rules might be collected from his letters, or abstracted (as we said above) from the epitaphs themselves. In particular he objected, and we think most judiciously, to the employment of direct quotations in an epitaph. He did not give his reasons; perhaps he only felt them. On a proper occasion, we fancy that we could develop these reasons at some length. At present it is sufficient to say, that quotations always express a mind not fully possessed by its subject, and abate the tone of earnestness which ought to preside either in very passionate or in very severe composition. A great poet of our own days, in writing an ode, felt that a phrase which he had borrowed ought not to be marked as a quotation; for that this reference to a book had the effect of breaking the current of the passion. In the choice of his Latinity also, Dr Parr prescribed to himself, for this department of composition, very peculiar and very refined maxims. The guide whom he chiefly followed, was one not easily obtained for love or money—Morcellus de Stylo Inscriptionum. Yet sometimes he seems to have forgotten his own principles. An epitaph was sent for his approbation, written by no less a person than Louis XVIII. All the world is aware that this prince was a man of cultivated taste, and a good classical scholar. He was, however, for such a task, something too much of a Catholic bigot; and he disfigured his epitaph by introducing the most unclassical Latinity of the Vulgate. Nevertheless, Dr Parr thought proper to approve of this. Now we admit, and the spirit of our remarks already made on the Latinity suitable for scientific subjects will have shewn that we admit, cases in which classical Latin ought professedly to bend to modifications. We admit also that the Vulgate translation, from the sanctity of its authority in the Romish church, comes within the privileged class of cases which we have created for a secondary order of Latinity, deserving to be held classical in its own proper jurisdiction. Sepulchral inscriptions for Christian countries being usually in churches, or their consecrated purlieus, may be thought by some to fall peculiarly within that line. But we say—No. It would be so, were the custom of monumental inscription wholly, or in its first origin, a religious one; whereas epitaphs are primarily a matter of feeling and sentiment, not at all prescribed by religion, but simply checked and modified by the consecrated place in which they are usually erected, and by the religious considerations associated with the contemplation of death. This is our opinion, and ought to be Dr Parr's; for, in writing to Sir Joshua Reynolds on the subject of an epitaph for Dr Johnson, amongst other judicious reflexions on the general subject of Latin inscriptions, he says, "If Latin is to be the language, the whole spirit and the whole phraseology ought to be such as a Latin writer would use." Now the Vulgate translation of the Scriptures would have been nearly unintelligible in the ages of classic Rome, and nowhere more so than in that particular passage which fell under Dr Parr's examination.

Still after criticism has done its worst, and even with some instances of "vulnerable" Latinity before us, which we shall produce in our next and closing article, justice demands at our hands, in a general estimate of the doctor's pretensions, a very frank admission, that, as a master of Latinity, and pretty generally as a Latin scholar, Samuel Parr was the first man of his century. O! si sic omnia!

The laws of the Epitaph, a peculiar and most interesting branch of monumental inscription, and the modification of these laws as applied to Christian cemeteries, present a most attractive subject to the philosopher, and the man of taste in conjunction. Some time or other, permissa Superiorum, (i. e. Christophoro annuente,) we purpose to investigate them in both characters. Meantime, we shall relegate the enquirer to an essay on this subject by Mr Wordsworth, the sole even tentative approximation which we know towards a philosophic valuation of epitaphs, upon fixed principles. His essay is beautifully written, and finely conceived. The central principle of an epitaph he states thus: (we do not pretend to quote, speaking from a recollection of sixteen years back :) It expresses, or ought to express, the most absolute synthesis of the generic with the individual,—that is to say, starting from what a man has in common with all his species, the most general affections of frail humanity—its sufferings and its pleasures, its trials and triumphs, its fears and awful hopes—starting from this as the indispensable ground of a universal sympathy, it goes forward to what a man has most peculiar and personal to himself;—his talents and their special application—his fortunes, and all the other incommunicable circumstances of his life, as the ground for challenging a separate and peculiar attention. The first element of an epitaph claims the benefit of participation in a Catholic interest: the second claims it in that peculiar degree which justifies a separate and peculiar record. This most general idea of an epitaph, or sepulchral inscription, which is valid for all forms of religion, falls in especially with the characteristic humility of the Christian character. However distinguished amongst his earthly peers, yet in the presence of that Being whose infinity confounds all earthly distinctions, every man is bound to remember, in the first place, those great bonds of a common mortality—a common frailty—and a common hope, which connect him with the populous "nations of the grave." His greatest humiliation, but also his most absolute glory, lies in that mysterious incarnation of an infinite spirit in a fleshly robe, which makes him heir to the calamities of the one, but also co-heir to the imperishable dower of the other. As the basis, therefore, of all the interest which he can claim from the passing reader, as an introductory propitiation also to the Christian genius loci, and as the basis on which all his honours as an individual must rest, he begins by avowing his humanity—his absolute identity with what is highest and lowest, wisest and simplest, proudest and meanest, in all around him.

This principle must preside in every epitaph alike. There is another equally important, which should govern the conclusion; and, like that which we have just been urging, as, on the one hand, it is prompted by universal good taste, and therefore claimed its rights even under a Pagan mythology, so, on the other, it lends itself, with a peculiar emphasis, to the characteristic tone of a Christian epitaph. It is this:—we may observe that all poets of the highest class, whether otherwise delighting or not in the storm and tumultuous agitation of passion, whether otherwise tragic or epic, in the constitution of their minds, yet by a natural instinct, have all agreed in tending to peace and absolute repose, as the state in which only a sane constitution of feelings can finally acquiesce. And hence, even in those cases where the very circumstances forbade the absolute tranquillity of happiness and triumphant enjoyment, they have combined to substitute a secondary one of resignation. This may be one reason that Homer has closed, with the funeral rites of Hector, a part of the Iliad, which otherwise has been thought an excrescence. Perhaps he was unwilling to leave us with the painful spectacle of the noble and patriotic martyr dragged with ruffian violence about the walls which he had defended,—the coming desolation of Troy in prospect—the frenzy of grief in its first tempestuous career amongst the Trojan women and spectators, and the agitations of sympathy in the reader, as yet mourning and untranquillized. A final book, therefore, removes all these stormy objects, and leaves the stage in possession of calmer scenes, and of emotions more elevating, tranquillizing, and soothing:

Ὡς δὲ ἀμφότεροι τάδε ἔειπεν ἰνὸς ἡρώδαιος.

"So tended they the grave [ministered to the obsequies] of Hector the tamer of horses."

Or, to give it the effect of Pope's rhythmus,

"Such honours Ilion to her hero paid:
And peaceful slept the mighty Hector's shade."

In one sense, indeed, and for the peculiar auditory whom Homer might contemplate—an audience likely to merge the universal sense of humanity in the local sense of Grecian patriotism—the very calamities of Troy and her great champion, were the triumphs of Greece; and, so far, it might be contended that the true point of repose is the final and absolute victory of Achilles; and, in that sense, that the last book is an excrescence, or only ceremonial train to the voluminous draperies of the Iliad, in compliance with the religious usages of ancient Greece. But it is probable that our own view of the case is more correct; for there is other and independent evidence that Homer himself was catholic enough in his sensibilities to sympathize powerfully with Hector and Priam, and means his hearers to do so. Placing himself, therefore, at least for the occasion, in the neutral position of a modern reader, whose sympathies are equally engaged for Greece and for Troy, he felt the death of Hector as an afflicting event; and the attending circumstances more as agitating than as triumphant; and added the last book as necessary to regain the key of a durable equanimity. In Paradise Lost again, this principle is still more distinctly recognised, and is practically applied to the case by an artifice even more elaborate. There the misery—the anguish, at one point of the action—the despair—are absolute; nor does it appear at first sight how, or by what possibility, the reader was to repossess himself of the peace and fortitude which even the sulien midnight of tragedy requires, much more the large sunlight of the Epopœe. Paradise was lost; that idea ruled and domineered in the title; how was it to be forgotten, how palliated even, in the conclusion? Thus:—if Paradise was Lost, Paradise was also Regained; and though that event could not actually enter into the poem, without breaking its unity in the most flagrant manner, yet, prophetically, and in the way of vision, it might. Such a vision is placed by the arch angelic comforter before Adam —purged with euphrasy and rue, his eye beholds it—and, in part, the angel tells it. And the consolations which in this way reach Adam, reach the reader no less; and the reader is able to unite with our general father in his thankful acknowledgment:—

“Greatly instructed shall I hence depart;

Greatly in peace of mind.”

Accordingly, spite of the triumphs of Satan—spite of Sin and all-conquering Death, who had left the gates of Hell for their long abode on earth—spite of the pollution, wretchedness, and remorse that had now gained possession of man—spite of the far-stretching taint of the contagion, which (in the impressive instances of the eagle and the lion)* too evidently shewed itself by “mute signs,” as having already seasoned for corruption earth and its inheritance—yet, by means of this one sublime artifice, which brings together the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and end of time, the last day of man’s innocence and the first of his restoration, it is contrived that a twofold peace—the peace of resignation and the peace of hope—should harmonize the key in which the departing strains of this celestial poem roll off; and its last cadences leave behind an echo, which, with the solemnity of the grave, has also the hazy peace of the grave, and its austere repose. A third instance we have—even more direct and unequivocal, of the same principle, from this same poet, both involved in his practice, and also consciously contemplated:—in the Sampson Agonistes, though a tragedy of most tumultuous catastrophe, it is so contrived, by the interposition of the chorus, who, fixing their hopes in the heavens, are unshaken by sublunary griefs, not only that all should terminate

“In peace of spirit and sublime repose,” but also that this conclusion should be expressly drawn out in words as the great moral impetus of the drama; in which, as in other features, it recalls, in its most exquisite form, the Grecian model which it proposed, together with that fine transfiguration of moral purpose that belonged to a higher, purer, and far holier religion.

Peace, then, severe tranquillity, the brooding calm, or αλγη, of the Greeks, is the final key into which all the storms of passion modulate themselves in the hands of great poets.

“In war it self—war is no ultimate end.”†

All tumult is for the sake of rest—action, with a view to durable possession—tempest, but the harbinger of calm—suffering, the condition of permanent enjoyment. Peace, in a double sense, may be supposed inscribed on the portals of all cemeteries: the peace, in the first place, of the visible scene, as the final haven after the storms of life,—and in this sense the sentiment belongs equally to the Pagan, the Mahometan, and the Christian; secondly, the peace of resignation to the will of God, in the meek surrender at his call of those on whom our profoundest affections had settled. This sentiment is κατ’ ἔχρη, if not exclusively, a sentiment of Christianity. And this it is in which all Christian epitaphs should terminate. Hence (as, we think, Mr Wordsworth has remarked) it is peculiarly offensive to a just taste, were no higher principle offended, that despair—or obstinate refusal of consolation—should influence the expression of an epitaph. The example which we believe that he alleges of this capital fault, is from the famous monument erected by Sir Brooke Boothby to his only daughter. The closing words of the inscription are to this effect—“The wretched parents ventured their all upon this frail bark, and the wreck was total.” Here there are three gross faults: 1st, It is a rebellious expression of despair, and that within the very walls of a Christian church: 2d, As a movement of violent passion, it is transient: despair cannot long sustain itself: hence it is pointedly out of harmony with the durability of a marble record. How puerile to sculpture laboriously with the chisel, and thus invest with a monumental eternity, a sentiment which must already have become obsolete before the sculptor has finished his task! 3dly, This vicious sentiment is expressed figuratively; that is, fancifully. Now, all action of the fancy is out of place in a sepulchral record. No sentiment is there appropriate except the weightiest, massiest, and most elementary; no expression of it, except the simplest and severest.

* See the fine incidents (Paradise Lost, b. ix.) of the earliest hostility amongst animals, which first announce to Adam the immeasurable extent of the wreck.

"Calm passions there abide, majestic pains."

These great laws of feeling, in this difficult and delicate department of composition, are obeyed with more rigour in the epitaphs of Dr Parr, than perhaps anywhere else. He was himself too deeply sensible of human frailty, and he looked up to a moral governor of the world with a reverence too habitual, to have allowed himself in rash or intemperate thoughts, when brought upon any ground so nearly allied to his sacred functions. And, with regard to the expression of his thoughts, except to the extent of a single word—as for instance, reliquary, in which the metaphorical application has almost obliterated the original meaning—we remember nothing figurative, nothing too gay, nothing luxuriant;—all is chaste—all classical—all suited to the solemnity of the case. Had Dr Parr, therefore, written under the additional restraints of verse, and had he oftener achieved a distinguished success in the pathetic, as an artist in Monumental Inscriptions, we must have been compelled to place him in the very highest class.*

* The criticisms which Dr Parr received upon his epitaphs he bore impudently. He had lofty notions, with which few people had much sympathy, on the dignity of his art: magnificas apostolatum munus was his motto. And in reality, having cultivated it a good deal, and meditated on it still more, he had naturally come to perceive truths and relations of truth (for every thing intellectual yields upon investigation a world of new views) to which men in general were blind from mere defect of attention. This he felt keenly; and in some instances it must be acknowledged that the criticisms were both violent and vexatious. Could it be credited that Charles Fox, who wrote very passable Greek verses, and other scholars as good, were actually unacquainted with the true Roman sense of the word Probabilis? Dr Parr had described Johnson as probabilis poeta, meaning, of course, a respectable poet—one that wrote creditably, one upon whom approbation might justly settle. This is the true and sole use of the word in classical Latin. Ratio probabilis is an argument, &c., such as the understanding can submit to, in contradistinction to one that commands instant and universal assent. So, again, the elegant Craxius, in a passage now lying open before us, says, Probabilis orator, for a pretty good speaker. But Dr Parr's critics clearly understood the word as synonymous with verisimilis, or as answering to the English word probable, in the sense of having an overbalance of chances in its favour. If verum referens such a use of the word probabilis would be the merest dog-Latin.

THE MINISTRY'S PLAN OF REFORM.

TO THE EDITOR OF BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

London, April 8th, 1831.

SIR,—Before what I am about to write can meet the eye of the public, the plan of reform will be materially altered, or Parliament will be dissolved. This seems certain, and yet I find in it no cause for silence. In the one case no satisfactory alteration can be expected, because none has even been proposed; and in the other, the public mind has great need of information on the question. In either, I therefore can scarcely write in vain.

From divers reasons, I am a reformer. I am one of those who think that, for a considerable time, the House of Commons has been destitute of public confidence, and has managed public affairs in a most pernicious manner.

While the condemned boroughs formed only a party question, and had no injurious effect on public feeling, judgment respecting them could be evaded; but now the case is different. The Executive has solemnly arraigned them, and in common with my fellow-subjects, I am compelled to pronounce a verdict before God and my country. I cannot say that an irresponsible individual, even if he be a Peer, ought, through the accidental command of property, to be suffered to sell seats in Parliament; or, taking the matter in the best light, that such an individual ought to be suffered to bestow seats gratuitously on his relatives, or other people, at his pleasure. And I cannot say that a handful of individuals, even though they belong to the people, ought to be permitted to sell seats without caring for character, principle, or any thing, save price, in the buyers. Those who think such things lawful and innocent, may justly defend the boroughs, but I am not one of them. The question with me is, whether I will defend that which I believe, however erroneously, to be illegal and immoral; and I cannot hesitate. I might find more difficulty in deciding, if the good which flows from such means could not be reached in any other way; but my conviction is, that it is attainable through different ones of unexceptionable character.

The power of the Crown and the Aristocracy has been long rapidly declining in the House of Commons under the existing system. How? Many of the seats which supported, have been turned against, them. By what means? The lower part of the electors have become infinitely more numerous and democratic in their feelings; and in proportion as they have done this, they have ejected Tory for Whig, and Whig for Radical. At several elections, previously to the last, the Crown and Aristocratic party depended chiefly on its hostility to the Catholic claims, and when it could no longer do so, it was swept out of almost every open place. With the present system these things are certain—1. That the low, democratic party of electors will regularly increase, far more rapidly than the other. 2. That the separate press it now possesses will constantly keep its feelings in the worst state. 3. That it must, aided, as it is sure to be, by a large part of the close boroughs, command a majority in the House of Commons. In my judgment, this system is giving the Radicals all they seek, and taking from the anti-reformers all they wish to retain; it is establishing in most counties and open boroughs, what is equal in effect to universal suffrage and the ballot.

Until lately, reform was only advocated by constitutional means, and a strong party of the middle classes was opposed to it. At present, clubs are forming in all directions, for the purpose of returning violent reformers to Parliament free of expense. I believe that while the question is unsettled, they cannot be put down; and if they be not, it is morally certain that they will multiply until they convert most open places into radical close boroughs. If reform be delayed, the Whigs, at the next election, may monopolize the vast majority of open seats in both county and borough; and it will strengthen their monopoly at every succeeding one. On it every election will turn, and through it the majority of the House of Commons will be largely composed of men of the most dangerous general principles and character. Thus the condemned boroughs will practically form the parent of a great number of destructive democratic ones.

Reform is no longer a party question between Whig and Tory, but one between the Aristocracy and Democracy; instead of dividing parties, and connecting classes and interests, as it did until lately, it does the reverse. It is made by the reformers, and their press, a cause of bitter hostility to the upper classes, and a means of combining all other classes against them; through it the body of the people are led to embrace the most dangerous general doctrines. It destroys Whiggism and Toryism, Whig and Tory, in the correct constitutional sense of the terms; it arrays the poor against the rich, and the subject against the ruler; it renders the mass of the population turbulent and disaffected; and it makes a public enemy of the House of Commons. If refused, it must henceforward keep the two Houses of Parliament in opposition, not only on it, but in general feeling. The majority of the House of Commons has, in my judgment, permanently passed from the opponents to the advocates of reform.

I find in this, reason to think reform is highly expedient.

When I am asked how the monarchical government can be carried on with reform, I must reply by asking—was the Wellington Ministry able to carry it on without? Can it now be carried on by a Tory Ministry, or any other than one of reformers? When I am assured that reform will create democratic rulers and revolution, I am constrained to enquire what the refusal of it will create. The Duke of Wellington confesses that his Ministry was principally expelled from office by this question; and matters are now far worse than they were when it fell. A dissolution of Parliament at this moment would create a House of Commons decidedly hostile in general creed to the anti-reformers—violently democratic and revolutionary in every thing; and such a House would secure office to a democratic and revolutionary Ministry. If the King wish to dis-crown himself and destroy the Throne he occupies, he has only to consent to this dissolution; a single Parliament such as it would form, could scarcely fail of ensuring the exchange of the monarchy for a republic. I am told that he will consent, if reform cannot be carried without; and therefore, however deeply I may lament his error, I still must regulate my opinion by it. I believe that the government cannot be carried on without reform—that a Tory Ministry could not stand without at once granting it—and that to delay the concession of it would be highly injurious; of course I think it a matter of public necessity.

I speak thus, not to refute or blame the opinions of others, but to justify myself.

Reform therefore with me is a matter of morals, reason, expediency, and necessity; but then I must have that which they call for. I can sanction no reform which, in removing evils, will destroy things not complained of, but confessed by all to be of the highest value. In the first place, what is manifestly defective, impure, and erroneous, must be taken away; in the second, the fair and reasonable demands of the reformers must be so far satisfied that reform may no longer be a party and election question; and, in the third, all which is blameless and beneficial in the existing system must be carefully preserved.

Although so much in these days is said and written on a representative form of government, there is scarcely any thing so little understood. What are the duties and powers of the popular division of the Legislature?

It ought demonstrably to act with the utmost impartiality between interest and interest, class and class, for general benefit; and to give equal protection to every part of the community.

It ought, as a matter of paramount importance, to give that ample security to property which, in the confederation of all, forms the corner-stone of public and private wealth and prosperity.

It ought to manage the general affairs of the nation in the most wise, just, and upright manner possible.

As to powers, it virtually or otherwise appoints judges, and directs the Ministry; it makes and annuls laws, and has every thing at its mercy; in this country, it calls itself omnipotent.

The mode of electing this body is but a means—it is only an engine for attaining a given end. The distribution of the elective franchise ought clearly to be made without reference to private right and gain, and solely to form the body in the best possible manner with regard to its duties and powers.

This division of the Legislature ought not to be chosen by the Executive, because there could be no freedom; it ought not to be chosen by the Peers, because there could be little freedom and no impartial management of public affairs; but it does not follow that it ought to be chosen by the lower or middle classes. Yet such is the general conclusion. The argument really is—The Executive and Peers ought to have no share in electing the House of Commons, ergo, it ought to be elected by the less exalted part of the population. Nothing could be conceived more false in logic and principle. A House elected by either the Executive or the Peers would be more able, independent, and impartial; and would give more protection to property and right, than one elected by the classes I have named; of course the latter are not more worthy of possessing the power of election than the former.

This House ought to represent, in due proportion, every class and interest; therefore the doctrine is preposterous, that it belongs to, and ought to be chosen by, particular classes. The highest have as much right to their share of it as the lowest; and each interest has as much right to its share as any class.

But it by no means follows that the House should consist solely of men chosen by the same mode of election. It has to do much more than represent the feelings and promote the separate interests of the various divisions of the community. It has to act as both representative and judge,—not only to urge the claims of each division, but to decide on them with the utmost impartiality. Instead of being an assemblage of warring interests, a democratic engine for destroying the aristocracy, or a collection of combatants for fighting the battles of the aristocracy and democracy against each other, it is in the main an independent tribunal to shew equal favour to all—to dispense the same measure of pure and severe justice to every part of the population. It is intended to represent the community in the aggregate, in disregard of the distinctions of interest and class. The great object of representation is to make it this.

It is as essential for every interest, as it is for every class, to be duly represented; if the interest be not so represented, the individuals connected with it cannot. If one mode of election leave in effect many interests without representatives, the adoption of it alone must be in the highest degree unjust; and must have baleful operation on the public weal. Collective as well as individual benefit makes the fair and effective representation of every interest a matter of the first consequence.

The House of Commons ought to be an equitable guardian of property. This is essential for the benefit of all—of the labourer as well as the capitalist, the poor as well as the rich. If one mode of election will, on the one hand, expose property, or large masses of it, to furious attack, and, on the other, deprive it of full protection, the use of this mode alone must be confiscation, robbery, and a public plague.

It is of the first consequence that the House should contain the talent requisite for enabling it to discharge its duties and exercise its powers properly. Of course it must be highly injurious to use one mode of election only, if it exclude such talent, or any material portion of it.

It is a matter of even national preservation that the House should judge with severe impartiality between one interest or class and another, connect and harmonize the various divisions of the community, and above all things, prevent war between the aristocracy and democracy. If one mode of election will make its decisions partial and unjust, create strife amidst the divisions, and light up exterminating war between the aristocracy and democracy, the use of this mode alone must inevitably produce the fall of the empire.

The right of representation exists, that all parts of the community may have due regard paid to their sentiments and interests, but not to give ascendancy and control to any of them. Sentiments and interests are to be represented, that they may be fairly heard, but not that they may be implicitly obeyed; it is essential that the House should be duly acquainted with them, and listen to them with the utmost attention; but it is equally so that it should firmly oppose them when in error. It has to pay this regard to them, and it has also to manage the collective affairs of the empire in the best possible manner; therefore, it is not more necessary that the community should enjoy this limited right of representation, than it is that the House should possess the right of independent, impartial judgment.

Of course, the fashionable doctrine, that the House of Commons ought to be chosen solely or principally by the lower or middle classes through popular election alone, is ridiculous. The higher classes have as much right to elect it as any other, and none of them have any right beyond that of limited representation. Independence and impartiality are the grand essentials in the House, because without them, other qualifications would be mischievous or useless. It would be destitute of them, if elected by the Executive or Peers; and it would be equally so, if elected by the populace or middle classes; consequently, the two latter have no more right to elect it than the two former. To make it independent and impartial, it must be elected by the people, but not by the higher, lower, or middle part of them on private right; after allowing for the proper share of representation, it must be elected by such detached, selected parts of the people, as may be the best calculated for rendering it so. The doctrine I have named, really or avowedly strips the state—the people in their corporate character—of all right; it wholly sacrifices public right to private. It deprives the Legislature and Executive of their functions, and makes them the tools of irresponsible masses of the population. By it the right of representation is perverted into one of control and tyranny; and the trust bestowed on public grounds, is dishonestly changed into vicious private property.

I speak in the abstract according to reason, but what I say is fully sanctioned by the Constitution. The laws and institutions of this country form, on the whole, the most popular system of government ever created; in every thing they take power to the farthest point from the Executive, and secure it to the people. But—and in this consists largely their proud superiority—they make no unjust distinctions amidst the people. They include all ranks in the term, and they shew to all severe impartiality; they bestow popular trusts on the principle, not of exaltation or debasement, riches or poverty, but of qualification; they give some to Peers—they confine others to men of much property, and in all they are as jealous of the populace as of the nobility. They appoint certain individuals selected from this rank or that, on the score of fitness to discharge certain public duties; but private right is out of the question.

At the best, the House of Commons was originally formed to be the auxiliary of the Executive. For a long period it was used as the instrument of the latter, and was destitute of the independent powers it now possesses. For a long period, the Executive had the means of controlling it, in the power to add to its members. In its growth, so little regard was paid to individual and popular right, that, in many places, the vote was only given to such electors as were likely to elect men nominated by the Executive. It rose to maturity on the principle, that the power to elect should be granted with reference to the good of the state—that the popular influence in it should be carefully balanced—that the upper classes should be at least as fully represented as any other—and that a large portion of it should be wholly independent of popular influence, and even under that of the Crown.

The constitution manifests the utmost anxiety, not only in the construction of the House, but also in its privileges, and the laws to prevent the right of representation from being perverted into one of dictation. The electors, after choosing their representative, have no power over him; it is only by breach of privilege that they can know how he votes; and they are only suffered to address the House by petition. They have the power to elect, not that they may dictate to and govern the House, but that it may be composed of the most fitting men; and the power to restrain its conduct is expressly confided to other hands; every thing possible is done to make it as independent of them as of the Executive. Almost the only portion of tyranny contained in the constitution, has for its object to make the House of Commons perfectly independent and impartial—perfectly free from the dictation of electors and popular feeling, as well as from all other.

The existence of the House of Lords does much to produce the delusion, that the other House belongs exclusively to the middle and lower classes. They are not separate legislatures, having the same duties and powers; they are the two parts of a whole, and, to a large extent, their duties and powers are essentially different. The Peer is disqualified by his office for interfering with the formation of the Lower House, but his brothers and sons are not: the disqualification is a special one, resting on the individual, but not on the class. The House of Commons is to fairly represent and act for all classes—the whole population, save specified individuals; and the House of Lords exists for common good, partly to assist and regulate it, and partly to perform totally different duties. The Aristocracy must have its share in electing the former, to be placed on an equality with the rest of the community.

From all this it appears undeniable,

1. That as the House of Commons demonstrably exists to represent the community in its collective indivisible character, as well as its component parts—to act in the best possible manner for the empire in the aggregate, as well as for separate interests and classes; it is not more necessary for the parts to be fairly represented, than it is for the whole to be so—it is not more essential for the claims of the separate interests and classes to be brought properly before the House, than it is for them to be decided on with severe impartiality, on the principle of common good alone.

2. That, therefore, the system of election should be quite as anxious to make the House in the aggregate independent and impartial, as to cause the various parts of the community to be equitably represented in it.

3. That the claims to form, and dictate to, the House, put forth by these classes or those, are groundless, unjust, and destructive. The right to distribute the power to elect belongs to the state, and the right of the individual and class amounts only to this, that the distribution shall be made without favour and prejudice, in the manner best calculated to promote the general weal. The alleged right to dictate is so far destitute of foundation, that the House is chosen by the people, chiefly that it may be free from dictation: the grand essentials in the House with regard to both intention and law are, perfect independence and impartiality between man and man, class and class, electors and the population in the body, popular feeling and the interests of the empire. The system of election, therefore, after bestowing equitable representation, ought in both right and duty to dispose of the franchise in any manner that will make the House what it ought to be collectively.

Taking what I have said as my test, I find the old system of election exceedingly erroneous and defective, and the proposed new one infinitely more so. The former is generally good in principle, but faulty in provision; the latter is very faulty in both, its principle is as bad in some points, as good in others.

In the first place, the old system provides the means for enabling every interest and class to be duly represented, but it does not place them under proper regulation; therefore, they are neglected or abused. But the new one annihilates such means; while it pretends to establish equal representation, it prohibits many interests and classes from being represented.

The power of election is to be chiefly confined to two or three descriptions of people, who are the same in every place, and who have little connexion with the various interests which need representation the most. If the electors vote independently, manufacturers, merchants, shipowners, bankers, people of independent fortune—all who have on private and public grounds the best claims to representatives, will be in the minority, and have none. The members of some interests may prevail by numbers and influence, but those of various others will find it impossible to return men who are not opposed to them. The doctrine, that the members of a place represent all its electors, is of small value, because they perhaps differ from almost half these electors in creed. Granting that the bankers or shipowners of any place could prevail on its members, elected by the shopkeepers, to plead their cause; such advocates would be worthless to them, compared with others of their own electing.

The cry is, that all men ought to be fairly and equally represented, and a plan of reform is brought forward for the express purpose of causing them to be so; yet under this plan, bankers, colonial merchants, shipowners, &c. &c., will have no representatives in regard to their trades and fortunes, the matters on which representation is the most essential to them. While this is the case with them, shopkeepers, a few kinds of manufacturers and landowners, will fill the House of Commons with the advocates of their particular trades and interests, and to a large extent with the opponents of those of the divisions of the community which will be denied representatives. In respect of business and property, one part of the community is to have representatives and interested champions, but the other is to have only neutrals and interested enemies.

The criminal injustice of this can be denied by no man, for who can say that the banker and shipowner have not as much right to have their trade and property represented, as the landowner and cotton manufacturer? The injustice of it is the greater, because those who are to monopolize the representation in towns, are men who have scarcely any need of representatives in regard to their separate interests. Laws which affect exclusively the trade and property of shopkeepers, and the occupiers of small private houses, are rarely enacted; but laws affecting exclusively those of the divisions of the community which are to have no representatives, are frequently made and altered.

Ministers say their plan will give representatives to the different interests; but what is their evidence? They assert, that by giving representatives to a seaport, they give them to its shipowners. Now a seaport must of necessity be a place of much foreign and domestic trade; its merchants, shopkeepers, &c., must far outnumber its shipowners; and they conceive that the separate interests of the latter are opposed to their own. The shipowners of course must get any thing rather than representatives. Bankers, colonial merchants, &c., form a trifling minority everywhere, and it will be impossible for them to return members. There can here be neither direct nor virtual representation.

On public grounds alone, it is of the first consequence that the House of Commons should contain a due proportion of the members of every interest—should contain bankers, shipowners, and merchants, as well as landowners and cotton or woollen manufacturers. This is essential on the score of information; without it the House cannot legislate justly and wisely.

Thus then many important interests and classes are to be denied representatives, while the House is to be in a considerable degree composed of their enemies, and vast masses of attached property are to be left without protection—why? Because, forsooth! the House is to be wholly chosen by the people through one mode of election. Are not then bankers, merchants, &c., as much a part of the people as shopkeepers? And ought not the means to be made subservient to the end? Right and justice are to be sacrificed to numbers and accident; the end is to be made unattainable for the sake of the means; and equality of representation is to be destroyed, that a certain system of election may be established.

I am blaming the plan, not for giving representation to shopkeepers and others, but for denying it to the rest of the people. I insist that all ought to be made equal, and that it is the height of injustice to give some parts of the people the power to elect representatives identified with them in opinion, feeling, and interest, and refuse it to other parts—to enable one portion of the community to send into Parliament men hostile to the trade and property of the other, and to prohibit the latter from sending into it defenders.

Under the existing system, if an interest be too weak in numbers to obtain seats in any other manner, it can buy those of a small borough: or its more wealthy members can, on their own account, gain seats in a similar way, without the risk, cost, and pledges of a contest. I grant that the means are impure and defective, but I can only surrender them on condition that the same end shall be gained by others of better character.

It is of great public consequence that the moneyed interest should be duly represented—suppose, therefore, that the banks were permitted to elect from bankers as their members. The case is the same touching the shipping interest; therefore suppose the shipowners of a few of the principal ports were suffered to elect two members from amidst themselves. How would this operate?

With regard to means, it would be even more unexceptionable than the mode of election prescribed by the new plan; the members would be elected exclusively by the people in the most pure and independent manner. In respect of the end, bankers and shipowners would be represented precisely as landowners and shopkeepers are to be.

This might be extended to every interest which is of sufficient public value to deserve representatives, and too weak to gain them by the common mode of election. It is essential for placing the people on an equality; that part of them which would gain representatives through it, would possess no real advantage over the other, and must be destitute of them without it. Thus the benefits of the existing system might be preserved, enlarged, and regulated.

What can be said against it? Will any one assert that the means ought not to be varied and extended for the purpose of giving equal representation; or that if great masses of the people cannot gain representatives by one mode of election, they must be restricted from the use of any other? No. But I am recommending something new—well, a change is forced on me, and I am only struggling to make it a proper one: I merely advise new means to secure an old end.

In respect therefore of just and equal representation, the plan of Ministers is extremely erroneous and defective; it will give the contrary from this, it will leave property to a vast extent without protection. It confines the power of election in a great measure to those whose property is in no danger, and who seek to destroy that of others. The new electors are in the overwhelming majority anxious to invade the property of the fundholders, the church, the East and West India colonists, &c.; yet this property is to have no special defenders. Ministers entertain projects hostile to the property of the colonial, shipping, and various manufacturing interests; yet these are to have no representatives. Enormous masses of continually assailed property will thus be left defenceless. I can pay no regard to the doctrine that the influence of property will compensate for the want of numbers, because every one knows that this influence must be constantly divided against itself. The property of landowners and manufacturers weighs against that of fundholders and West India colonists—the property of merchants weighs against that of shipowners—the property of one mercantile or manufacturing interest weighs against that of another; what then becomes of the doctrine? The plan of Ministers is, in a large degree, one to strip attacked property of protection.

Let me now speak of talent, the admission of which is essential for preventing the House of Commons from being a public nuisance. I advocate no indiscriminate admission of it for its own sake, therefore what does the public weal call for?

The House ought to be the great teacher and guide of public feeling, and it can only be made so by talent and eloquence. From its possession or lack of these, it must be trusted and followed, or despised and opposed, by the people—it must make popular opinion a subordinate and auxiliary in the production of prosperity, or a leader in destroying the empire. Talent without eloquence will not do; in times like these, eloquence of the most powerful description is indispensable.

The talent and eloquence must be combined with a due portion of information and experience. The leaders of the House ought to follow politics as a regular and laborious profession; if an apprenticeship and constant practice be essential for making a man a good mechanic, they must be far more so for making him a good statesman. They should, therefore, be always in it, to be practised in debate, familiarized with public business, and enabled to gain the requisite influence over both it and the public mind. If a man sit in one Parliament and be excluded from the next, his exclusion will drive him from public life, or incapacitate him for excelling in it: in addition, it must cause almost half the most valuable part of his political life to be lost.

This relates to those who follow politics as a profession for the sake of obtaining office; but the presence in the House of other able men, possessed of a totally different kind of knowledge and experience, is also necessary. These are men intimately and practically acquainted with the agricultural and trading interests of the empire—experienced landowners, manufacturers, merchants, bankers, &c. They know little of general politics, but their knowledge of their respective trades is of the first value in every respect. The House needs them as much as the leaders.

The House is, and ought always to be, divided into two great parties, which eternally war against each other on opposite creeds for the sake of office. Upon this division depends every thing dear to the community. It is the vital principle of the great constitutional balance, and the bulwark of popular rights and liberties. It gives power and worth to the House of Commons; and is essential for preventing it from becoming a destructive tyrant, or a servile instrument of tyranny.

It is not more necessary that talent should be admitted into the House, than it is that the part which seeks office should be equally divided between the two great parties. In order that the conduct and measures of the Executive may be duly scrutinized—its errors may be effectually exposed and resisted—and proper successors to the Ministry may be found, in case it be incapable and act on bad principles—it is essential for the heads of Opposition to be fully equal to Ministers in talent. This is a vital matter. Every one may see that if Sir R. Peel and a few other leaders of Opposition were out of existence, their followers could do nothing; Ministers would have a monopoly of the House and power, no matter how they might act.

It is essential that the professional talent, or that which seeks office, should enter the House perfectly free from bond and bias with respect to any class or interest. If Ministers owe their seats to the landed interest or the manufacturing one, to the aristocracy or the democracy, they must gain them by improper pledge and prejudice, retain them by unjust conduct, and be interested, factious partisans, but not independent, impartial rulers. If the heads of Opposition gain seats in the same way, similar evils must flow from it. The war between the two bodies, instead of being a wholesome party one for general good, must be a destructive one, to enable different interests, and the aristocracy and democracy, to ruin each other. This is also a vital matter.

The existing system provides for the admission of professional talent. It admits it free of cost and risk equally on both sides, gives it a certainty of being constantly in the House, and makes it reasonably independent of class and interest. It, however, makes no proper provision for admitting the other kind of talent, and in this it is very defective.

What is the new plan to do? In this age, which boasts so eternally of its intellect and knowledge, a plan is produced for reforming the House of Commons. It is panegyricized as perfection; and yet, instead of creating means for giving the House the necessary share of talent and information, it destroys them; it intentionally sweeps them away where they already exist, without even wishing to replace them with others. It is to reform the House, by expelling from it eloquence, wisdom, experience, understanding, and knowledge. The amazing fact proves either that its parents are ignorant and imbecile beyond conception, or that they deserve to be impeached for attempting to sacrifice the empire to faction.

What made the House of Commons that glorious assembly of freemen it has been, on the confession of Ministers? Its talent and eloquence, its experience, intelligence, and wisdom—its glorious assemblage of splendid ability—the means it possessed of drawing into it the master spirits of the time, and enabling them both to cultivate their powers to the utmost, and employ them in the most beneficial manner. And, above all, that glorious band of gifted, independent freemen it contained as the Opposition.

Why are the things which made it such an assembly to be taken from it? Have modern inventions and discoveries ascertained that talent ought to be excluded? No, reply Ministers, it should still be admitted. Do democratic interests call for the exclusion? Its evils will fall chiefly on the democracy: it will confine seats to aristocrats and men of large fortune, and wellnigh destroy the popular side of the House in regard to power and use. It is really a most unjust and odious aristocratic monopoly.

But, say Ministers, talent will still gain admittance. How?—I put the question touching means, description, and quantity. On a matter of such vital importance to the empire, nothing less than conclusive demonstration will satisfy me or any patriotic man.—Where, then, is it? There is none; all is worthless assertion, flatly opposed to reason and fact.

Ministers tell me there are to be no more close boroughs, and I am bound to believe them; according to them, seats are only to be obtained through popular election. A young man, on commencing political life, has no name to gain him a seat; of course he will only be able to gain one by sacrificing a large amount of private fortune, under the risk of being rejected: if he succeed, he will know that his constituents will scarcely elect him a second time, and that he can only enter the House again by similar cost and risk. He must pay, on the average, a thousand per annum for his seat, and be certain that, for about half his life, he will be without one. This must be the case, unless he be in office. Granting that he might have the requisite fortune, he would still be sure that he could not be constantly in Parliament to cultivate politics as a profession with hope of success.

Would the Pitts, Burkes, and Canning have entered the House under such a system? Impossible. It either imposes on rising talent a positive prohibition, or takes from it all inducement; under it none but men of large independent fortune—such men as rarely make accomplished ministers and legislators—can devote themselves to the service of their country in the higher departments of political life; and they must be denied the means for properly qualifying themselves.

The plan thus destroys the only nursery of legislative and ministerial ability—the great source from which both Parliament and the Cabinet draw their talent and efficiency. As it is to prohibit men from gaining eminence, I need say little of the assertion put forth by its parents, that eminent men will always find seats. Every one knows that if a man be on the unpopular side, his talent and fame alone will cause him to be rejected by the electors of populous places. At the best, the eminent men of one party only will be able to enter Parliament, and they must do it by pandering to popular passion and delusion; those of the other party will be excluded by their eminence. It is the common practice of every Ministry to prevent as far as possible the election of its more formidable opponents; every talented member of the Opposition will constantly have to sustain a furious contest, in which his adversary will be supported by the mighty means of Government; taking into account defeat as well as victory, his seat, when he may possess one, will probably cost him three or four thousand per annum.

Reason and probability may be put out of sight, for popular election has been most abundantly tried, and it has almost invariably excluded men of talent and eminence, if they have not been demagogues or Ministers. Need I point to the Burkes and Sheridans, or to the wretched means by which Fox won its favour? Need I say that it has twice excluded Lord J. Russell himself, that it has always treated Lord Brougham in the same uncourteous manner, and that, at the last election, it even excluded every Minister who appealed to it? Can any one be ignorant that the greatest statesmen, up to the present moment, have generally been destitute of the pecuniary means for maintaining a contest, though success might be certain; and that therefore they have been, if out of office, at the mercy of the Ministry with regard to popular election? It is inconceivable how a Minister can be hardy enough to assert, in the teeth of conclusive experiment, that, under the new plan, eminent men will always be sure of seats; and it is still more so, how any one can be simple enough to believe him.

If the more eminent leader on the unpopular and opposition side could get a seat, the case would be different with his less gifted associates, and he could do nothing without them. At present, Mr Herries, Mr Goulburn, Mr Croker, &c., are as necessary in Parliament as Sir R. Peel: each has his particular department of public business in which he is skilled; therefore, each Minister has an able inspector; the whole are wanted in council and debate as an Opposition, and they would be so should Sir Robert be called on to form a Ministry. If Parliament were now dissolved, nearly all, by the new plan, would be excluded from the next. Should Sir Robert be returned, he would be powerless from the absence of supporters. It is of the first consequence on public grounds, that the leaders of the Opposition should be all in Parliament.

Thus the plan will enable any Ministry, no matter whether Whig or Tory, to exclude the body of its talented opponents, by subjecting them to ruinous contests, and employing its gigantic means of seduction and intimidation against them; this must be especially the case if it belong to the popular party in creed. Saving the individual, there must be in the House no constitutional opposition talent. For very many years previously to 1825, the plan would have regularly excluded nearly all the Whig talent; and it would now treat that of the Tories in the same manner. Its natural operation must be to exclude always that of one party or the other; and the natural operation of this must be to divest both of talent.

Ministers must, of necessity, be in Parliament; therefore, the plan creates new, and most reprehensible qualifications for office. A Minister must have the nerve to brave the unpopularity of a contested election, the meanness and vice to practise the arts of one, and—assuming that the public money will not be corruptly wasted in returning him—either a considerable fortune, or the dishonesty to contract debts he cannot pay. To the inferior ones, it must be equivalent to about a total loss of salary; and it is grossly unjust, because it compels a public servant to dissipate his private property in the discharge of his public duty. They must be in the body elected by some particular interest or class—by the landed interest, or the trading one, the aristocracy, or the democracy; and this must make them, in pernicious pledges and measures, the partisans of one part of the community against the other.

Here, then, is a plan of reform which will prohibit rising talent from entering the House, save as the menial of the Ministry, incapacitate it for acquiring the requisite cultivation, and repel it from the public service—which will cause eminent men, if they be not in office, to be excluded from the House by their powers and fame—which will enable the Ministry to expel from the House every gifted opponent—which will strip the popular, or opposition side of the House, of effective ability—and which will divest both the House and the Cabinet of talent.

And is it spared by public indignation? If the glories which blaze round the House of Commons of England be noticed no longer, can pounds, shillings, and pence call forth no ignoble effort for their own preservation, by pleading what they have gained from its talent and eloquence in victories over foes, acquisitions of territory, and increase of trade and riches? Do not the lightnings of talent flash on the unhallowed attempt to subject to spoliation, bondage, oppression, and destruction? Are not the young Burkes and Sheridans, who are struggling with poverty and obscurity, appealing to public justice against this sordid and guilty measure for closing to them the path of patriotism, dignity, and immortality? Alas! alas! at least let it no longer boast the insane support of its intended victims!

How this will operate on public interests, may be in some degree gathered from what I have stated. If it be necessary for both sides of every great question to be carefully examined by the House and the country, it is equally necessary for the House to contain a sufficient number of gifted men, and for them to be fairly divided between both sides of it. Yet this plan must confine the talent to one side, and thereby prevent scrutiny, debate, and correct judgment. The Ministry, partial, interested, and incapable, will have no eloquent men; and, therefore, no party of moment to contend with. If I were asked what would be the means for enabling a Ministry under the constitution to keep constant possession of office, and make itself practically despotic, my reply would be—give it the power to exclude talented opponents from the House of Commons; by this you will give it the House, the voice of the House, and a sufficiency of the Press; you will put the King under its feet, and prohibit the formation of another Ministry.

With regard to the other description of talent, although the present system makes no adequate provision for introducing a proper portion of it into the House, it still makes much more than the new one will do. An able banker, merchant, or manufacturer, may now be certain of obtaining a seat for a certain sum of money; he must pay the price, but he is sure of receiving for it the desired equivalent. Under the new system, he must depend on the choice of electors who notoriously select for any thing rather than ability; and he must generally expend a large sum of money, with the chances against his success. This system will exclude all such men, save in the exception.

All sides declare that talent ought to be admitted; why, therefore, is nothing done to gratify this unanimous national feeling? Because the sages of the Cabinet can only allow one mode of election. In forming anew such an assembly as the House of Commons, it is to be divested of the leading essentials for enabling it to discharge its duties, and preventing it from being a public scourge, merely that its members may be all elected in the same manner, by the same descriptions of people. Rail no more against the ages of darkness and barbarism! Is it impossible to give the House the proper quantities and varieties of talent, without trenching on the rights of the people? I say no; and that to refuse it them, is to trench in the most unpardonable manner on these rights. I cannot tolerate the miserable error that the people's rights call for the sacrifice of their interests—that to enjoy their rights, they must possess a House of Commons which will ruin them.

If one mode of election will not give the House the requisite portion of talent, another mode that will do so is the sacred right of the people, and it is a practicable matter. With regard to the Ministry, there could be no difficulty. It is of the first consequence that Ministers should be perfectly independent and impartial between the different divisions of the community, and that they should not be permitted to employ the mighty means they possess in corrupting and intimidating electors. If the same man be both a minister and a representative, he must betray his trust in the one character or the other. On every principle of public good, they ought to have seats in virtue of office. If the Cabinet were allowed to dispose of any number of seats, for example twenty, this could not be abused; interest would compel it to give the seats to the most worthy occupiers. There would be no boroughmongers to treat with, or popular electors to bribe; the election would be pure, and it would only give seats to men compelled by the public service to possess them.

The difficulty would lie with the Opposition, and I think it might be surmounted. It is, as I shall soon shew, as essential for the Opposition leaders as for the Ministers to be independent and impartial between the divisions of the community; and, of course, it is equally essential that they should enter the House by other means than popular election. They are generally too well known to admit of mistake. Suppose a power were vested in any proper quarter, for example, with the independent and non-political part of the judges, to name at every election a fixed number of them, they being, as an indispensable condition, the heads of the great Whig or the great Tory party; and then, that this number should dispose of twenty seats. This would give the Opposition no more really than it now possesses; there would be no boroughmongers or bribery; and I think abuse in every way might be prevented. The seats would be disposed of under responsibility to Parliament.

I believe the feeling is general, that Ministers ought to have seats in virtue of office; in truth, it is a matter of clear right to them, if they ought to be in the House. Let it be remembered, that the Opposition is on public grounds quite as necessary as the Ministry—that the seats of the former will be on the popular side, while those of the latter will be on that of power—that the Opposition seats will not only neutralize the Cabinet ones, but be in all cases a clear gain to the people—that the Opposition leaders can only, in the body, gain regular admission into the House by some such means—and that they toil most laboriously in the public service without stipend: let all this be remembered, and every man who is willing to give free admission to Ministers, will be still more so to give it to the heads of Opposition.

This would be equivalent to bestowing ten close boroughs on each side of the House of Commons—to enabling each side to elect twenty members as its leaders. It would interfere with the vote of no man, and leave every county and borough perfectly independent. Virtually, the occupiers of the free seats would be elected by the community at large. The Whig leaders are practically chosen by the Whig part of the population, and the Tory ones by the Tory part; both would therefore be really chosen by the community to fill and dispose of the seats for its benefit. The seats could not on either side be gained and retained by any thing save unrestrained, unbiassed popular choice; therefore they would not infringe in the least on popular election. Of course, they would be wholly free from the objections which attach to the close borough ones. Half the population spontaneously, enthusiastically, and on talent and desert alone, selects certain men as its political leaders; it declares, that they ought not only to be in Parliament, but to possess the Cabinet; and am I to be told that there is in this no national suffrage—no popular election? Am I to believe that these men ought to be excluded Parliament, if they cannot severally enter it by means of the prejudiced, interested, corrupt votes of some county or borough? I must not be so deluded. If these men were suffered to enter the House of Commons in the way I have described, they would really be more independently, impartially, and popularly elected,—they would really possess a more diversified, pure, numerous, popular, and unexceptionable constituency—than its other members.

If the weaker interests were suffered to have representatives in the manner I have mentioned, this would secure to the House a proper portion of the other kind of talent. Bankers, merchants, &c. &c., would be sure of gaining seats gratuitously on the score of ability and intelligence. This ought to be suffered for qualifying the House to do its duty, if even equal representation be disregarded.

Let me now look at the plan with reference to its provisions for making the general decisions of the House of Commons independent and impartial.

The great end of free government is to enable the majority of rank, talent, intelligence, and property, as well as numbers, to rule the minority in matters of opinion and expediency; but to place both on a level in matters of right and privilege: it is to make the rights and privileges of the minority wholly sacred and secure against the majority—to protect the former from the latter. The House of Commons exists as a means of gaining such government; and of course, in forming it, the great end of representation is to make it perfectly impartial, just, and equitable towards all, and between the majority and minority—to render it the effectual protector of the latter against the former.

It follows, that, if the majority be suffered to prevent the minority from being duly represented in the House, and to govern the decisions of the latter, there can be no equality of right and privilege—there can be no freedom; a tyranny must exist of the most guilty and destructive character.

The representative of an interest or class must, in the nature of things, be a partial, prejudiced, interested man; he offers himself to his constituents, because he holds their opinions; he perhaps belongs to them; and he is sent to Parliament to advocate their separate interests against those of the rest of the community. In matters which affect all equally, for example, foreign policy, the criminal laws, &c., there is nothing to incite one part of the people to seek the injury of the other; but matters of unequal operation, such as taxes, laws which affect trade, property, labour, &c., impel the various divisions of the community to continually seek the spoliation and ruin of each other. Such a representative must be in most things a mere partisan, not more anxious to promote the interests of one division, than to ruin those of another.

Compose the House wholly of such men, and it must of necessity be in the majority grossly partial and solicitous on mercenary, private grounds, to injure, rob, and distress a vast part of the people. Give the majority to those who are hostile to taxes, and it will plunder the public creditor—give it to those who wish to abolish the Corn Law, and it will ruin the landed interest—give it to those who are hostile to the church, and it will overthrow her.

While, therefore, it is essential for the House to contain the representatives of every interest and class, and to be composed of them to the extent requisite for causing it to pay the most prompt attention to complaint and grievance, and examine carefully the calls of popular feeling; it is equally essential, that, in its deliberative, ruling part, it should be composed of totally different men—men who represent only the community in the aggregate. It is not more necessary that a large part of the House should represent the separate interests and classes, than it is that a large part should not do so.

The old system stands on this, but its provisions are very defective. Its independent seats have in a large degree fallen into the hands of improper electors; they can be obtained by unfit men, and nothing is attached to them to impel their occupiers to labour zealously for the general good alone.

But what is the new plan? It labours to compose the House solely of partial, interested representatives of separate interests and classes; to such an intolerable extreme does it carry this, that, in order to make Ministers such representatives, it disqualifies them for discharging their official duties. The evil would be the less, if it gave equal representation; because the many kinds of the warring partisans would in some degree neutralize their powers of mischief. But in its most unjust disposal of representation, it confines it mainly to interests and classes which are sure to use it in the most destructive manner to the general weal. It divides the electors into two great parties—the one consisting in the vast majority of small and middling town housekeepers, who are everywhere the same in interest and feeling; and the other of the agriculturists; and it expressly makes them the democratic and aristocratic parties. It involves them in a war of extermination, first on interest as the trading and agricultural bodies; and then on feeling, privilege, and power, as the democracy and aristocracy.

The representatives must of necessity be what the electors are. The House of Commons therefore must be divided into the trading and democratic party, on the one hand, and the agricultural and aristocratic one, on the other.

A popular form of government, in every other country where it has been fully tried, has led to public ruin and slavery. Why? Because it produced war between poor and rich, the democracy and aristocracy. The same cause must in any nation produce the same effect. The fratricidal strife must be between physical power, aided by minister, legislator, and the suspension or perversion of legal law, against moral; and victory must be with the party of destruction. The British Constitution has long, in glorious contrast, been the parent of every benefit, because it has protected us from the baleful war. We have had, not democrats and aristocrats, but Whigs and Tories—names as ridiculous and unmeaning as heart could desire, but invaluable for being so. Instead of arraying class against class, they have united high and low; and have only compounded parties from equal portions of each to struggle for general advantage.

If there be one thing which in a free country ought to be prevented above every other, it is this war of class—if there be one thing which ought to be guarded against above every other in the formation of such a body as the House of Commons, it is the entrance into it of this war. Light up the latter in the Legislature, and it must feed the conflagration in every quarter until all is consumed.

That which ought to be so especially guarded against, is to be especially produced: the House of Commons is to be remodelled, that it may be filled with the infuriated combatants of democracy and aristocracy, and made an engine for converting the whole population into such combatants. Whigs and Tories are to be turned out of it and destroyed; all who might moderate, disarm, or keep apart the hostile bodies, are to be scrupulously excluded. Ministers must be democrats or aristocrats, the Opposition leaders must be the same, and the struggles of public men for office must be in the most powerful party struggles to confiscate, plunder, and enslave—to overturn institutions and ruin the empire.

This is to be the case when war between the democracy and aristocracy has already placed every kind of property in jeopardy, dragged the empire to the threshold of revolution, and produced every conceivable proof that the King, Ministry, and Legislature, ought to leave nothing undone for its suppression. Human blindness and infirmity never before exhibited such an error.

Is it impossible to reform the House of Commons without composing it wholly of interested conflicting partisans, and making the most powerful division of it consist of men anxious to destroy the property of the funded, landed, colonial, and various other interests, and to pull down the aristocracy, with every thing else that supports the monarchy? If it be, reform must suffer this House to detail grievances and utter speeches; it must take away its power of judgment and lawmaking. But it is not impossible.

The public weal imperiously demands that Ministers shall be wholly free from influence and bias, and of course shall not represent any interest or class. It demands the same touching the Opposition leaders. The latter, as well as Ministers, have to labour for all parts of the people with the utmost impartiality, and they must occupy office in case of change. Every public man who seeks office, ought to be strictly preserved from the control or influence of separate interests and classes. Place the heads of the two great parties in the House, by some such means as I have named, to represent the whole community, but not any parts, and how will it operate? Reply shall be furnished by the history of the past.

Hitherto the voice, control, and direction of the House, have been possessed by men of talent and honour, who have not been sent into it by popular election, and who have had deep personal interest in combining the aristocracy and democracy. They have really been put into it to contend with each other for the Cabinet,—and their hope of success, emolument, dignity, and fame, has laid in labouring to gain equal favour with the aristocracy and democracy—keep them in harmony—and confine the party divisions of the House to contention for general good, without reference to class and interest. From this, if elections have been decided by war between aristocrat and democrat, the representatives have not been able to carry it into the House; on entering the latter, they have found it engaged in a totally different war, and if they have attempted to introduce that of class, they have had its talent, eloquence, and party power turned against them. The Opposition has had the same interest as the Ministry in opposing them. Thus representatives, in spite of creed and ground of election, have been compelled to leave aristocratic and democratic distinctions at the door of the House, and to be in it merely Whigs and Tories, placing all classes on an equality.

This has always had the best effect in keeping the destructive strife of class from elections and the community at large. The eloquence and example of the House have been constantly directed against such strife, and its division into Whig and Tory has compelled candidates and electors to divide themselves in the same manner.

Let it be observed, that these invaluable benefits have been drawn in a pre-eminent degree from the talent, number, and independence, of the Opposition leaders. By them, principally at elections, and in the House, the low democratic party has been restrained from possessing ability and power. The new plan must prohibit Whigs and Tories, save in the exception, from leading the Opposition, and substitute for them furious democrats, dependent for seats, and every thing, on their advocacy of the worst doctrines.

Make then, I say, the heads of the two great constitutional parties the representatives only of the whole people in the body—the impartial tribunal to listen to the representatives of, and decide between, the contending parts. To aid them, give the weaker interests representatives, as I have recommended. The latter will be in a large degree neutral between the aristocracy and democracy, and they will operate to temper, restrain, and connect both. To make this independent part of the House more powerful, and form the proper balance in itself, give four members each to the Universities, and a certain number to people of independent fortune only. To confine the votes in a town to such people, is a thing to be avoided; but if it were done in two or three towns, and a district jointly, without taking away what the new plan is to give, it would be free from objection. Suppose that in two or three towns, and a surrounding district, such inhabitants as are not in any business or profession, and possess a yearly income of not less than one hundred pounds, arising from the rent of land and houses, or the interest of money, were permitted to elect two representatives; the towns and district being to possess in addition what the plan of Ministers is to bestow. This would make representation more perfect, it would, in truth, give it to a most valuable part of the people which otherwise will have none, and it would make no invidious distinction; the smaller housekeepers and freeholders would still have their representatives.

What I on the whole advise is this—give twenty members to each side of the House of Commons, in all forty, who shall be independent of both the aristocracy and democracy separately considered, and incited by personal interest to labour impartially for their union and mutual benefit. To make them so, let them represent not this class or that, but the whole population; therefore let them be selected, not by this class or that, but really by the community in the aggregate. Make them the great teachers and guides of the House; and to do this, let them be men of the first talent, eloquence, information, and experience. Then place in the House a considerable number of men able and experienced in commercial matters, and add to them a number more to be chosen only by unconnected individuals of independent property; let the whole be as far as possible independent and disinterested between Whig and Tory, Democrat and Aristocrat, and the representatives of great masses of property, intelligence, and virtue alone. Having composed the House in this manner to the extent requisite for making it an independent, impartial, and wise judge, let the remainder of it consist of the representatives—the counsel—the interested partisans—of the great clashing interests and passions.

I maintain, that if the House be not formed in some such manner, it will be utterly incapable of discharging its duties—it will be the reverse of what it was ever intended to be—it will be a source of robbery, confiscation, bondage, and public ruin.

Is there any thing in it adverse to the just demands of the reformers? No. They crave the destruction of the aristocratic close boroughs, and I surrender them: they call for the abolition of the rotten democratic boroughs, and I consent; they ask for equal representation, and I join them; they insist that every member shall be chosen by the people, and by an unexceptionable constituency, I also insist on the same. But when they assert that there shall be unequal representation—that great bodies of the people, and vast masses of property, shall have no representatives—that the people in the aggregate shall be unrepresented—and that the House shall consist solely of the interested partisans of the great warring divisions of the people, and be wholly disabled for acting wisely, impartially, and uprightly—I protest against it as the extreme of injustice. I make my protest in the name of the people, for the sake of their rights, as well as interests.

But, Ministers plead, the wish of the people must be complied with. If this be true, without reference to the character of the wish, why have a House of Commons, or any other Legislature than public meetings? When it is in error, the duty of Ministers is to alter the wish, but not institutions; the people must be instructed by the Executive, but not obeyed.

Another vicious feature in the plan is, it gives the franchise to the town occupier, and refuses it to the country one. In a town, the man who pays a rent of ten pounds, and does not possess twenty, is to be an elector; but in the country, the farmer who pays a rent of five hundred or one thousand pounds, and employs a capital of ten thousand, is to have no vote, unless he have a lease for twenty-one years. Leases of this length are so rare, at least among English farmers, that only exceptions amidst the latter will have votes from occupancy. The operation will be this—in country towns and villages, small tradesmen and labourers will have votes, but people of independent property, statesmen, and the majority of substantial farmers, will have none. While the plan pretends to give the franchise to the middle classes, it in the country withholds it from them. The officiating clergy must, to a large extent, have no vote.

The plan gives the freehold vote to leasehold property. Now the owner of such property has only an interest in it of limited duration, and if it consist of buildings, the ground on which they stand gives such vote to another individual. Thus a single house may give the franchise to three individuals, viz. the owner of it, the owner of the ground, and the occupier; it may give the county franchise to two. The possessor of money on mortgage, or in the funds, has a perpetual interest in it, therefore he has a far greater right to the vote than the possessor of leasehold buildings. The gross injustice committed here, has nothing to palliate it. Without it, the leaseholders as a class will be, in occupancy and power over tenants, perhaps more efficiently represented than any other. The effects will be of the worst kind; it will operate to cause agricultural members to be elected by the enemies of agriculture.

Want of local knowledge will not permit me to speak of Scotland, and the same want will only suffer me to mention Ireland, with reference to Protestant and Catholic. On this point the plan bears the most atrocious character.

Every one knows that the Protestants form a small minority, and of course that they must have no members, save by accident, if numbers only are to govern the elections. Yet, the members are to be chosen by numbers; therefore, if the Protestants do not happen to possess the majority in some place or other, they must have no representatives. All is left to chance. The Catholics are rapidly obtaining the county members, and by this plan they will at once get many of the town ones: if they only multiply in the same ratio as the Protestants, they must continually gain greatly on the latter in every place. Thus the plan gives the Catholics most of the members in the first moment, and ensures them early possession of the remainder.

I once more say, that there can be no just and equal representation, if every class and interest be not directly represented, without reference to majority and minority of population. Yet the classes, interests, property, and rights of the Protestants are to be deprived almost wholly of representatives, on the pretext—oh! shame on the incapacity and criminality!—that it is necessary for giving proper representation to every part of the people.

What are the Catholic electors? Men in the mass hostile to the rights, property, religion, and even existence of the Protestants. What are they in general moral qualification? Men in the body slaves to priests and demagogues, turbulent, disaffected, and clamorous for the dismemberment of the empire.

When this is notorious, and when the influence of landlords and property is already destroyed, not a single effort is made to give representatives to the upper classes, Protestants, property, agriculture, and trade. In Ireland, no interest must have representatives save that of Catholicism—no part of the people must have them, except Catholic priests and demagogues.

What is pleaded in defence of this monstrous folly and guilt? The will of the people, forsooth! What people? They are all comprehended in the redoubtable O'Connell. Are not the Protestants part of the people? Do not the landowners, manufacturers, and merchants, belong to the people? No, replies the plan, quite the contrary. If Earl Grey can no longer discharge his duty and exercise the independence which has hitherto been the right of the Prime Minister of England, let him at least cease to act the slave; let him surrender his office to the dictative demagogue.

The most imperious state necessity at this moment exists for confining power as far as possible to the Protestants, and attaching them in the utmost degree to England; in the teeth of it, here is a measure for stripping them of power, and forcing them into the ranks of traitors.

It must be remembered, that for some time, Irish elections have turned on the war between the aristocracy and democracy—that the former is completely beaten—and that Irish members will be elected on furious democratic doctrines, and sent to inflame and aid the democratic party of Britain.

Looked at especially with reference to this, as well as on other grounds, the annihilation of so many English members by the plan is exceedingly reprehensible. While Ministers affect anxiety to divide power fairly, and give the preponderance to the right side, they first destroy a large number of Protestant representatives, and add greatly to those of the Catholics: in the first moment they take from the Protestants perhaps eighty members; or what would probably be equal, in a division of the House, to one hundred. Then they almost wholly deprive the Irish aristocracy and landed interest of representatives, and throw the latter into the British scale of democracy. It is said, and in the nature of things it must be true, that in Scotland, many members will be transferred from the side of the aristocracy and landed interest to the other. By changes amidst the Irish and Scotch members, Ministers create amidst the English ones a preponderance against the aristocracy and landed interest, when they assert that they do the contrary.

The immediate abolition of all the small boroughs deserves strong reprobation; it is at variance with constitutional practice, and calculated to produce serious evils. Had they been abolished gradually,—for example, had eight chosen by lot been struck off at each election, the change would have been little felt, and evil might have received timely remedy. The alteration could have been duly watched, checked and guided; and it would, before reaching any material height, have given time for the bad feelings of the country to evaporate. Lord Brougham's treatment of those who have advised gradual change, proves nothing except that a Lord Chancellor may be an excessively vulgar, ill-natured person—a man really knowing little of the constitution, and prone to use, in his own language, most "shallow" and "silly" reasoning.

The eternal assertions of the eulogists of the plan, that it is based on property, call for some remark: It is very true that every elector must possess a little, and it is equally so that this will not give the body of town electors the least interest in the protection of property in general. This body will consist of men who imagine that they have a deep interest in the destruction of general property. With two or three exceptions, the various masses of property will be destitute of representatives, and have the House of Commons hostile to them. Could any thing be more preposterous than to make a man an elector who is known to be the enemy of agricultural, manufacturing, mercantile, colonial, funded, and ecclesiastical property; and then to cry—Oh, he will be sure to be its champion, because he possesses some twenty or thirty pounds in old furniture?

It has been alleged against the plan, that it is grossly partial in favour of Whig boroughs; the charge has been supported by sturdy arithmetic, and only met by vague assertion. If it be true, the Durhams, Howicks, or other parents of the plan, deserve to have applied to them every epithet of indignation and scorn that language can furnish: I say not that it is so, but at any rate, it has not yet been refuted.

After having spoken thus of the errors and defects of the plan, it is my duty to say that I warmly approve of a large portion of it. I deeply regret that so much of what is wise and valuable, is vitiated by what is, in the main, omission, rather than bad provision; I regret it the more, because I am confident, that if the plan contained every thing necessary, it would have been as popular with the reformers as it is. I concur in its principle in so far as it is to abolish rotten boroughs, and vicious nomination, and prevent aristocratic control in the House of Commons; but I can go no farther, and I contend that this was all the honest part of the reformers called for.

This is called an age of knowledge: "The people overflow with knowledge!" cries the Ministry. Good; but what is the kind? A change infinitely more comprehensive and perilous than any ever witnessed by the present generation is proposed, and how is it received? In the first place, doubtless, the leading authorities of the realm are touching it with the most scrupulous regard to duty?

Ministers, in contempt of the solemn obligations which rest on their

Royal Master, are degrading him into a leader of party and faction—they are divesting him of his proper legislative character, and deposing him into an instrument of their own—they are using him to influence Parliament and elections, to strip the Legislature of its deliberative powers, and to constitute themselves in reality the Three Estates of the Realm—they are plunging him into aggressive conflict with the better part of his subjects, and compelling him to head the democracy in its destructive war against institutions, property, and the aristocracy.

And this is knowledge!

Ministers are suffering their Press to advocate this change by foul scurrilities, revolutionary doctrines, and criminal appeals to the passions and prejudices of the multitude. They are actually or virtually declaring that institutions and laws ought to be altered to suit the popular will, without reference to its character—that the property, rights, and privileges of the minority ought to be sacrificed to the knavery, caprice, and usurpation of the majority—and that the House of Commons ought to be the instrument of popular tyranny, for enabling it to be both the Legislature and Executive.

And this is knowledge!

But perhaps the all-knowing and scientific people are acting differently? Instead of examining this change impartially and dispassionately, separating the bad from the good, and calling for the necessary improvements; they are in raptures with it without examination, because it is one, and will rob and oppress themselves. It is an all-perfect change, because it will divest the House of Commons of independence, impartiality, talent, wisdom, and experience; and make it the slave of popular frenzy and delusion. It is an admirable change, because it will strip the Crown and Aristocracy of their just and necessary power. It is a magnificent change, because it will confiscate general property, ruin every interest in detail, beat down the Church and Protestantism, deny representation to a vast part of the people, and give ascendancy to a godless, profligate, anti-English, revolutionary faction.

And this is knowledge!

The people overflow with knowledge:—good, but what is the harvest? The overflow has converted the pupil into the teacher; the people—the omniscient ingrates!—are actually inflicting lesson and birch on the “schoolmaster!” They are broadly intimating, that, on most matters, Lord Chancellor Brougham and Lord Advocate Jeffrey are about as ignorant and bigoted as Lord Eldon and Sir C. Wetherell. They feel as much contempt for Whig, as for Tory knowledge.

Again, I say, what is the harvest? Lord J. Russell—himself a weaver and retailer of knowledge—declares, that the people have cast off the influence of their natural leaders, and formed themselves into clubs of alarming character. Ministers assert, that if the Reform Bill be rejected by the due working of the constitution and laws, they will cause convulsion and revolution. A ministerial print gravely avowed, that the stack-burnings were produced by increase of knowledge amidst husbandry labourers. The influence of property and connexion of class, are to be destroyed—the laws are to be scorned and violated—the multitude is to dictate to the Crown and Legislature—property is to be deprived of protection, and confiscated—incendiaries are to abound—institutions are to be overthrown—and the empire is to be kept in constant danger of rebellion, anarchy, and fall.

On the assurances of the knowledge-manufacturers, and statesmen by profession and monopoly, these are the legitimate and necessary fruits of knowledge.

If such knowledge be not suppressed, no plan of Reform can save the empire. It is idle to speak of Reform if this fatal strife between aristocrat and democrat be not terminated. I charge it on the Whigs. Almost ever since Lord Brougham first intermeddled with public life, he and his confederates have incessantly laboured to change the wholesome war between Whig and Tory, into one between democrat and aristocrat, servant and master, poor and rich; and they have been triumphantly successful. This, aided as it has been by the incapacity and want of integrity of the Tories, has broke up old creeds and parties. Public men have been so divided, mixed, and confounded, that each has changed his sentiments and associates; and the chaos amidst them, has produced the same chaos amidst the population at large. The war of class has put down that of party—the extinction of that creed has supplied ground for that of revolution; and both have freed the lower orders from control and moral restraint.

I conceive that we must have Whigs and Tories, or democrats and aristocrats, the beneficial strife of party, or destructive one of class. Farther, I am convinced that on the existence, division, equipoise, and conduct of the two great constitutional parties, every thing dear to the empire depends; and that without them the constitution, freedom, the balance of the three estates, and the distribution of power in respect of class, would be little more than worthless names. My judgment tells me that their incorporation, or the extinction of either, would create a tyranny of the most hateful kind, or a democratic faction which would soon overturn the monarchy. Feeling therefore, as I do, that they form the soul of the constitution, I feel that to protect it, I must protect them in their proper shape and power; of course I must have a plan of reform which will give them such protection.

The Ministry's plan evidently wishes to perpetuate the war of class, and substitute it for that of party in the Legislature. It must incorporate these parties, or keep one of them, so far as regards effective power, constantly excluded from the House of Commons, in favour of a ruinous democratic faction. I therefore am strongly opposed to it.

I speak for the private benefit of no party; I have nothing to do with Whigs or Tories, and what I have said concerns the one as much as the other. If I could degrade myself into a mere partisan, I trust I should be sufficiently a friend to the liberties of my country to seek no more for my party than a moderate majority. I warmly urge my fellow-subjects of all ranks to examine this plan carefully and dispassionately on its merits, like men of knowledge and understanding—like enlightened freemen; and not to let their party-feelings lead them into ruin and slavery.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. IX.

The Statesman.

AMBITION!—Its sweets and bitters—its splendid miseries—its wringing cares—its wasting agonies—its triumphs and downfalls—who has not, in some degree, known and felt them? Moralists, Historians, and Novelists, have filled libraries in picturing their dreary and dazzling details; and yet Ambition's votaries, or rather victims, are as numerous, as enthusiastic, as ever!—Such is the mounting quality existing in almost every one's breast, that no "Pelion upon Ossa" heapings, and accumulations of facts and lessons, can keep it down. Though I fully feel the truth of this remark, vain and futile though the attempt may prove, I cannot resist the inclination to contribute my mite towards the vast memorials of Ambition's martyrs!

My specific purpose, in first making the notes from which the ensuing narrative is taken, and in now presenting it to the public—in thus pointing to the spectacle of a sun suddenly and disastrously eclipsed while blazing at its zenith—is this: To shew the steps by which a really great mind—an eager and impetuous spirit—was voluntarily sacrificed at the shrine of political ambition; foregoing, nay, despising, the substantial joys and comforts of elegant privacy, and persisting, even to destruction, in its frantic efforts to bear up against, and grapple with cares too mighty for the mind of man. It is a solemn lesson, imprinted on my memory in great and glaring characters; and if I do but succeed in bringing a few of them before the reader, they may at least serve to check extravagant expectations, by disclosing the misery which often lies cankering behind the most splendid popularity. If I should be found inaccurate in my use of political technicalities and allusions, the reader will be pleased to overlook it, on the score of my profession.

I recollect, when I was at Cambridge, overhearing some men of my college talk about the "~~celebrated~~ talents of young Stanford," who had lately become a member of ~~the~~ hall; and they said so much about the "great hit" he had made in his recent debut at one of the debating societies—which then flourished in considerable numbers—that I resolved to take the earliest opportunity of going to hear and judge for myself. That was soon afforded me. Though not a member of the society, I gained admission through a friend. The room was crammed to the very door; and I was not long in discovering the "star of the evening" in the person of a young fellow-commoner, of careless and even slovenly appearance. The first glimpse of his features disposed me to believe all I had heard in his favour. There was no sitting for effect; nothing artificial about his demeanour—no careful carelessness of attitude—no knitting of the brows, or painful straining of the eyes, to look brilliant or acute! The mere absence of all these little conceits and fooleries, so often disfiguring "talented young speakers," went, in my estimation, to the account of his superiority. His face was "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought," and its lineaments very deeply and strongly marked. There was a wondrous power and fire in the eyes, which gleamed with restless energy whichever way he looked. They were neither large nor prominent—but all soul—all expression. It was startling to find their glance suddenly settled on one. His forehead, as much as I saw of it, was knotted and expansive. There was a prevailing air of anxiety about his worn features—young as he was, about 21—as if his mind were every instant hard at work, which an inaccurate observer might have set down to the score of ill-nature, especially when coupled with the matter-of-fact unsmiling nods of recognition, with which he returned the polite inclinations of those who passed him. To me, sitting watching him, it seemed as though his mind were of too intense and energetic a character to have any sympathies with the small matters transpiring around him. I knew his demeanour was simple, unaffected, genuine, and it was refreshing to see it. It predisposed me to like him, if only for being free from the ridiculous airs assumed by some with whom I associated. He allowed five or six speakers to address the society, without making notes, or joining in the noisy exclamations and interruptions of those around him. At length he rose amid perfect silence—the silence of expectant criticism whetted by rivalry. He seemed at first a little flustered, and for about five minutes spoke hesitatingly and somewhat unconnectedly—with the air of a man who does not know exactly how to get at his subject, which yet he is conscious of having thoroughly mastered. At length, however, the current ran smooth, and gradually widened and swelled into such a stream—a torrent of real eloquence—as I never before or since heard poured from the lips of a young speaker—or possibly any speaker whatsoever, except himself in after life. He seemed long disinclined to enhance the effect of what he was uttering by oratorical gesture. His hands both grasped his cap, which ere long was compressed, twisted, and crushed out of all shape; but as he warmed, he laid it down, and used his arms, the levers of eloquence, with the grace and energy of a natural orator. The effect he produced was prodigious. We were all carried away with him, as if by whirlwind force. As for myself, I felt for the first time convinced that oratory such as that could persuade me to any thing. As might have been expected, his speech was fraught with the faults incident to youth and inexperience, and was pervaded with a glaring hue of extravagance and exaggeration. Some of his “facts” were preposterously incorrect, and his inferences false; but there was such a prodigious power of language—such a blaze of fancy—such a stretch and grasp of thought—and such casuistical dexterity evinced throughout, as indicated the presence of first-rate capabilities. He concluded amid a storm of applause; and before his enthusiastic auditors, whispering together their surprise and admiration, could observe his motions, he had slipped away and left the room.

The excitement into which this young man’s “first appearance” had thrown me, kept me awake the greater part of the night; and I well recollect feeling a transient fit of disinclination for the dull and sombre profession of medicine, for which I was destined. That evening’s display warranted my indulging large and high expectations of the future eminence of young Stafford; but I hardly went so far as to think of once seeing him Secretary of State, and leader of the British House of Commons. Accident soon afterwards introduced me to him, at the supper-table of a mutual friend. I found him distinguished as well by that simplicity and frankness ever attending the consciousness of real greatness, as by the recklessness, irritability, impetuosity of one, aware that he is far superior to those around him, and in possession of that species of talent which is appreciable by all—of those rare powers which ensure a man the command over his fellows—keen and bitter sarcasm—and extraordinary readiness of repartee. Then, again, all his predilections were political. He utterly disregarded the popular pursuits at college. Whatever he said, read, or thought, had reference to his “ruling passion”—and that not by fits and starts, under the arbitrary impulses of rivalry or enthusiasm, but steadily and systematically. I knew from himself, that, before his twenty-year, he had read over and the notes of the whole of the Parliamentary debates, and have seen a table which he constructed for reference, on a most admirable and useful plan. The minute accuracy of his acquaintance with the whole course of political affairs, obtained by such laborious methods as this, may be easily conceived. His powers of memory were remarkable—as well for their capacity as tenacity; and the presence of mind and judgment with which he availed himself of his acquisitions, convinced his opponent that he had undertaken an arduous, if not hopeless task, in rising to reply to him. It was impossible not to see, even in a few minutes' interview with him, that ambition had "marked him for her own." Alas, what a stormy career is before this young man!—I have often thought, while listening to his impassioned harangues and conversations, and witnessing the twin fires of intellect and passion flashing from his eyes. One large ingredient in his composition was a most morbid sensibility; and then he devoted himself to every pursuit with a headlong, undistinguishing enthusiasm and energy, which inspired me with lively apprehensions, lest he should wear himself out and fall by the way, before he could actually enter on the great arena of public life. His forehead was already furrowed with premature wrinkles!—His application was incessant. He rose every morning at five, and retired pretty regularly by eleven.

Our acquaintance gradually ripened into friendship; and we visited each other with mutual frequency and cordiality. When he left college, he entreated me to accompany him to the continent, but financial reasons forbade it. He was possessed of a tolerably ample fortune; and, at the time of quitting England, was actually in treaty with Sir ——— for a borough. I left Cambridge a few months after Mr Stafford; and as we were mutually engaged with the arduous and absorbing duties of our respective professions, we saw and heard little or nothing of one another for several years. In the very depth of my distress—during the first four years of my establishment in London—I recollect once calling at the hotel which he generally made his town quarters, for the purpose of soliciting his assistance in the way of introductions; when, to my anguish and mortification, I heard, that on that very morning he had quitted the hotel for Calais, on his return to the continent!

At length Mr Stafford, who had long stood contemplating on the brink, dashed into the tempestuous waters of public life, and emerged—a member of Parliament for the borough of ———. I happened to see the Gazette which announced the event, about two years after the occurrence of the accident which elevated me into fortune. I did not then require any one's interference on my behalf, being content with the independent exercise of my profession; and even if I had been unfortunate, too long an interval had elapsed, I thought, to warrant my renewing a mere college acquaintance with such a man as Mr Stafford. I was content, therefore, to keep barely within the extreme rays of this rising sun in the political hemisphere. I shall not easily forget the feelings of intense interest with which I saw, in one of the morning papers, the name of my quondam college friend, "MR STAFFORD," standing at the head of a speech of two columns' length—or the delight with which I paused over the frequent interruptions of "Hear, hear!"—"Hear, hear, hear!"—"Cheers!"—"Loud cheers!" which marked the speaker's progress in the favour of the House. "We regret," said the reporter, in a note at the end, "that the noise in the gallery prevented our giving at greater length the eloquent and effective maiden-speech of Mr Stafford, which was cheered perpetually throughout, and excited a strong sensation in the House." In my enthusiasm I purchased that copy of the newspaper, and have it now in my possession. It needed not the enquiries which everywhere met me, "Have you read Mr Stafford's maiden-speech?" to convince me of his splendid prospects, the reward of his early and honourable toils. His "maiden-speech" formed the sole engrossing topic of conversation to my wife and me as we sat at supper that evening; and she was asking me some such question as is generally uppermost in ladies' minds on the mention of a popular character, "What sort of looking man he was when I saw him at Cambridge?"—when a forcible appeal to the knocker and bell, followed by the servant's announcing, that "a gentleman wished to speak to me directly," brought me into my patients' room. The candles, which were ~~only~~ just lit, ~~did~~ not enable me to see the person of my visitor very distinctly; but the instant he spoke to me, removing a handkerchief which he held to his mouth, I recognised—could it be possible?—the very Mr Stafford we had been speaking of! I shook him affectionately by the hand, and should have proceeded to compliment him warmly on his last evening's success in the House, but that his dreadful paleness of features, and discomposure of manner, ~~disconcerted~~ me.

"My dear Mr Stafford, what is the matter? Are you ill? Has any thing happened?" I enquired anxiously.

"Yes, Doctor—perhaps fatally ill," he replied, with great agitation. "I thought I would call on you on my way from the House, which I have but just left. It is not my fault that we have not maintained our college acquaintance—but of that more hereafter. I wish your advice—your honest opinion on my case. For God's sake don't deceive me! Last evening I spoke for the first time in the House, at some length, and with all the energy I could command. You may guess the consequent exhaustion I have suffered during the whole of this day; and this evening, though much indisposed with fever and a cough, I imprudently went down to the House, when Sir ——— so shamefully misrepresented certain portions of the speech I had delivered the preceding night, that I felt bound to rise and vindicate myself. I was betrayed into greater length and vehemence than I had anticipated; and on sitting down, was seized with such an irrepressible fit of coughing, as at last forced me to leave the House. Hoping it would abate, I walked for some time about the lobby—and at length thought it better to return home than re-enter the House. While hunting after my carriage, the violence of the cough subsided into a small, hacking, irritating one, accompanied with spitting. After driving about as far as Whitehall, the vivid glare of one of the street lamps happened to fall suddenly on my white pocket handkerchief, and, oh God!" continued Mr Stafford, almost gasping for breath, "this horrid sight met my eye!" He spread out a pocket-handkerchief all spotted and dabbled with blood! It was with the utmost difficulty that he communicated to me what is gone before.—"Oh! it's all over with me—the chapter's ended, I'm afraid!" he murmured, almost inarticulately—and while I was feeling his pulse he fainted. I placed him instantly in a recumbent position—loosened his neckerchief and shirt-collar—dashed some cold water in his face, and he presently recovered. He shook his head, in silence, very mournfully—his features expressed utter hopelessness. I sat down close beside him, and, grasping his hand in mine, endeavoured to re-assure him. The answers he returned to the few questions I asked him, convinced me that the spitting of blood was unattended with danger, provided he could be kept quiet in body and mind. There was not the slightest symptom of radical mischief in the lungs. A glance at his stout build of body, especially at his ample sonorous chest, forbade the supposition. I explained to him, with even professional minuteness of detail, the true nature of the accident—its effects—and method of cure. He listened to me with deep attention, and at last seemed convinced. He clasped his hands, exclaiming, "Thank God! thank God!" and entreated me to do on the spot, what I had directed to be done by the apothecary—to bleed him. I complied, and from a large orifice took a considerable quantity of blood. I then accompanied him home—saw him consigned to bed—prescribed the usual lowering remedies—absolutely forbade him to open his lips, except in the slightest whisper possible—and left him calm, and restored to a tolerable measure of self-possession. One of the most exquisite sources of gratification, arising from the discharge of our professional duties, is the disabusing our patients of their harrowing and groundless apprehensions of danger. One such instance as is related above, is to me an ample recompense for months of miscellaneous, and often thankless toil, in the exercise of my profession. Is it not, in a manner, plucking a patient from the very brink of the grave, to which he had despairingly consigned himself, and placing him once more in the busy throng of life—the very heart of tinued in town; and with infinite difficulty, prevailed on him to betake himself to the country. We wrung a promise from him that he would set about " unbending "— " unharnessing," as he called it—that he would give " his constitution fair play." He acknowledged that to gain the objects he had proposed to himself, it was necessary for him to " husband his resources;" and briskly echoed my quotation—" neque semper arcum, tendit Apollo." In short, we dismissed him in the confident expectation of seeing him return, after a requisite interval, with recruited energies of body and mind. He had scarcely, however, been gone a fortnight, before a paragraph ran the round of the daily papers, announcing, as nearly ready for publication, a political pamphlet, " by Charles Stafford, Esq., M.P.;"—and in less than three weeks—sure enough—a packet was forwarded to my residence, from the publisher, containing my rebellious patient's pamphlet, accompanied with the following hasty note:—" Απελθόντι—Even with you!—you did not, you will recollect, interdict writing; and I have contrived to amuse myself with the accompanying trifle.—Please look at page —, and see the kind things I have said of poor Lord —, the worthy who attacked me the other evening in the House, behind my back." This " trifle " was in the form of a pamphlet of sixty-four pages, full of masterly argumentation, and impetuous eloquence; but unfortunately, owing to the publisher's dilatoriness, it came " a day behind the fair," and attracted but little attention.

His temporary rustication, however, was attended with at least two beneficial results—recruited health, and—the heart of Lady Emma —, the beautiful daughter of a nobleman remotely connected with Mr Stafford's family. This attachment proved powerful enough to alienate him for a while from the turmoils of political life; for not only did the beauty, wealth, and accomplishments, of Lady Emma — render her a noble prize, worthy of great effort to obtain, but a powerful military rival had taken the field before Mr Stafford made his appearance, and seemed disposed to move heaven and earth to carry her off. It is needless to say how such a consideration was calculated to rouse and absorb all the energies of the young senator, and keep him incessantly on the qui vive. It is said that the lady wavered for some time, uncertain to which of her brilliant suitors she should give the nod of preference. Chance decided the matter. It came to pass that a contested election arose in the county; and Mr Stafford made a very animated and successful speech from the hustings—not far from which, at a window, was standing Lady Emma—in favour of her ladyship's brother, one of the candidates. Triumphant! That happy evening the enemy "surrendered at discretion:" and ere long it was known far and wide, that—in newspaper slang—"an affair was on the tapis," between Mr Stafford and the "beautiful and accomplished Lady Emma —," &c. &c. &c.

It is my firm persuasion, that the diversion in his pursuits effected by this "affair," by withdrawing Mr Stafford for a considerable interval from cares and anxieties which he was physically unable to cope with, lengthened his life for many years; giving England a splendid statesman, and this, my diary, the sad records which are now to be laid before the reader.

One characteristic of our profession, standing, as it were, in such sad and high relief as to scare many a sensitive mind from entering into its service, is, that it is concerned almost exclusively with the dark side of humanity. As carnage and carrion guide the gloomy flight of the vulture, so MISERY is the signal for a medical man's presence. We have to do, daily, with broken hearts, blighted hopes, pain, sorrow, death! and though the satisfaction arising from the due discharge of our duties, be that of the good Samaritan—a rich return—we cannot help counting the heavy cost, aching hearts, weary limbs, privations, ingratitude. Dark array! It may be considered placing the matter in a whimsical point of view, yet I have often thought that the two great professions of Law and Medicine, are but foul carrion birds—the one preying on the moral, as the other on the physical, rottenness of mankind.

"Thou who art well, need not a physician," say the Scriptures: "and on this ground, it is easy to explain the melancholy hue pervading these papers. They are mirrors reflecting the dark colours which are exposed to them. It is true, that some remote relations, arising out of the particular combinations of circumstances first requiring our professional interference, may afford, as it were, a passing gleam of distant sunshine, in the development of some trait of beautiful character, some wondrous "good, from seeming ill educed:" but these are incidental only, and evanescent—enhancing, not relieving the gloom and sorrow amid which we move. A glimpse of Heaven would but aggravate the horrors of Hell. These chilling reflections force themselves on my mind, when surveying the very many entries in my Diary concerning the eminent individual whose case I am now narrating—concerning one who seemed born to bask in the brightness of life—to reap the full harvest of its joys and comforts, and yet "walked in darkness!" Why should it have been so? Answer—Ambition!

The reader must hurry on with me through the next ten years of Mr Stafford's life, during which period he rose with almost unprecedented rapidity. He had hardly time, as it were, to get warm in his nest, before he was called to lodge in the one above him, and then the one above that, and so on upwards, till people began to view his progress, with their hands shading their dazzled eyes, while they exclaimed—"fast for the top of the tree!" He was formed for political popularity. He had a most winning, captivating, commanding style of delivery, which was always employed in the steady consistent advocacy of one line of principles. The splendour of his talents—his tact and skill in debate—the immense extent and accuracy of his political information—early attracted the notice of Ministers, and he was not suffered to wait long before they secured his services, by giving him a popular and influential office. During all this time, he maintained a very friendly intimacy with me, and often put into requisition my professional services.

About eight o'clock one Saturday evening, I received the following note from Mr Stafford:—

"Dear —, excuse excessive haste. Let me entreat you (I will hereafter account for the suddenness of this application) to make instant arrangements for spending with me the whole of to-morrow (Sunday), at —, and to set off from town in time for breakfasting with Lady Emma and myself. Your presence is required by most urgent and special business; but allow me to beg you will appear at breakfast with an unconcerned air—as a chance visitor. Yours always faithfully,

"C. STAFFORD."

The words "whole" and "special" were thrice underscored; and this, added to the very unusual illegibility of the writing, betrayed an urgency, and even agitation, which a little disconcerted me. The abruptness of the application occasioned me some trouble in making the requisite arrangements. As, however, it was not a busy time with me, I contrived to find a substitute for the morrow in my friend Dr D—.

It was a lovely Sabbath morning, in July 18—, that, in obedience to the above hurried summons, I set off on horseback from the murky metropolis; and after rather more than a two hours' ride, found myself entering the grounds of Mr Stafford, who had recently purchased a beautiful villa on the banks of the Thames. It was about nine o'clock, and nature seemed but freshly awakened from the depth of her overnight's slumbers—her tresses all uncurled, as it were—and her perfumed robes glistening with the pearls of morning dew. A deep and rich repose brooded over the scene, subduing every feeling of my soul into sympathy. A groom took my horse; and finding that neither Mr Stafford nor Lady Emma were yet stirring, I resolved to walk about and enjoy the scenery. In front of the house stretched a fine lawn, studded here and there with laurel bushes, and other elegant shrubs, and sloping down to the river's edge; and on each side of the villa, and behind, were trees disposed with the most beautiful and picturesque effect imaginable. Birds were carolling cheerfully and loudly on all sides of me, as though they were intoxicated with their own "woodland melody." I walked about as amid enchantment, breathing the balminess and fragrance of the atmosphere, as the wild horse snuffs the scent of the desert. How keenly are Nature's beauties appreciable when but rarely seen by her unfortunate admirer who is condemned to a town life! I stood on the lawn by the river's edge, watching the ripple of the retiring tide, pondering within myself whether it was possible for such scenes as these to have lost all charm for their restless owner. Did he relish or tolerate them? Could the pursuits of ambition have blunted, deadened his sensibilities to the beauty of nature, the delights of home? These thoughts were passing through my mind, when I was startled by the tapping of a loose glove over my shoulder; and on turning round beheld Mr Stafford, in his flowered morning-gown, and his face partially shaded from the glare of the morning sun. "Good-morning, Doctor—good-morning," said he; "a thousand thanks for your attention to my note of last night; but see! yonder stands Lady Emma, waiting breakfast for us," pointing to her ladyship, who was standing at the window of the breakfast-room. Mr Stafford put his arm into mine, and we walked up to the house. "My dear sir, what can be the meaning of your ——" said I, with an anxious look.

"Not a word—not a breath—if you please, till we are alone after breakfast."

"Well—you are bent on tantalizing!—What can be the matter? What is this mountain-mystery?"

"It may prove a molehill, perhaps," said he, carelessly; "but we'll see after breakfast."

"What an enchanting spot you have of it!" I exclaimed, pausing and looking around me.

"Oh, perfectly paradisaical, I dare say," he replied, with an air of indifference that was quite laughable. "By the way," he added, hurriedly, "did you hear any rumour about Lord ——'s resignation late last night?"—"Yes."—"And his successor, is he talked of?" he enquired, eagerly. "Mr C——," "Mr C——! Is it possible? Ah, ha ——" he muttered, raising his hand to his cheek, and looking thoughtfully downwards.

"Come, come, Mr Stafford, 'tis now my turn, do drop these eternal politics for a few moments, I beg."—"Ay, ay, 'still harping on my daughter,' I'll sink the ship for a while, as our town friends say. But I really beg pardon, 'tis rude, very. But here we are. Lady Emma, Dr ——," said he, as we approached her ladyship through the open stained-glass doorway. She sat before the breakfast urn, looking, to my eyes, as blooming as beautiful as at the time of her marriage, though ten summers had waved their silken pinions over her head, but so softly, as scarce to flutter or fade a feature in passing. Yes, thus she sat in her native loveliness and dignity, the airiness of girlhood passed away into the mellowed maturity of womanhood! She looked the beau-ideal of simple elegance in her long snowy morning dress, her clustering auburn hair surmounted with a slight gossamer network of blonde; not an ornament about her! I have her figure, even at this interval of time, most vividly before me, as she sat on that memorable morning, unconscious that the errand which made me her guest, involved—but I will not anticipate. She adored, nay idolized, her husband—little as she saw of him—and he was in turn as fondly attached to her as a man could be, whose whole soul was swallowed up in ambition. Yes, he was not the first to whom political pursuits have proved a very disease, shedding blight and mildew over the heart!

I thought I detected an appearance of restraint in the manner of each. Lady Emma often cast a furtive glance of anxiety at her husband—and with reason—for his features wore an air of repressed uneasiness. He was now and then absent, and, when addressed by either of us, would reply with a momentary sternness of manner—passing, however, instantly away—which shewed that his mind was occupied with unpleasant or troubled thoughts. He seemed at last aware that his demeanour attracted our observation, and took to acting. All traces of anxiety or uneasiness disappeared, and gave place to his usual perfect urbanity and cheerfulness. Lady Emma's manner towards me, too, was cooler than usual, which I attributed to the fact of my presence not having been sufficiently accounted for. My embarrassment may be easily conceived.

"What a delicious morning!" exclaimed Lady Emma, looking through the window at the fresh blue sky, and the cheery prospect beneath. We echoed her sentiments. "I think," said I, "that could I call such a little paradise as this mine, I would quit the smoke and uproar of London for ever!"—"I wish all thought with you, Dr —," replied her ladyship with a sigh, looking touchingly at her husband.

"What opportunities for tranquil thought!" I went on.

"Ay, and so forth!" said Mr Stafford, gaily. "Listen to another son of peace and solitude, my Lord Roscommon—

"Hail, sacred solitude! from this calm bay,

I view the world's tempestuous sea,
And with wise pride despise
All those senseless vanities
With pity moved for others, cast away
On rocks of hopes and fears, I see them lost

On rocks of folly, and of vice, I see them
lost:

Some the prevailing malice of the great,
Unhappy men, or adverse fate,
Sunk deep into the gulfs of an afflicted
state:

But more, far more, a numberless prodigious train.

Whilst Virtue courts them, but, alas! in vain,

Fly from her kind embracing arms,
Deaf to her fondest call, blind to her greatest charms,

And, sunk in pleasures and in brutish case,

They, in their shipwreck'd state, themselves obdurate please."

"Here may I always on this downy grass,
Unknown, uncess, my easy moments pass,
Till, with a gentle force, victorious Death
My solitude invade,

And, stopping for a while my breath,
With ease convey me to a better shade!"

"There's for you, my lady! Well sung, my Lord Roscommon! Beautiful as true!" exclaimed Mr Stafford, gaily, as soon as he had concluded repeating the above ode, in his own distinct and beautiful elocution, with real pathos of manner; but his mouth and eye betrayed that his own mind sympathized not with the emotions of the poet, but rather despised the air of inglorious repose they breathed. The tears were in Lady Emma's eyes, as she listened to him! Presently one of his daughters, a fine little girl about six years of age, came sidling and simpering into the room, and made her way to her mother. She was a lively, rosy, arch-eyed little creature—and her father looked fondly at her for a moment, exclaiming, "Well, Eleanor!" and his thoughts had evidently soon passed far away. The conversation turned on Mr Stafford's reckless, absorbing pursuit of politics—which Lady Stafford and I deplored—and entreated him to give more of his time and affections to domestic concerns. "You talk to me as if I were dying," said he, rather petulantly, "why should I not pursue my profession—my legitimate profession?—As for your ~~well~~ waters—your pastoral simplicities—your Arcadian bliss—pray what inducements have I to run counter to my own inclinations to cruise what you are pleased to call the stormy sea of politics?"—"What inducements?" Charles, Charles—can't you find them here?" said his lady, pointing to herself and her daughter. Mr Stafford's eyes filled with tears, even to overflowing, and he grasped her hand with affectionate energy, took his smiling unconscious daughter on his knee, and kissed her with passionate fervour. "Sciel insanguinis omnes," he muttered to me, a few moments after, as if ashamed of the display he had recently made. For my own part I saw that he occasionally lost the control over feelings which were, for some reason or other, disturbed and excited. What could possibly have occurred? Strange as it may seem, a thought of the real state of matters, as they will presently be disclosed, never for an instant crossed my mind. I longed—I almost sickened—for the promised opportunity of being alone with him. It was soon afforded me by the servants' appearing at the door, and announcing the carriage.

"Oh dear! positively prayers will be over!" exclaimed Lady Emma, rising, and looking hurriedly at her watch, "we've quite forgotten church hours! do you accompany us, Doctor?" said she, looking at me.

"No, Emma," replied Mr Stafford, quickly, "you and the family must go alone this morning—I shall stop and keep Dr — company, and take a walk over the country for once." Lady Emma, with an unsatisfied glance at both of us, withdrew. Mr Stafford immediately proposed a walk; and we were soon on our way to a small Gothic alcove near the water side.

"Now, Doctor, to the point," said he abruptly, as soon as we were seated. "Can I reckon on — friend in you — scrutinizing my features closely."

"Most certainly you may," I replied, with astonishment. "What can I do for you?—Something or other is wrong, I fear! can I do any thing for you in any way?"

"Yes," said he, deliberately, and looking fixedly at me, as if to mark the effect of his words; "I shall require a proof of your friendship soon; I must have your services this evening—at seven o'clock."

"Gracious heaven, Mr Stafford!—why—why—is it possible that—do I guess aright?" I stammered almost breathless, and rising from my seat.

"Oh, Doctor—don't be foolish—excuse me—but don't—don't, I beg. Pray give me your answer! I'm sure you understand my question." Agitation deprived me for a while of utterance.

"I beg an answer, Dr —," he resumed coldly, "as, if you refuse, I shall be very much inconvenienced. 'Tis but a little affair—a silly business, that circumstances have made inevitable—I'm sure you must have seen a hint at it in the last night's papers.—Don't misunderstand me," he proceeded, seeing me continue silent; "I don't wish you to take an active part in the business—but to be on the spot—and, in the event of any thing unfortunate happening to me—to hurry home here, and prepare Lady Emma and the family—that is all. Mr G —, naming a well-known army-surgeon—will attend professionally."

I was so confounded with the suddenness of the application, that I could do nothing more than mutter indistinctly my regret at what had happened.

"Well, Doctor —," he continued in a haughty tone, "I find that, after all, I have been mistaken in my man. I own I did not expect that this—the first favour I have ever asked at your hands, and, possibly, the last—would have been refused. But I must insist on an answer one way or another; you must be aware I've no time to lose."

"Mr Stafford—pardon me—you mistake me. Allow me a word; you cannot have committed yourself rashly in this affair! Consider Lady Emma—your children—"

"I have—I have," he answered, grasping my hand, while his voice faltered, "and I need hardly inform you that it is that consideration only which occasions the little disturbance of manner you may have noticed. But you are man of the world enough to be aware that I must go through with the business. I am not the challenger."

I asked him for the particulars of the affair. It originated in a biting sarcasm which he had uttered, with reference to a young nobleman, in the House of Commons, on Friday evening, which had been construed into a personal affront, and for which an apology had been demanded;—mentioning the alternative, in terms almost approaching to insolence, evidently for the purpose of provoking him into a refusal to retract or apologize.

"It's my firm persuasion that there is a plot among a certain party to destroy me—to remove an obnoxious member from the House—and this is the scheme they have hit upon! I have succeeded, I find, in annoying the — interest beyond measure; and so they must at all events get rid of me! Ay, this cur of a lordling it is," he continued, with bitter emphasis, "who is to make my sweet wife a widow, and my children orphans—for Lord — is notoriously one of the best shots in the country! Poor—poor Emma!" he exclaimed with a sigh, thrusting his hand into his bosom, and looking down dejectedly. We neither of us spoke for some time. "Would to Heaven we had never been married!" he resumed. "Poor Lady Emma leads a wretched life of it, I fear! But I honestly warned her that my life would be strewn with thorny cares, even to the grave's brink!"

"So you have really pitched upon this evening—Sunday evening, for this dreadful business?" I enquired.

"Exactly. We must be on the spot by seven precisely. I say we, Doctor," laying his hand on mine. I consented to accompany him. "Come now, that's kind! I'll remember you for it. * * * It is now nearly half past twelve," looking at his watch, "and by one, my Lord A——," mentioning a well-known nobleman, "is to be here; who is to stand by me on the occasion. I wish he were here;—for I've added a codicil to my will, and want you both to witness my signature. * * * I look a little fagged—don't I?" he asked with a smile. I told him he certainly looked rather sallow and worn. "How does our friend walk his paces?" he enquired, baring his wrist for me to feel his pulse. The circulation was little; if at all disturbed, and I told him so. "It would not have been very wonderful if it had, I think; for I've been up half the night—till nearly five this morning, correcting the two last proof-sheets of my speech on the — bill, which — is publishing. I think it will read well; at least I hope it will, in common justice to myself, for it was most vilely curtailed and misrepresented by the reporters. By the way—would you believe it?—Sir —'s speech that night was nothing but a hundredth hash of mine which I delivered in the House more than eight years ago!" said he, with an eager and contemptuous air. I made him no reply; for my thoughts were too sadly occupied with the dreadful communication he had recently made me. I abhorred, and do abhor and despise duelling, both in theory and practice; and now, to have to be present at one, and one in which my friend—such a friend!—was to be a principal. This thought, and a glance at the possible, nay, probable desolation and broken-heartedness which might follow, was almost too much for me. But I knew Mr Stafford's disposition too well to attempt expostulation—especially in the evidently morbid state of his feelings.

"Come, come, Doctor, let's walk a little! Your feelings flag!—You might be going to receive satisfaction yourself," with a bitter sneer, "instead of seeing it given and taken by others!—Come, cheer, cheer up." He put his arm in mine, and led me a few steps across the lawn, by the water-side. "Dear, dear me!" said he, with a chagrined air, pulling out his watch hastily. "I wish to heaven, my Lord A—— would make his appearance! I protest her ladyship will have returned from church before we have settled our few matters, unless, by the way, she drive round by Admiral —'s, as she talked of last night. Oh, my God, think of my leaving her and the girls, with a gay air, as if we parted but for an hour, when it may be for ever! And yet what can one do?" While he was speaking, my eye caught sight of a servant making his way towards us rapidly through the shrubbery, bearing in his hand a letter, which he put into Mr Stafford's hands, saying, a courier had brought it that moment, and was waiting to take an answer back to town. "Ah—very good—let him wait till I come," said Mr Stafford. "Excuse me, Doctor——" bursting open the envelope with a little trepidation, and putting it into my hands, while he read the enclosed note. The envelope bore in one corner the name of the premier, and in the other the words, "private and confidential," and was sealed with the private crest and coronet of the earl.

"Great God—read it!" exclaimed Mr Stafford, thrusting the note before me, and elevating his eyes and hands despairingly. Much agitated myself, at witnessing the effect of the communication on my friend, I took it and read nearly as follows:—"My dear Stafford, I had late last night his Majesty's commands to offer you the seals of the — office, accompanied with the most gracious expressions of consideration for yourself personally, and his conviction that you will discharge the important duties henceforth devolving upon you, with honour to yourself, and advantage to his Majesty's councils. In all which, I need hardly assure you, I most heartily concur. I beg to add, that I shall feel great pride and pleasure in having you for a colleague—and it has not been my fault that such was not the case earlier. May I entreat your answer by the bearer's return? as the state of public affairs will not admit of delay in filling up so important an office. I beg you will believe me, ever yours, most faithfully,

 "Whitehall, Sunday noon, 12 o'clock."

After hurriedly reading the above, I continued holding the letter in my hands, speechlessly gazing at Mr Stafford. Well might such a bitter balm excite the tumultuous conflict of passions which the varying features of Mr Stafford—now flushed, now pale—too truly evidenced. This dazzling proffer made him only a few hours before his standing the fatal fire of an accomplished duellist!—I watched him in silent agony. At length he clasped his hands with passionate energy, and exclaimed—"Oh, madness—madness—madness!—Just within reach of the prize I have run for all my life!" At that instant a wherry-full of bedizened Londoners passed close before us on their way towards Richmond, and I saw by their whispers that they had recognised Mr Stafford. He also saw them, and exclaimed to me in a tone I shall never forget, "Happy, happy fools!" and turned away towards the house. He removed his arm from mine, and stood pondering for a few moments with his eyes fixed on the grass.

"Doctor, what's to be done?"—he almost shouted, turning suddenly to me, grasping my arm, and staring vacantly into my face. I began to fear lest he should totally lose the command of himself.

"For God's sake, Mr Stafford, be calm!—Recollect yourself!—or madness—ruin—I know not what—is before you!" I said in an earnest, imploring tone, seeing his eye still glaring fixedly upon me. At length he succeeded in overmastering his feelings—"Oh—folly, folly, this!—Inevitable!—Inevitable!" he exclaimed, in a calmer tone. "But the letter must be answered. What can I say, doctor?" putting his arm in mine, and walking up to the house rapidly. We made our way to the library, and Mr Stafford sat down before his desk. He opened his portfolio slowly and thoughtfully. "Of course—Decline?"—said he, with a profound sigh, turning to me with his pen in his hand.

"No—assuredly, it would be precipitate. Wait for the issue of this sad business. You may escape."—"No—no—no! My Lord ——— is singularly prompt and decisive in all he does, especially in disposing of his places. I must—I must—ay"—beginning to write—"I must respectfully decline—altogether. But on what grounds? Oh, God! even should I escape to-day, I am ruined for ever in Parliament!—What will become of me?" He laid down the pen, and moved his hand rapidly over his face.

"Why—perhaps it would be better.—Tell his Lordship frankly how you are circumstanced."

"Tut!" he exclaimed impetuously, "ask him for peace-officers! a likely thing!" He pressed both his hands on his forehead, leaning on his elbows over the desk. A servant that moment appeared, and said—"Please, sir, the man says he had orders not to wait more than five minutes——"

"Begone!—Let him wait, sir!" thundered Mr Stafford—and resumed his pen.

"Can't you throw yourself on His Lordship's personal good feeling towards you, and say that such an offer requires consideration—that it must interfere with, and derange, on the instant, many of your political engagements—and that your answer shall be at Whitehall by—say nine o'clock this evening? So you will gain time, at least."

"Good. 'Twill do—a fair plea for time;—but I'm afraid!" said he, mournfully; and taking his pen, he wrote off an answer to that effect. He read it to me—folded it up—sealed it—directed it in his usual bold and flowing hand—I rung for the servant—and, in a few moments, we saw the courier galloping past the window.

"Now, Doctor, isn't this enough to madden me? Oh, God! it's intolerable!" said he, rising and approaching me,—“my glorious prospects to be darkened by this speck—this atom of puppyism—of worthlessness.”—naming Lord —, his destined opponent.—“Oh—if there were—if there were—” he resumed, speaking fiercely through his closed teeth, his eyes glaring downwards, and his hands clenched. He soon relaxed. “Well, well! it can’t be helped; ’tis inevitable—πάρος σίγητος, ταῦτα αἰς ἐκρίσιναι—as Medea says! Ah—Lord A—at last,” he said, as a gentleman, followed by his groom, rode past the window. In a few moments he entered the library. His stature was lofty, his features commanding, and his bearing fraught with composure and military hauteur. “Ah,—Stafford,—good-morning!” said he, approaching and shaking him warmly by the hand, “upon my soul I’m sorry for the business I’m come about.”—“I can sympathize with you, I think,” replied Mr Stafford, calmly; “My Lord, allow me—Dr —.” I bowed. “Fully in my confidence—an old friend,” he whispered Lord A—in consequence of his Lordship’s inquisitive suspicious glance. * * “Well, you must teach the presumptuous puppy better manners this evening,” said his lordship, adjusting his black stock with an indifferent air!

“Ay—nothing like a LEADEN LRS-SON,” replied Mr Stafford with a cold smile.

—“For a leaden head, too, by —!” rejoined his Lordship quickly. “We shall run you pretty fair through, I think; for we’ve determined on putting you up at six paces —”

“Six paces!—why we shall blow one another to —!” echoed Mr Stafford, with consternation. “’T would be rather hard to go there in such bad company, I own. Six paces!” continued Mr Stafford, “how could you be so absurd!—It will be deliberate murder!”

“Poh, poh!—never a bit of it, my dog—follow—never a bit of it!—I’ve been many up at that distance—and, believe me, the chances are ten to two that both miss.”

“Both miss at six paces?” enquired Mr Stafford, with an incredulous smile.

“Ay! both miss, I say; and no wonder either! Such contiguity!—Egad, ’twould make a statue nervous!”

“But A—! have you really determined on putting us up at six paces?” again enquired Mr Stafford, earnestly.

“Most unquestionably,” replied his lordship, briskly; adding, rather coldly, “I flatter myself, Stafford, that when a man’s honour is at stake, six, or sixty paces, are matters equally indifferent.”

“Ay, ay, A—, I dare say,” replied Mr Stafford, with a melancholy air; “but ’tis hard to die by the hands of a puppy—and under such circumstances!—Did you not meet a man on horseback?”

“Ay, ay,” replied his lordship, eagerly, “I did—a courier of my Lord —’s, and thundering townward, at a prodigious rate—any doings there between you and the premier?”

“Read!” said Mr Stafford, putting Lord —’s letter into his hand. Before his lordship had more than half read it, he let it fall on the table, exclaiming, “Good God! was there ever such an unfortunate thing in the world before!—Ha’n’t it really driven you mad, Stafford?”

“No,” he replied, with a sigh; “the thing must be borne!” Lord A— walked a few steps about the room, thoughtfully, with energetic gestures. “If—if I could but find a pretext—if I could but come across the puppy, in the interval—I’d give my life to have a shot preparatory with him!” he muttered. Mr Stafford smiled. “While I think of it,” said he, opening his desk, “here’s my will. I wish you and Dr — to see me sign.” We did—and affixed our names.

“By the way,” said his lordship, suddenly addressing Mr Stafford, who, with his chin resting on his hands, and his features wearing an air of intense thought, had been silent for some minutes; “how do you put off Lady Emma to-day? How do you account for your absence?”

“Why, I’ve told her we three were engaged to dinner at Sir —’s, naming a neighbouring baronet—I’m afraid it will kill Lady Emma if I fall," he faltered, while the tears rushed to his eyes. He stepped towards the decanters, which had, a little while before, been brought in by the servant; and, after asking us to do the same, poured out a glass, and drank it hastily—and another—and another.

"Well—this is one of the saddest affairs, altogether, that I ever knew!" exclaimed his lordship. "Stafford—I feel for you from my heart's core—I do!" he continued, grasping him affectionately by the hand; "here's to your success to-night, and God's blessing to Lady Emma!" Mr Stafford started suddenly from him, and walked to the window, where he stood for a few minutes in silence. "Lady Emma is returning, I see," said he, approaching us. His features exhibited little or no traces of agitation. He poured out another glass of wine, and drank it off at a draught, and had hardly set down the glass, before the carriage steps were heard letting down at the door. Mr Stafford turned to them with an eye of agony, as his lady and one of her little girls descended.

"I think we'd perhaps better not join her ladyship before our setting off," said Lord A——, looking anxiously at poor Mr Stafford.

"Oh, but we will," said he, leading to the door. He had perfectly recovered his self-possession. I never knew a man that had such remarkable command of face and manner as Mr Stafford. I was amused at the gay—almost nonchalant—air with which he walked up to Lady Emma—asked her about the sermon—whether she had called at Admiral——'s—and several other such questions.

"Ah—and how is it with you, my little Hebe—ah?" said he, taking the laughing girl into his arms, laughing, tickling, and kissing her, with all a father's fondness. I saw his heart was swelling within him; and the touching sight brought, with powerful force, to my recollection, a similar scene in the Medea of Euripides, where the mother is bewailing over the "last smile" of her children.* He succeeded in betraying no painful emotion in his lady's presence—and Lord A—— took good care to engage her in incessant conversation.

"What does your ladyship say to a walk through the grounds?" said he, proffering his arm—which she accepted, and we all walked out together. The day was beautiful, but oppressively sultry, and we turned our steps towards the plantations. Mr Stafford and I walked together, and slipped a little behind for the purpose of conversation. "I won't have much opportunity of speaking with you, Doctor," said he, "so I'll say what is uppermost now. Be sure, my dear Doctor, to hurry from the field—which is about four miles from my house—to Lady Emma—in the event of my being either killed or wounded—and do what you think best, to prepare my wife for the event. I cannot trust her to better—gentler hands than yours—my old—my tried friend!—You know where my will is—and I've given directions for my funeral."

"Oh dear, dear Stafford," I interrupted him, moved almost to tears, "don't speak so hopelessly!"

"Oh, Doctor—nonsense—there's no disguising matters from one's self. Is there a chance for me? No—I'm a murdered man—and can you doubt it? Lord—— can do only one thing well in the world, and that is, hit his man at any distance; and then six paces off each other! Lord A—— may say what he likes—but I call it murder. However, the absurd customs of society must be complied with!—I hope," he added, after a pause, "that when the nine-days' wonder of the affair shall have passed off—if I fall—when the press shall cease its lying about it—that my friends will do justice to my memory, God knows, I really love my country, and would have served it—it was my ambition to do so—but it's useless talking now!—I am excessively vexed that this affair should have occurred before the — question comes on, in preparation for which I have been toiling incessantly, night and day, for this month past. I know that great expectations —” At that instant, Lord A — and Lady Emma met us, and we had no further opportunity of conversing. We returned to lunch after a few minutes' longer walk.

“God bless you, Emma!” said Mr Stafford, nodding, with an affectionate smile, as he took wine with his lady. He betrayed no emotion throughout the time we sat together—but conversed long—and often in a lively strain—on the popular topics of the day. He rung for his valet, and directed him to have his toilet ready—and to order the carriage for four o'clock. He then withdrew—and in about a quarter of an hour's time, returned, dressed in a blue surtout and white trowsers. He was a very handsome, well-made man, and seemed dressed with particular elegance, I thought.

“Upon my honour, Charles—you are in a pretty dinner-trim,” said Lady Emma, “and all of you, I protest!” she continued, looking round with surprise at our walking dress. Mr Stafford told her, with a laugh, that we were going to meet none but bachelors.

“What!—why, where will the Miss — be?”

“Ordered out, my lady, for the day,” replied Lord A —, with a smile, promptly, lest his friend should hesitate; “’tis to be a model of a divan, I understand!”

“Don't be late, love!” said Lady Emma to her husband, as he was dressing on his gloves; “you know how little enough of you at all times — don't—don't be late!”

“No—no later than I can help, certainly!” said he, moving to the door.

“Say eleven—will you?—come, for once!”

“Well—yes. I will return by eleven,” he replied, pointedly, and I detected a little tremulousness in his tone.

“Papa! papa!” exclaimed his little daughter, running across the hall, as her father was on the carriage-steps; “Papa! papa! may I sit up to-night till you come home?” He made no reply, but beckoned us in, hurriedly—sat back in his seat—thundered, “Drive on, sir!” and burst into tears.

“Oh, my dear fellow—Stafford—Stafford! This will never do. What will our friends on the ground say?” enquired Lord A —.

“What they like!” replied Mr Stafford, sternly, still in tears. He soon recovered himself.

“After driving some time, “Now, let me give you a bit of advice,” said Lord A —, in an earnest tone, “we shall say only one word, by way of signal—‘Fire,’ and be sure to fire while you are in the act of raising your pistol.”

“Oh, yes—yes—yes—I understand—”

“Well, but be sure; don't think of pointing first, and then firing—or, by —, you'll assuredly fire over his head, or fire far on one side. Only recollect to do as I say, and you will take him full in the ribs, or clip him in the neck, or at least wing him.”

“My dear fellow, do you take me for a novice? Do you forget my affair with —?” enquired Mr Stafford, impatiently.

“I promised to meet G — about here,” said Lord A —, putting his head out of the window. “Egad, if he is not punctual, I don't know what we shall do, for he's got my pistol-case. Where—where is he?” he continued, looking up the road. “There!” he exclaimed, catching sight of a horseman riding at a very slow pace.—After we had overtaken him, and Lord A — had taken the pistol-case into the carriage, and Mr Stafford had himself examined the pistols carefully, we rode side by side till we came near the scene of action. During that time, we spoke but little, and that little consisted of the most bitter and sarcastic expressions of Mr Stafford's contempt for his opponent, and regret at the occurrence which had so tantalized him, alluding to Lord —'s offer of the — office. About ten minutes to seven, we alighted, and gave the coachman orders to remain there till we returned. The evening was lovely—the glare of day “mellowed to that tender light” which characterises a summer evening in the country. As we walked across the fields towards the appointed spot, I felt sick and faint with irrepressible agitation, and Mr G——, the surgeon, with whom I walked, joked with me at my “squeamishness,” much in the style of tars with sea-sick passengers. “There’s nothing in it—nothing,” said he; “they’ll take care not to hurt one another. ’Tis a pity too that such a man as Mr Stafford should run the risk. What a noise it will make!” I let him talk on, for I could not answer, till we approached the fatal field, which we entered by a gap. Lord A—— got through first. “Punctual, however,” said he, looking round at Mr Stafford, who was following. “There they are—just getting over the stile. Inimitable coxcomb!”

“Ay, there they are, sure enough,” replied he, shading his eyes. “A——, for God’s sake, take care not to put me against this sunshine—it will dazzle——”

“Oh, never fear; it will go down before then—’tis but just above the horizon now.” A touching image, I thought! It might be so with Mr Stafford—his sun “might go down—at noon.”

“Stop, my lord,” said Mr Stafford, motioning Lord A—— back, and pressing his hand to his forehead. “A moment—allow me! Let me see—~~is~~ there any thing I’ve forgot?—Oh, I thought there was!” He hurriedly requested Lord A——, after the affair, in the event of its proving bloody, to call on the minister, and explain it all. Lord A—— promised to do so. “Ah—here, too,” unbuttoning his surcoat, “this must not be here, I suppose;” and he removed a small gold snuffbox from his right to his left waistcoat pocket. “Let the blockhead have his full chance.”

“Stuff, stuff, Stafford! That’s Quixotic!” muttered Lord A——. He was much paler, and more thoughtful than I had seen him all along. All this occurred in much less time than I have taken to tell it. We all passed into the field; and as we approached, saw Lord —— and his second; who were waiting our arrival. The appearance of the former was that of a handsome fashionable young man, with very light hair, and lightly dressed altogether; and he walked to and fro, switching about a little riding-cane. Mr Stafford released Lord A——, who joined the other second, and commenced the preliminary arrangements.

I never saw a greater contrast than there was between the demeanour of Mr Stafford and his opponent. There stood the former, his hat shading his eyes, his arms folded, eyeing the motions of his antagonist with a look of supreme—of utter contempt; for I saw his compressed and curled upper lip. Lord —— betrayed an anxiety—a visible effort to appear unconcerned. He “overdid it.” He was evidently as uneasy, in the contiguity of Mr Stafford, as the rabbit shivering under the baleful glare of the rattlesnake’s eye. One little circumstance was full of character at that agitating moment. Lord ——, anxious to manifest every appearance of coolness and indifference, seemed bent on demolishing a nettle; or some other prominent weed, and was making repeated strokes at it with the little whip he held. Thus, a few seconds before his life was to be jeopardied! Mr Stafford stood watching this puerile feat in the position I have formerly mentioned, and a withering smile stole over his features, while he muttered—if I heard correctly—“Poor boy! Poor boy!”

At length the work of loading being completed, and the distance—six paces—duly stepped out, the duellists walked up to their respective stations. Their proximity was perfectly frightful. The pistols were then placed in their hands, and we stepped to a little distance from them.

“Fire!” said Lord A——; and the word had hardly passed his lips, before Lord ——’s ball whizzed close past the ear of Mr Stafford. The latter, who had not even elevated his pistol at the word of command, after eyeing his antagonist for an instant with a scowl of contempt, fired in the air, and then jerked the pistol away towards Lord ——, with the distinctly audible words—“Kennel sh! Kennel!” He then walked towards the spot where Mr G—— and I were to soothe her, by reiterating my solemn assurances that Mr Stafford was beyond all danger, and wanted only quiet to recover rapidly.

"Oh, Doctor——! How could you deceive me so yesterday? You knew all about it! How could you look at my little children, and——" Sobs choked her utterance. "Well—I suppose you could not help it! I don't blame you—but my heart is nearly broken about it! Oh, this honour—this honour! I always thought Mr Stafford above the foolery of such things!" She paused—I replied not—for I had not a word to say against what she uttered. I thought and felt with her.

"I would to Heaven that Mr Stafford would forsake Parliament for ever! These hateful politics! He has no peace or rest by day or night!" continued Lady Emma, passionately. "His nights are constantly turned into day—and his day is ever full of hurry and trouble! Heaven knows I would consent to be banished from society—to work for my daily bread—I would submit to any thing, if I could but prevail on Mr Stafford to return to the bosom of his family!—Doctor, my heart's happiness is cankered and gone! Mr Stafford does not tolerate me—his heart is not mine—it is not——" So again she burst into tears. "What can your ladyship mean?" I enquired with surprise.

"What I say, Doctor," she replied, sobbing, "he is wedded to ambition! ambition alone! Oh, I am often tempted to wish I had never seen or known him! For the future, I shall live trembling from day to day, fearful of the recurrence of such frightful scenes as yesterday! his reason will be failing him—his reason!" she repeated with a shudder, "and then!" Her emotions once more deprived her of utterance. I felt for her from my very soul! I was addressing some consolatory remark to her, when a gentle tapping was heard at the door. "Come in," said Lady Emma, and Mr Stafford's valet made his appearance, saying, with hurried gestures and grimaces—"Ah, Docteur! Mons. déraisonné—il est fou! Il veut absolument voir Milord——! Je ne puis lui faire passer cette idée là!"

"What can be the matter?" exclaimed Lady Emma, looking at me with alarm.

"Oh, only some little wandering, I dare say; but I'll soon return and report progress!" said I, prevailing on her to wait my return, and hurrying to the sick chamber. To my surprise and alarm, I found Mr Stafford sitting nearly bolt upright in bed, his eyes directed anxiously to the door.

"Doctor ——," said he, as soon as I had taken my seat beside him, "I insist on seeing Lord ——," naming the prime minister; "I positively insist upon it! Let his lordship be shewn up instantly." I implored him to lie down, at the peril of his life, and be calm—but he insisted on seeing Lord —— "He is gone, and left word that he would call at this time to-morrow," said I, hoping to quiet him.

"Indeed? Good of him! What can he want? The office is disposed of. There! there! he is stepped back again! Shew him up—shew him up! What, insult the King's Prime Minister? Shew him up, Louis," addressing his valet, adding drowsily, in a fainter tone, "and the members—the members—the—the—who paired off—who pair——" he sunk gradually down on the pillow, the perspiration burst forth, and he fell asleep. Finding he slept on tranquilly and soundly, I once more left him, and having explained it to Lady Emma, bade her good evening, and returned to town. The surgeon who was in constant attendance on him, called at my house during the afternoon of the following day, and gave me so good an account of him, that I did not think it necessary to go down till the day after, as I had seriously broken in upon my own practice. When I next saw him he was mending rapidly. He even persuaded me into allowing him to have the daily papers read to him—a circumstance I much regretted after I left him, and suddenly recollected how often the public prints made allusions to him—some of them not very kindly or complimentary. But there was no resisting his importunity. He had a wonderful wheedling way with him. Two days after, he got me to consent to his receiving the visits of his political friends; and really the renewal of his accustomed stimulus conducted materially to hasten his recovery.

Scarcely six weeks from the day of the duel, was this indefatigable and ardent spirit, Mr Stafford, on his legs in the House of Commons, electrifying it and the nation at large, by a speech of the most overwhelming power and splendour! He flung his scorching sarcasms mercilessly at the astounded Opposition, especially at those who had contrived to render themselves in any way prominent in their opposition to his policy during his absence! By an artful manœuvre of rhetoric—a skilful allusion to “recent unhappy circumstances,” he carried the House with him from the very commencement, enthusiastically to the end, and was at last obliged to pause almost every other minute, that the cheering might subside. The unfortunate nobleman who had stepped into the shoes which had been first placed at Mr Stafford’s feet—so to speak—came in for the cream of the whole! A ridiculous figure he cut! Jokes, even lampoons, fell upon him like a shower of missiles on a man in the pillory! He was a fat man, and sat perspiring under it! The instant Mr Stafford sat down, this unlucky personage arose to reply. His odd and angry gesticulations, as he vainly attempted to make himself heard amidst incessant shouts of laughter, served to clinch the nail which had been fixed by Mr Stafford; and the indignant senator presently left the House. Another—and another—and another of the singed ones, arose and “followed on the same side,” but to no purpose. It was in vain to buffet against the spring-tide of favour which had set in to Mr Stafford! That night will not be forgotten by either his friends or his foes. He gained his point! within a fortnight he had ousted his rival, and was gazetted — Secretary! The effort he made, however, on the occasion last alluded to, brought him again under my hands for several days. Indeed, indeed, I never had such an intractable patient! He could not be prevailed on to shew any mercy to his constitution—he would not give nature fair play. Night and day—morning, noon, evening—spring, summer, autumn, winter—found him toiling on the tempestuous ocean of politics, his mind ever laden with the most harassing and exhausting cares. The eminent situation he filled brought him, of course, an immense accession of cares and anxieties. He was virtually the leader of the House of Commons; and, though his exquisite tact and talent secured to himself personally the applause and admiration of all parties, the government to which he belonged was beginning to disclose symptoms of disunion and disorganization at a time when public affairs were becoming every hour more and more involved—our domestic and foreign policy perplexed—the latter almost inextricably—every day assuming a new and different aspect, through the operation of the great events incessantly transpiring on the continent. The national confidence began rapidly to ebb away from the Ministers, and symptoms of a most startling character appeared in different parts of the country. The House of Commons—the pulse of popular feeling—began to beat irregularly—now intermitting—now with feverish strength and rapidity—clearly indicating that the circulation was disordered. Nearly the whole of the newspapers turned against the Ministry, and assailed them with the bitterest and foulest obloquy. Night after night poor Mr Stafford talked himself hoarse, feeling that he was the acknowledged mouth-piece of the Ministry, but in vain. Ministers were perpetually left in miserable minorities; they were beaten at every point. Their ranks presented the appearance of a straggling disbanded army; those of the Opposition hung together like a shipwrecked crew clinging to the last fragments of their wreck. Can the consequence be wondered at?

At length came the Budget, word of awful omen to many a quaking Ministry! In vain were the splendid powers of Mr Stafford put into requisition. In vain did his masterly mind fling light and order over his sombrous chaotic subject, and simplify and make clear to the whole country the, till then, dreary jargon and mysticism of financial technicalities. In vain, in vain did he display the sweetness of Cicero, the thunder of Demosthenes. The leader of the Opposition rose, and coolly turned all he had said into ridicule; one of his squad then started to his feet, and made out poor Mr Stafford to be a sort of ministerial swindler; and the rest cunningly gave the cue to the country, and raised up in every quarter clamorous dissatisfaction. Poor Stafford began to look haggard and wasted; and the papers said he stalked into the House, night after night, like a spectre. The hour of the Ministry was come. They were beaten on the first item, in the committee of supply. Mr Stafford resigned in disgust and indignation; and that broke up the government.

I saw him the morning after he had formally tendered his resignation, and given up the papers, &c. of office. He was pitifully emaciated. The fire of his eye was quenched, his sonorous voice broken. I could scarce repress a tear as I gazed at his sallow haggard features, and his languid limbs drawn together on his library sofa.

"Doctor—my friend! This frightful session has killed me, I'm afraid!" said he. "I feel equally wasted in body and mind. I loathe life—every thing!"

"I don't think you've been fairly dealt with! You've been crippled—shackled——"

"Yes—cursed—cursed—cursed in my colleagues," he interrupted me with eager bitterness; "it is there execrable little-mindedness and bigotry that have concentrated on us the hatred of the nation. As for myself, I am sacrificed, and to no purpose. I feel I cannot long survive it; for I am withered, root and branch—withered!"

"Be persuaded, Mr Stafford," said I, gently, "to withdraw for a while, and recruit."

"Oh, ay, ay—any whither—any whither—as far off as possible from London—that's all. God pity the man that holds office in these times. The talents of half the angels in heaven wouldn't avail him! Doctor, I rave. Forgive me—I'm in a morbid, nay, almost rabid mood of mind. Foiled at every point—others robbing me of the credit of my labours—scoffed at by fools—trampled on by the aristocracy—oh tut, tut, tut—lie on it all!" * *

"Have you seen the morning papers, Mr Stafford?"

"Not I, indeed. Sick of their cant—lies—tergiversation—scurrility. I've laid an embargo on them all. I won't let one come to my house for a fortnight. 'Tis adding fuel to the fire that is consuming me."

"Ah, but they represent the nation as calling loudly for your re-instatement in office."

"Faugh—let it call! Let them lie on! I'm done with them—for the present."

The servant brought up the cards of several of his late colleagues. "Not at home, sirrah!—Harkee—ill—ill," thundered his master. I sat with him nearly an hour longer. Oh, what gall and bitterness flattered every word he uttered! How his chafed and fretted spirit spurned at sympathy, and despised—even acquiescence! He complained heavily of perfidy and ingratitude on the part of many members of the House of Commons; and expressed his solemn determination—should he ever return to power—to visit them with his signal vengeance. His eyes flashed fire as he recounted the instance of one well-known individual, whom he had paid heavily beforehand for his vote, by a sinecure, and by whom he was after all unblushingly "jockeyed," on the score of the salary being a few pounds per annum less than had been calculated on! "Oh, believe me," he continued, "of all knavish trafficking, there is none like your political trafficking, of all swindlers, your political swindler is the vilest." Before I next saw him, the new ministry had been named, some of the leading members of which were among Mr Stafford's bitterest and most contemptuous enemies, and had spontaneously pledged themselves to act diametrically opposite to the policy he had adopted. This news was too much for him; and full of unutterable fury and chagrin, he hastily left town, and, with all his family, betook himself, for an indefinite period, to a distant part of England. I devoutly hoped that he had now had his surfeit of politics, and would henceforth seek repose in the domestic circle. Lady Emma participated anxiously in that wish: she doted on her husband more fondly than ever; and her faded beauty touchingly told with what deep devotion she had identified herself with her husband's interests.

As I am not writing a life of Mr Stafford, I must leap over a further interval of twelve anxious and agitating years. He returned to Parliament, and for several sessions shone brilliantly as the leader of the Opposition. Being freed from the trammels of office, his spirits resumed their wonted elasticity, and his health became firmer than it had been for years—so that there was little necessity for my visiting him on any other footing than that of friendship. A close observer could not fail to detect the system of Mr Stafford's Parliamentary tactics. He subordinated every thing to accomplish the great purpose of his life. He took every possible opportunity, in eloquent and brilliant speeches, of familiarizing Parliament, and the country at large, with his own principles; dexterously contrasting with them the narrow and inconsistent policy of his opponents. He felt that he was daily increasing the number of his partisans both in and out of the House—and securing a prospect of his speedy return to permanent power. One day mentioned this feature, and told him I admired the way in which he gradually insinuated himself into the confidence of the country.

"Aha, Doctor!"—he replied briskly—"to borrow one of your own terms—I'm vaccinating the nation!"

July —, 18—.—The star of Stafford again Lord of the Ascendant! This day have the seals of the — office been intrusted to my gifted friend Stafford, amid the thunders of the Commons, and the universal gratulations of the country. He is virtually the Leader of the Cabinet, and has it "all his own way" with the House. Every appearance he makes there is the signal for a perfect tempest of applause—with, however, a few lightning-gleams of inveterate hostility. His course is full of dazzling dangers. There are breakers ahead—he must tack about incessantly amid shoals and quicksands. God help him; and give him calmness and self-possession—or he is lost!

I suppose there will be no getting near him, at least to such an insignificant person as myself—unless he should unhappily require my professional services. How my heart beats when I hear it said in society, that he seems to feel most acutely the attacks incessantly made on him—and appears ill every day! Poor Stafford! I wonder how Lady Emma bears all this!

I hear everywhere that a tremendous opposition is organizing, countenanced in very high quarters, and that he will have hard work to maintain his ground. He is paramount at present, and laughs his enemies to scorn! His name, coupled with almost idolatrous expressions of homage, is in every one's mouth of the varium et mutabile semper race. His pictures are in every shop window; dinners are given him every week; addresses forwarded from all parts of the country; the freedom of large cities and corporations voted him; in short, there is scarce any thing said or done in public, but what Mr Stafford's name is coupled with it. * * *

March —, 18—.—Poor Stafford, baited incessantly in the House, night after night. Can he stand? every body is asking. He has commenced the session swimmingly—as the phrase is. Lady Emma, whom I accidentally met to-day at the house of a patient—herself full of feverish excitement—gives me a sad account of Mr Stafford. Restless nights—incessant sleep-talking—continual indisposition—loss of appetite! Oh, the pleasures of politics, the sweets of ambition!

Saturday.—A strange hint in one of the papers to-day about Mr Stafford's unaccountable freaks in the House, and treatment of various members. What can it mean? A fearful suspicion glanced across my mind—Heaven grant it may be groundless—on coupling with this dark newspaper hint an occurrence which took place some short time ago. It was this. Lady Amelia — was suddenly taken ill at a ball given by the Duke of —, and I was called in to attend her. She had swooned in the midst of the dance, and continued hysterical for some time after her removal home. I asked her what had occasioned it all—and she told me that she happened to be passing, in the dance, a part of the room where Mr Stafford stood, who had looked in for a few minutes to speak to the Marquis of —. "He was standing in a thoughtful attitude," she continued, "and some-hour or another I attracted his attention in passing, and he gave me one of the most fiendish scowls, accompanied with a frightful glare of the eye, I ever encountered. It passed from his face in an instant, and was succeeded by a smile, as he nodded repeatedly to persons who saluted him. The look he gave me haunted me, and, added to the exhaustion I felt from the heat of the room, occasioned my swooning." Though I felt faint at heart while listening to her, I laughed it off, and said it must have been fancy. "No, no, Doctor, it was not," she replied, "for the Marchioness of — saw it too, and no later than this very morning, when she called, asked me if I had affronted Mr Stafford."

Could it be so? Was this "look" really a transient ghastly out-flashing of insanity? Was his great mind beginning to stagger under the mighty burden it bore? The thought agitated me beyond measure. When I coupled the incident in question with the mysterious hint in the daily print, my fears were awfully corroborated. I resolved to call upon Mr Stafford that very evening. I was at his house about eight o'clock, but found he had left a little while before for Windsor. The next morning, however—Sunday—his servant brought me word that Mr Stafford would be glad to see me between eight and ten o'clock in the evening. Thither, therefore, I repaired, about half-past eight. On sending up my name, his private secretary came down stairs, and conducted me to the minister's library—a spacious and richly furnished room. Statues stood in the window-places, and busts of British statesmen in the four corners. The sides were lined with book-shelves, filled with elegantly bound volumes; and a large table in the middle of the room was covered with tape-tied packets, opened and unopened letters, &c. &c. &c. A large bronze lamp was suspended from the ceiling, and threw a peculiarly rich and mellow light over the whole—and especially the figure of Mr Stafford, who, in his long crimson silk dressing-gown, was walking rapidly to and fro, with his arms folded on his breast. The first glance shewed me that he was labouring under high excitement. His face was pale, and his brilliant eyes glanced restlessly from beneath his intensely knit brows.

"My dear Doctor—an age since I saw you!—Here I am—overwhelmed, you see, as usual!" said he, cordially taking me by the hand, and leading me to a seat.—"My dear sir, you give yourself no rest—you are actually—you are rapidly destroying yourself!" said I, after he had, in his own brief, energetic, and pointed language, described a train of symptoms bordering on those of brain-fever. He had, unknown to any one, latterly taken to opium, which he swallowed by stealth, in large quantities, on retiring to bed; and I need hardly say how that of itself was sufficient to derange the functions both of body and mind. He had lost his appetite, and felt consciously sinking every day into a state of the utmost languor and exhaustion—so much so, that he was reluctant often to rise and dress, or go out. His temper, he said, began to fail him, and he grew fretful and irritable with every body, and on every occasion. "Doctor, Doctor, I don't know whether you'll understand me or not—but every thing gazes at me!" said he. "Every object grows suddenly invested with personality—animation—I can't bear to look at them!—I am oppressed—I breathe a rarified atmosphere!"—"Your nervous system is disturbed, Mr Stafford."—"I live in a dim dream—with only occasional intervals of real consciousness. Every thing is false and exaggerated about me. I see, feel, think, through a magnifying medium—in a word, I'm in a strange, unaccountable state."

"Can you wonder at it—even if it were worse?" said I, expostulating vehemently with him on his incessant, unmitigated application to public business. "Believe me," I concluded, with energy, "you must lie by, or be laid by."—"Ah—good, that—trava! But what's to be done? Must I resign? Must public business stand still in the middle of the session? I've made my bed, and must lie on it."

I really was at a loss what to say. He could not bear "preaching" or "prosing," or any thing approaching to it. I suffered him to go on as he would—detailing more and more symptoms like those above mentioned—clearly enough disclosing to my reluctant eyes, reason holding her reins loosely, unsteadily!

"I can't account for it, Doctor—but I feel sudden fits of wildness sometimes—but for a moment—a second!—Oh, my Creator! I hope all is yet sound here, here!" said he, pressing his hand against his forehead. He rose and walked rapidly to and fro. "Excuse me, Doctor, I cannot sit still!" said he. * * *

"Have I not enough to upset me?—Only listen to a tithe of my troubles, now!—After paying almost servile court to a parcel of Parliamentary puppies, ever since the commencement of the session, to secure their votes on the — bill—having the boobies here to dine with me, and then dining with them, week after week—sitting down gaily with fellows whom I utterly, unutterably despise—every one of the pack suddenly turned tail on me—stole, stole away—every one—and left me in a ridiculous minority of 43!"—I said it was a sample of the annoyances inseparable from office.—"Ay, ay, ay!" he replied, with impetuous bitterness, increasing the pace at which he was walking. "Why—why is it, that public men have no principle—no feeling—no gratitude—no sympathy?" he paused. I said, mildly, that I hoped the throng of the session was nearly got through, that his embarrassments would diminish, and he would have some leisure on his hands.

"Oh no, no, no!—my difficulties and perplexities increase and thicken on every side!—Great heavens! how are we to get on?—All the motions of government are impeded—we are hemmed in—blocked up—on every side—the state-vessel is surrounded with closing, crashing icebergs!—I think I must quit the helm!—Look here, for instance. After ransacking all the arts and resources of diplomacy, I had, with infinite difficulty, succeeded in devising a scheme for adjusting our — differences. Several of the continental powers have acquiesced—all was going on well—when this very morning comes a courier to Downing Street, bearing a civil hint from the Austrian cabinet, that, if I persevered with my project, such a procedure will be considered equivalent to a declaration of war!—So there we are at a dead stand!—'Tis all that execrable Metternich! Subtle devil! He's at the bottom of all the disturbances in Europe!—Again—here, at home, we are all on our backs!—I stand pledged to the — bill. I will, and must go through with it. My consistency, popularity, place—all are at stake! I'm bound to carry it—and only yesterday the —, and —, and — families—'gad!—half the Upper House—have given me to understand I must give up them, or the — bill!—And then we are all at daggers-drawn among ourselves—a cabinet-council like a cockpit, — and — eternally bickering!—And again—last night his Majesty behaved with marked coolness and hauteur; and while sipping his claret, told ~~me~~ with stern sang-froid, that his consent to the — bill was "utterly out of the question." Must throw overboard the —, a measure that I have more at heart than any other!—It is whispered that — is determined to draw me into a duel; and, as if all this were not enough, I am perpetually receiving threats of assassination; and, in fact, a bullet ~~him~~ed close past my hat the other day while on horseback, on my way to —! I can't make the thing public—'tis impossible; and perhaps the very next hour I move out, I may be ~~shot~~ through the heart!—Oh, God, what is to become of me? Would to heaven I had refused the seals of the — office!—Doctor, do you think—the nonsense of medicine apart—do you think you can do any thing for me? Any thing to quiet the system—to cool the brain? Would bleeding do? Bathing? What?—But mind—I've not much time for physic—I'm to open the — question to-morrow night; and then every hour to dictate fifteen or twenty letters! In a word!"—

"Colonel Lord —, sir," said the servant, appearing at the door.

"Ah, execrable coxcomb!" he muttered to me. "I know what he is come about—he has badgered me incessantly for the last six weeks!—I won't see him—not at home!" to the servant. He paused. "Stay, sirrah!—beg the colonel to walk up stairs." Then to me, "The man can command his two brothers' votes—I must have them to-morrow night.—Doctor, we must part," hearing approaching footsteps. "I've been raving like a madman, I fear—not a word to any one breathing!—Ah, colonel, good evening—good evening!" said he, with a gaiety and briskness of tone and manner that utterly confounded me—walking and meeting his visitor half-way, and shaking him by the hands. Poor Stafford! I returned to my own quiet home, and devoutly thanked God, who had shut me out from such splendid misery, as I witnessed in the Right Honourable Charles Stafford!

Tuesday.—Poor Stafford spoke splendidly in the House, last night, for upwards of three hours; and at the bottom of the reported speech, a note was added, informing the reader, that "Mr Stafford was looking better than they had seen him for some months, and seemed to enjoy excellent spirits." How little did he, who penned that note, suspect the true state of matters—that Mr Stafford owed his "better looks" and "excellent spirits" to an intoxicating draught of raw brandy, which alone enabled him to face the House! I read his speech with agonizing interest; it was full of flashing fancy, and powerful argumentative eloquence, and breathed throughout a buoyant elastic spirit, which nothing seemed capable of overpowering or depressing. But Mr Stafford might have saved his trouble and anxiety—for he was worsted—and his bill lost by an overwhelming majority! Oh! could his relentless opponents have seen but a glimpse of what I had seen, they would have spared their noble victim the sneers and railleries with which they pelted him throughout the evening.

Friday.—I this afternoon had an opportunity of conversing confidentially with Mr Stafford's private secretary, who corroborated my worst fears, by communicating his own, and their reasons, amounting to irrefragable evidence, that Mr Stafford was beginning to give forth effusions of madness. He would sometimes totally lose his recollection of what he had done during the day, and dictate three answers to the same letter. He would, at the public office, sometimes enter into a strain of conversation with his astounded underlings, so absurd and imprudent, disclosing the profoundest secrets of state, as must have inevitably and instantly ruined him, had he not been surrounded by those who were personally attached to him. Mr—— communicated various other little symptoms of the same kind. Mr Stafford was once on his way down to the House, in his dressing-gown, and could be persuaded with the utmost difficulty only to return and change it. He would sometimes go down to his country-house, and receive his lady and children with such an extravagant—such a frantic display of spirit and gaiety, as at first delighted, then surprised, and finally alarmed Lady Emma into a horrid suspicion of the real state of her husband's mind.

I was surprised early one morning by his coachman's calling at my house, and desiring to see me alone; and when he was shewn into my presence, with a flurried manner, many apologies for his "boldness," and entreaties—somewhat Hibernian, to be sure, in the wording—that I "would take no notice whatever of what he said"—he told me that his master's conduct had latterly been "very odd and queer-like." That on getting into his carriage, on his return from the House, Mr Stafford would direct him to drive five or six miles into the country, at the top of his speed—then back again—then to some distant part of London, without once alighting, and with no apparent object; so that it was sometimes five or six, or even seven o'clock in the morning before they got home! "Last night, sir," he added, "master did something uncommon 'straordinary—he told me to drive to Greenwich—and when I gets there, he bids me pull up at the ——, and get him a draught of ale—and then he drinks a sup, and tells me and John to finish it—and then turn the horses' heads back again for town!"—I gave the man half a guinea, and solemnly enjoined him to keep what he had told me a profound secret.

What was to be done? What steps could we take? How deal with such a public man as Mr Stafford? I felt myself in a fearful dilemma. Should I communicate candidly with Lady Emma? I thought it better, on the whole, to wait a little longer—and was delighted to find, that as public business slackened a little, and Mr Stafford carried several favourite measures very successfully, and with comparatively little effort, he intermitted his attention to business, and was persuaded into spending the recess at the house of one of his relatives, a score or two miles from town—whose enchanting house and grounds, and magnificent hospitalities, served to occupy Mr Stafford's mind with bustling and pleasurable thoughts. Such a fortnight's interval did wonders for him. Lady Emma, whom I had requested to write frequently to me about him, represented things more and more cheerfully in every succeeding letter—saying, that the “distressing flightiness,” which Mr Stafford had occasionally evinced in town, had totally disappeared: that every body at — House was astonished at the elasticity and joyousness of Mr Stafford's spirits, and the energy almost amounting to enthusiasm, with which he entered into the glittering gaieties and festivities that were going on around him. “He was the life and soul of the party.” He seemed determined to banish business from his thoughts, at least for a while; and when a change allusion was made to it, would put it off gaily with—“sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.” All this filled me with consolation. I dismissed the apprehensions which had latterly harassed my mind concerning him, and heartily thanked God that Mr Stafford's splendid powers seemed likely to be yet long spared to the country—that the hovering fiend was benten off from his victim—might it be for ever!

The House at length resumed; Mr Stafford returned to town, and all his weighty cares again gathered around him. Hardly a few days had elapsed, before he delivered one of the longest, calmest, most argumentative speeches which had ever fallen from him. Indeed it began to be commonly remarked, that all he said in the House wore a matter-of-fact business-like air, which nobody could have expected from him. All this was encouraging. The measure which he brought forward in the speech last alluded to, was hotly contested, inch by inch, in the House, and at last, contrary even to his own expectations, carried, though by an inconsiderable majority. All his friends congratulated him on his triumph.

“Yes, I HAVE triumphed at last,” he said, emphatically, as he left the House. He went home, late at night, and alarmed—confounded his domestics by calling them all up, and—it is lamentable to have to record such things of such a man—insisting on their illuminating the House—candles in every window—in front and behind! It was fortunate that Lady Emma and her family had not yet returned from — House, to witness this unequivocal indication of returning insanity. He himself personally assisted at the ridiculous task of lighting the candles, and putting them in the windows; and when it was completed, actually harangued the assembled servants on the signal triumph he and the country had obtained that night in the House of Commons, and concluded by ordering them to extinguish the lights, and adjourn to the kitchen to supper, when he would presently join them, and give them a dozen of wine! He was as good as his word; yes, Mr Stafford sat at the head of his confounded servants—few in number, on account of the family's absence, and engaged in the most uproarious hilarity! Fortunately, most fortunately, his conduct was unhesitatingly attributed to intoxication—in which condition he was really carried to bed at an advanced hour in the morning, by those whom nothing but their bashful fears had saved from being similarly overcome by the wine they had been drinking. All this was told me by the coachman, who had communicated with me formerly—and with tears, for he was an old and faithful servant. He assiduously kept up among his fellow-servants the notion that their master's drunkenness was the cause of his extraordinary behaviour.

I called on him the day after, and found him sitting in his library, dictating to his secretary, whom he directed to withdraw as soon as I entered. He then drew his chair close to mine, and burst into tears.

"Doctor, would you believe it," said he, "I was horridly drunk last night—I can't imagine how—and am sure I did something or other very absurd among the servants. I dare not, of course, ask any of them—and am positively ashamed to look even my valet in the face!"

"Poh, poh—Scmet insani-vimus omnes," I stammered, attempting to smile—scarce knowing what to say.

"Don't—don't desert me, Doctor!"—he sobbed, clasping my hand, and looking sorrowfully in my face—"Don't you desert me, my tried friend. Every body is forsaking me!—the King hates me—the Commons despise me—the people would have my blood, if they dared!—And yet why?—What have I done?—God knows, I have done every thing for the best—indeed, indeed I have!"—I continued grasping his hand in silence.

"There's a terrible plot hatching against me!—Hush!" He rose, and bolted the door. "Did you see that fellow whom I ordered out on your entrance?"—naming his private secretary—"Well, that infamous fellow thinks he is to succeed me in my office, and has actually gained over the King and several of the aristocracy to his interest!"

"Nonsense—nonsense—stuff!—You have wine in your head, Mr Stafford," said I, angrily, trying to choke down my emotions.

"No, sir—sober enough now, Doctor —. I'll tell you what (albeit unused to the melting mood) has thus overcome me. Lady Emma favours the scoundrel! They correspond! My children, even, are gained over!—But Emma, my wife, my love, who could have thought it!"

* * * I succeeded in calming him, and he began to converse on different subjects, although the fiend was manifest again! "Doctor —, I'll intrust you with a secret—a state secret! You must know that I have long entertained the idea of uniting all the European states into one vast republic, and have at last arranged a scheme which will, I think, be unhesitatingly adopted. I have written to Prince — on the subject, and expect his answer soon! Isn't it a grand thought!" I assented, of course. "It will emblazon my name in the annals of eternity, beyond all Roman and all Grecian fame," he continued, waving his hand oratorically; "but I've been—yes, ~~yes~~—premature!—My secret is safe with you, Doctor —?"

"Oh, certainly!" I replied, with a melancholy air, uttering a deep sigh.

"But now to business. I'll tell you why I've sent for you." I had called unasked, as the reader will recollect. "I'll tell you," he continued, taking my hand affectionately, "Doctor —, I have known you now for many years, ever since we were at Cambridge together," (my heart ached at the recollection,) "and we have been good friends ever since. I have noticed that you have never asked a favour from me since I knew you. Every one else has teased me—but I have never had a request preferred me from you, my dear friend." He burst into tears, mine very nearly overflowing. There was no longer any doubt that Mr Stafford—the great, the gifted Mr Stafford, was sitting before me in a state of idiocy!—of madness! I felt faint and sick as he proceeded.—"Well! I thank God I have it now in my power to reward you—to offer you something that will fully show the love I bear you, and my unlimited confidence in your talents and integrity. I have determined to recall our ambassador at the court of —, and shall supply his place"—he looked at me with a good-natured smile—"by my friend Dr —!" He leaned back in his chair, and eyed me with a triumphant, a gratified air, evidently preparing himself to be overwhelmed with my thanks. In one instant, however, a change came o'er the aspect of his dream." His features grew suddenly disturbed, now flushed, now pale; his manner grew restless and embarrassed, and I felt convinced that a lucid interval had occurred, that a consciousness of his having been either saying or doing something very absurd, had that instant flashed across his mind. "Ah, I see, Doctor —!" he resumed, in an altered tone, speaking hesitatingly, while a vivid glance shot from his eye into my very soul, as though he would see whether I had detected the process of thought which had passed through his mind, "you look surprised—ha, ha!—and well you may! But now I'll explain the riddle. You must know that Lord — is expecting to be our new ambassador, and in fact I must offer it him; but—but—I wish to pique him into declining it, when I'll take offence—by—by telling him—hinting carelessly, that one of my friends had the prior refusal of it?"

Did not the promptitude and plausibility of this pretext savour of madness? He hinted soon after that he had much business in hand, and I withdrew. I fell back in my carriage, and resigned myself to bitter and agonizing reflections on the scene I had just quitted. What was to be done? Mr Stafford, by some extravagant act, might commit himself frightfully with public affairs.

Lady Emma, painful as the task was, must be written to. Measures must now be had recourse to. The case admitted of no farther doubt. Yes—this great man must be put into constraint, and that immediately. In the tumult of my thoughts, I scarce knew what to decide on; but at last I ordered the man to drive to the houses of Sir —, and Dr —, and consult with them on the proper course to be pursued.

Oh, God!—Oh, horror!—Oh, my unhappy soul!—Despair! Hark—what do I hear?—Do I hear aright—

Have I seen aright—or is it all a dream?—Shall I wake to-morrow, and find it false?

ARTHUR'S HOMER.

CRITIQUE II.

Reader, beautiful or brave! lend us your ears, while again we seek to hold with you converse high about old Homer and the Heroic Age. These are mechanical times in which we live; those knew no machinery but of the gods. Now, Science, the son of Intellect, is sole sovereign; then, the Muses, daughters of Memory, queenlike reigned on earth. Three thousand years ago, Rhapsodists roamed o'er continent and isle—all last summer we saw not so much as a poetical pedlar. Reason is our idol now—we bow down to it, and worship it; and Imagination, though she will have a dwelling-place in the world of Poetry, has been banished from life.

We, however, the Magicians, hold by another creed. We rejoice in being—we shall not say how far—behind the age in which, nevertheless, we flourish. The president of a mechanic's institution, in the suburbs of a hardware town, does not seem to us the beau idéal of humanity. The schoolmaster who is now often abroad—when he ought to be at home—is less an object of our admiration than many an unlettered swain who lived before Cadmus. We can see much to rejoice in, throughout the ongoings even of that life,

"When wild in woods the noble savage ran;"

but then it is that our hearts burn within us, when that barbarian,

"The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle," brings before our eyes a whole host of barbarians, some of them "dark with excessive bright"—Agamemnon and Achilles—for specimen or example—who, glaring on that Devoted City, had pitched their innumerable tents by the sounding sea. Yes—all the heroes of that age were but barbarians; and so must have been the divinities they worshipped, and from whose "shining loins" some of them had strongly sprung. The high-browed Maid vainly imagined the Goddess of Wisdom was but a barbarian; though the delight of heaven and earth—no better was Venus; nor Juno, when to the smiles of Jove she

"Roll'd the large orbs of her majestic eyes!"

And what else was Jove himself, with his knowing knack of nodding, &c., but the barbarian king of a barbarian heaven? Or Apollo, nathless his celestial beauty, the far-shooting god? Barbarians like themselves too, were all their messengers and all their ministers. Witness, in particular, those two—Hebe, the Morn-faced, and Iris, the Rainbow. Then their language! Look at it in their own Acts—and you pity alike the poor gods and men, when you think that the best among them went gabbling to their graves, or, more melancholy still, as they thought to all eternity—something they chose to call Greek! Yes, yes, yes, it is well known now to the very braziers of Birmingham that they were all barbarians. Vulcan could not have shewn his face at Sheffield—all the smiths would have smiled sardonically at the Shield he fashioned for the Son of Thetis, and called it a clumsy concern. What was Argive Helen at her Sidonian loom, in the palace of Alexander the Fair in state-ly-structured Troy, to a spinning-jenny in a manufactory at Salford? Still, why! oh why! with all the scorn expressed by this civilized age, of that age of barbarians, continue men inconsistently still to talk of the "tale of Troy divine?" And how happens it that on the shoulders of shitting Savoyards you see, among a host of heads hoisted along through the streets of all the cities, conspicuous in the very centre, the most awful of them all, the head of old Homer?

But no more prosing; let us come at once to our predestined Selections from Sotheby and other worthies, who have striven in spirit with the strength, stateliness, and solemnity, or in spirit delivered themselves up to the softness, sweetness, sadness,—for in all these different delights is it indeed divine,—of the Sixth Book of the Iliad. We have sat at the knees of Professor Young, looking up to his kindling or shaded countenance, while that "old man eloquent" gave life to every line, till Hector and Andromache seemed to our imagination standing side by side beneath a radiant rainbow glorious on a showery heaven—such, during his inspiration, was the creative power of the majesty and the beauty of their smiles and tears. That was long, long ago, in the Greek class of the College of Glasgow; and though that bright scholar's Greek was Scotch Greek, and in all its vowels and diphthongs, and some of its consonants too, especially that glorious guttural that sounds in locks, —all unlike the English Greek that soon afterwards, beneath the shadow of Magdalen Tower, the fairest of all Oxford's stately structures, was poured mellifluous ~~ed~~ our delighted ear from the lips of President Routh, the Erudite and the Wise,—still hath the music of that "repeated strain" a charm to our souls, remembering us of "life's morning march when our spirits were young," and when we could see, even as with our bodily eyes, things far away in space or time, and Troy hung visibly before us, even as the sun-setting clouds. Therefore till death shall we love the Sixth Book of the Iliad; and if we understand it not, then indeed has our whole life been vainer than the shadow of a dream.

During Four Books earth and heaven have been tumulted by battles. But now there is a pause in the Fight—a priest-imposed pause—for Helenus, you know, is the chief Augur of Troy, the metropolitan Bishop, Blomfield and Howley in one, and he has commanded Hector to return to the city, in order to appoint a solemn procession of the Queen and the Trojan matrons to the Temple of Minerva, to entreat her to remove from the field the dreadful Diomed. Hector obeys—leaps from his car—vibrating his spears, slays the Greeks—and exhorting the Trojans, and their "far-called far-famed allies," to stand firm till his return from Troy, as Homer and Sotheby tell us—

"Around him, passing from the battle-field,

Cast the circumference of his bossy shield,
Whose ample border, as he forward sprang,
Clashed on his neck, and on his aukless rang."

Behold, now, reader heroic or heroine, the two Battles lowering aloof, beneath the very walls, with but a short green space between—a stately stage, is it not, for the representation of some high drama? The whole house is thrown into the pit, and both armies can see and hear to a man. Overhead are the aerial galleries, filled with the gods. And should Jove thunder, the flash and the crash of his electricity will be something superior to either John Dennis or Harry Brougham's, though neither of them, in its way, is much amiss; bear witness in a thousand bottles the sudden sourness of much small-beer. No need for Jupiter, when he brandishes his bolts, to cry, "that's my thunder!"

Who then shall dare, "insupportably their steps advance," to enact their swelling parts on such a stage? Well-graced actors must they be, whose prattle shall not be tedious; and lo! Diomed, second only to Achilles, to represent the Greeks; and for the Trojans, Glaucus, no sorry substitute for Hector—men of deeds both, as well as words; with them 'tis a word and a blow—the blow first, and sheer smite their swords, like lightning the oak-splitter. Diomed, fierce, fiery, and furious, is like Edmund Kean—Glaucus, dignified in his dreadfulness, reminds us of the late John Kemble. Nor deem that these similitudes sink the grandeur of the scene or of its actors; for Kean, had he fought at Troy, small as he is, would have been a sweeping swordsman; and Kemble, with a pair of spears, would have been a fearful and an effulgent form. This is far from being their first appearance on any stage; and their parts have always been in deepest tragedy. Stars are they—and never have they acted to empty houses, save to those themselves have thinned, making "lanes through largest families," like hurricanes through corn or trees. Silence! The play is going to begin; for hark! a solitary trumpet—blown by Sotheby—given to his hand by Homer.

"Now Glaucus' spirit, and Tydides' rage,
Rush'd in the van to slay and to engage;
But ere they clash'd in arms, stroke threat'ning stroke,
Foremost the son of Tydeus silence broke:
'Who art thou, braves' chief? now first behold—
Thou by no son of mortal mould excell'd—
Thou, whose stern confidence thus rashly shown,
The vengeance of my spear confronts alone,
If aared are the sires whose off-spring dare
Th' measure of their force with mine compare.
But, if descending from Jove's bright abode
Thou tread'st on earth, I strive not 'gainst a god.
Lycurgus, Dryan's son, of mortal birth,
Who war'd against the gods, soon past from earth.
Madman! who chas'd through Nyssa's sacred grove,
Those who o'er Bacchus long with nurturing love.
They, all at once, each thyrsus on the ground
Cast, as Lycurgus' ox-goad dealt the wound;
Not less alarm'd, the god, with heading leap,
Fell from his race and plung'd beneath the deep,
Where, in her bosom, Thetis shelter gave,
And hid his terror in her inmost cave.
But the due hate of heav'n, and vengeful Jove,
Doom'd him to sightless wretchedness to rove—
Not long: so swift the stroke of vengeance burst
On his proud brow, by men and gods accurst.
If, then, a god thou art, I shun thy might;
If mortal, now come forth to mortal fight.
Come—and if aught of earth sustain thy breath,
This arm now hurls thee to the gates of death."

Is not that noble? Nor need you much lament, here, that you cannot read the original, if so it be that, like Shakspeare, you "have no Greek;" for Sotheby is here of himself sufficient to raise your spirit to the height of noblest daring, breathing deliberate valour, as you turn your wondering eyes towards that other hero who, Diomed thought, might be a god. So see and hear Glaucus.

HOMER.

 POPE.

"What, or from whence I am, or who my sire,
 Replied the chief, 'can Tydens' son require?
 Like leaves on trees, the race of man is found,
 Now green in youth, now withering on the ground;
 Another race the following spring supplies;
 They fall successive, and successive rise;
 So generations in their course decay;
 So flourish these, when those are past away.
 But if thou still persist to reach my birth,
 Then hear a tale that fills the spacious earth."

(OWPEN.

"To whom the illustrious Lycian chief replied,—
 'Why asks the brave Tydides whence am I?
 For, as the leaves, so springs the race of man,
 Chill blasts shake down the leaves, and warm winds new
 By vernal airs, the grove puts forth again;
 Age after age, so man is born and dies.
 Yet if intelligence of my descent
 Engage thy wish, a theme to many known.'" &c.

SOOTHEY.

"He spake, and Glaucus answered:—'Why enquire Whence, from what race I sprung, and who my sire?
 Men, like the leaves, that flourish and decay,
 Race after race come forth, and die away.
 Autumnal gales here strew with leaves the plain,
 There Spring's soft breath new-robes the branch again.
 Thus change the vital tide—wave follows wave;
 Here life, there death, the cradle and the grave!
 But since thy wish, brave chief! my language hear,
 The far-tamed race that distant realms reverse."

Of these three fine translations of one of the most beautiful, because Bible-like, passages in ancient poetry, Sotheby's is, we think, on the whole, the finest; yet is the original better than them all—because more Bible-like. Pope felt the passage when he said, "there is a noble gravity in the beginning of this speech of Glaucus, according to the true style of antiquity. 'Few and evil are our days.' This beautiful thought of our author, whereby the race of man are compared to the leaves of trees, is celebrated by Simonides, in a fine fragment extant in Stobæus. The same thought may be found in Ecclesiastes, almost in the same words, 'as of the green leaves on a thick tree, some fall and some grow, so in the generations of flesh and blood, one cometh to an end, and another is born.'" Pope then says, that the reader, who has seen so many passages imitated from Homer by succeeding poets, will no doubt be pleased to see one of an ancient poet which Homer has here imitated; this is a fragment of Musæus preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus, in his Stromata:

Ὡς δ' αὐτῶς καὶ Φύλλα Φυεὶ ζυμυροὺς ἄνθρωποι
 Ἀλλὰ μὲν ἐν μελίῳσιν ἀποφθίσι, ἀλλὰ δὲ Φύει,
 Ὡς δὲ καὶ ἀνθρώποι νῦν καὶ Φύλλοι ἰσχυροί.

Who, where, and when, was Musæus? All of him but his shining name, we fear, is in oblivion. He was not, as Pope thought, anterior to Homer. For while you read Homer, always remember, as Dr Blair and Mr Henry Nelson Coleridge have told us, that the Iliad is the oldest poetry save that of the Bible. But if it were not, nobody need steal leaves—or images of leaves. For we all see, hear, feel, and know, that they are our brethren. Life is a tree—and when all its sap is dry, and the last leaf, alias the last man, has dropt sere from its last withered branch, then will the old trunk itself be flung into the final fire.

It is pleasant to hear Pope speaking in such a true spirit of the Scriptural simplicity of the old poem. Nor has he here failed in imbuing with it his own sounding strain, although not to the degree one might have hoped and expected from the fine feeling of his illustrations. He makes another remark on this passage, which points out in it a peculiar beauty—a beauty appropriate to the person who utters it. Though the passage, he says, be justly admired for its beauty in this obvious application to the mortality and succession of human life, it seems, however, designed by the poet in this place as a proper emblem of the transitory state, not of man, but of families, which being, by their misfortunes or follies, fallen or decayed, do again, in a happier season, revive and flourish in the fame and virtues of their posterity. In this sense, it is a direct answer to what Diomed had asked, as well as a proper preface to what Glaucus relates of his own family, which, having been extinct in Corinth, had recovered new life in Lycia.

Cowper has attempted intense literalness—and has succeeded, perhaps, as far as success was possible. A slight tinge of beauty is all his version wants to be perfect.

Sotheby's verses have that tinge—not a slight one—of beauty; yet are they not perfect—because not intensely literal—like Cowper's. In Homer, the similitude of men to leaves is given in one line, and illustrated in three. The one line—as good a one as ever was written—is the text, the other three are the sermon; and 'tis a better sermon (independently of its shortness) than any (however long) that we have heard on the subject since Christmas, or indeed before it. But Sotheby confuses text and sermon—and that is a flaw in the integrity of his translation. Else, 'tis a sweet and solemn discourse of most excellent music. But how now? What is this? Homer's last line is, as it ought to be, a practical conclusion, almost in the words of the text, introduced by an impressive Ως.

Ὡς ἀνδρῶν γένος, ἡ μὲν φύς, ἡ δ' ἀπολήγει.

But Sotheby, who hitherto has been as simply and severely Scriptural almost as Homer or Solomon, changes suddenly, and without warning, and without temptation—nay, in the face of all temptation—into a Christian philosopher, which the son of Seven was not, nor yet the son of David, and says—

“ Thus change the vital tides, wave follows wave,
Here life, there death, the cradle and the grave.”

These are fine lines—not weeds, but flowers—yet they “have no business there” on men's tombs. Was the spirit of Sotheby not satisfied with the image shewn it by Homer? What alliance, in such inspired melancholy mood, between the budding, blowing, fading, and falling of leaves, and the change of vital tides, and the following of waves on waves? None. Besides, in itself, the “change of vital tides” is not a good expression. It but faintly and obscurely tells of ebb and flow. While, though fine in itself, is another new image still—or, rather, two new images. And we doubt if the latter, “cradle and the grave,” be Homeric, or indeed Greek at all. A Christian grave is, even in shape, like a Christian cradle, only it has no rocking keel—it creaks not, and is still; but a heathen, or pagan cradle, we suspect, was most unlike a heathen or pagan grave; and indeed it may be asked, did a cradle ever swing to and fro, or motionless contain the infant Diomed or Glaucus? Or did they not lie in the same bed with the mother, or nurse, sprawling and squalling to the disturbance of deep-breasted dames who flourished long before the invention of those small infantine dormitories, which even the very imps of the household would have despised?

“ Here life, there death, the cradle and the grave.”

What does old Chapman make of this famous simile? See,

“ Why dost thou so explore,
Said Glaucus, ‘of what race I am? When like the race of leaves
The race of man is; that deserves no question; nor receives
My being any other breath? The wind in autumn strowes
Th’ earth with old leaves; then the spring the woods with new endowes;
And so death scatters men on earth; so his puts out again.”

Man's leafy issue ;—but my race, if, like
the course of men,
Thou seek'st in more particular terms, is this," &c.

This is good in its own way—rough and racy—but it is hardly the way of Homer. Chapman here makes Glaucus somewhat sharp, and satirical on Diomed—which, after the high but not undeserved compliment which Tydides had just paid him, in suspecting that he might be a god, was, to say the least of it, neither graceful nor gracious nor grateful in the Lycian Prince. "That deserves no question"—is very blunt indeed—boorish—and out of place, time, and character. "Thou seek'st in more particular terms," is also too toothy—and Diomed might have turned the tables on Glaucus, by hinting that, after so many generalities about leaves, a few particulars might not be amiss;—but otherwise, the leafy part of the passage is well given—the umbrage and the bareness—in autumn the earth wind-strewn with old leaves—the woods by spring endow'd with new—and "so life puts out again man's leafy issue," is sudden, short, and strong—and while very Chapmanish not un-Homeric.

We should like to see Travers' translation of the Iliad. Some quotations from it, in Wakefield's Pope's Homer, seem to us very good—but Gilbert improves upon most of them, at will, and we suspect his taste in poetics, though we respect himself as unable, respectable, and disagreeable man. "Travers," quoth Gibby, "is beautiful at this place," and he is so;

"But soon an infant race adorns the trees,
A race succeeding with the vernal breeze;
Thus age with quick transition guides
away,
And the sons flourish as their sires decay."

We have just read and re-read, not only with undiminished, but with increased delight, on each perusal, the whole princely reply of Glaucus to Diomed—a speech worthy of Hamlet. It is nearly seventy lines long—narrative, biographical, and historical—and full of old traditions—of the wild and wonderful. Till you have read it, you can have no idea—or but a poor one—of the only genuine Chimeræ, or of the bold Bellerophon,

"He in whose favour'd birth the gods combined

All grace of person, and all gifts of mind."

the Joseph of the heroic ages, to whom Prætus,

— "to whose high command
Jove gave the sceptre of the Argive land," was as Potiphar, and Antæa, who served fair Dione, when — "maddened by his charms,

Clasp'd the fair youth in her adulterous arms,"

as Potiphar's wife—the hero, who, when sent to Lydia to be slaughtered by the King, proved his innocence by his valour in killing the Chimæra, the Solymi, the Amazons, and an ambush of chosen warriors, then married the King's daughter, and swayed "half the sceptre of his wide domain," begetting sons and daughters, till he

- "for crimes unknown
Roam'd, scorn'd of Heaven, th' Aetnan wastes, alone
And far from mat' and friendship's kind relief,
Consum'd his heart in hopelessness of grief."

In such a grandsire rejoiced Glaucus—and therefore no wonder that he was like a god. And godlike he appears in Sotheby—almost as in Homer—for the translator of Oberon has transfused into his version the spirit of the strain so wonder-rife, and shewn us in undimmed lustre the hero of that old Romance, and him too who exultingly relates the ancestral fame.

Passing over Diomed's short and spirited reply, full of the heart of heroic hospitality,—the virtue of an age when demigods passed to and fro over many lauds, and there was no knowing who might be the great stranger seated at the hearth,—let us witness the famous Interchange of Armour.

Now, gentle and generous reader, we have a question to put to you—did Homer, think ye, mean to say that Jove enlarged the mind of Glaucus, or stupified it? Pope you see, says, "enlarged," Cowper, "blinded," and Sotheby, "confused his errant thought." What says that fine fierce generous old fellow, Chapman? This,

CHAPMAN.

"From horse then both descend,
Join hands, give faith, and take; and then did Jupiter elate
The mind of Glaucus, who, to shew his reverence to the state
Of virtue in his grandsire's heart, and gratitude beside,
The offer of so great a friend, exchanged in that good pride,
Curets of gold for those of brass that did on Diomed shine,
One of a hundred oxen's price, the other but of nine.

POPE.

"Thus having said, the gallant chiefs alight,
Their hands they join, their mutual faith they plight;
Brave Glaucus then each narrow thought resigned,
(Jove warmed his bosom and enlarged his mind,)
For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device,
For which nine oxen paid, (a vulgar price.)
He gave his own, of gold divinely wrought,
A hundred beeves the shining purchase bought."

LOWELL.

"So they—and from their chariots to the ground
Descending, joined at once both hands and hearts.
Then Jove so blinded Glaucus, that for brass
He barter'd gold; gave armour such as cost
A hundred oxen for the cost of nine."

SOTHEBY.

"They spake; and from their cars down springing joined Hand pledged to hand, as heart to heart combined;
Then as the barter'd gift the Lycian brought,
'Twas Jove himself confused his errant thought.
Made him in blind exchange his arms resign,
His gold for brass, a hundred beeves for nine."

Did Jove enlarge the soul of Glaucus, think ye, or did he take away his understanding? It is, you know—or now see—a disputed point. Pope thus agrees with Chapman, who is at pains to remove all ambiguity, and to explain at some length the nature of the motives that inspired Glaucus to make the exchange. Chapman, in a note, confesses that the text of Homer is here against him,—“Mentem ademit Jupiter,” the text hath it—which only I alter of all Homer's original, since Plutarch, against the Stoics, excuses this supposed folly in Glaucus. Spondanus likewise encouraging my alterations, which I use for the loved and simple nobility of the free exchange in Glaucus, contrarie to others that, for the supposed folly in Glaucus, turned his change into a proverb, χρυσία χαλκῶν, ‘gold for brass.’” Pope says, that “the words in the original, ἰξίλιον φρίνας, may be equally interpreted, ‘he took away his sense,’ or ‘he elevated his mind.’” The former being a reflection on Glaucus's prudence, for making so unequal an exchange; the latter a praise of the magnanimity and generosity which induced him to it. Porphyry contends for its being understood in the last way, and Eustathius, Monsieur and Madame Dacier, are of the same opinion. Notwithstanding, it is certain that Homer uses the same word in the contrary sense, in the 17th Iliad, ver. 470 of the original, and in the 19th, ver. 137; and it is an obvious remark, that the interpretation of Porphyry as much dishonours Diomed, who proposed the exchange, as it does honour to Glaucus for consenting to it. However, I have followed it, if not as the juster, as the more heroic sense, and as it has the nobler air in poetry.” This is a good note of Pope's. But how does the interpretation of Porphyry dishonour Diomed? Can any man of woman born believe, for one moment, that Diomed, that Tydides—the son of that Tydeus who fought and fell at Thebes—at the close of that glorious burst of confidence and friendship leapt out of his chariot for the sole purpose of cheating Glaucus out of his golden arms? An exchange of arms was inevitable, according to the chivalrous courtesy of the heroic age. It is not said which of the two first proposed it—doubtless both at once. And was Diomed, seeing, like a modern political economist, that the exchangeable value of the arms of his great compeer, was greater than that of his own, to have made a backward bow, and a refusing face, and exclaimed, "No—no—no, Glaucus, I must not swindle you out of that shield, my honest fellow, lest χρυσὸν χαλκῶν become a proverb, and Diomed a convertible proper name with Jeremy Didler." Or, are we to suppose, on the other hand, that Glaucus, seeing the comparative meanness and, in a money or Galloway Stot view, worthlessness of Diomed's arms, hung back with his golden shield on his shoulder, and, with certain shrugs, said, "Beg pardon, Diomed, but I had rather be excused, my jewel, for I am not so simple as I seem; with us 'tis diamond cut diamond; so, very well, my sharp sir, 'I owe you one'; but I am too good a grazier to swap a hundred oxen for nine, and you may carry your pigs to another market." Glaucus, remember, was a Greek, for his grandsire, Bellerophon, was the grandson of Sisyphus, who

— "controll'd
In Argos' depths proud Ephyra of old;"
and we cannot believe that he, who was thus sprung

"Of earth's first blood, had titles manifold,"

could have acted like that modern Greek patriot, Joseph Hume, who flew off at a tangent, when he found that, in the cause of liberty, he ran some risk of losing the "tottle of the whole," of £44, 5s. 7½d. Is it credible that Glaucus could have wished to propose a swap with Diomed, on the broad basis of so many additional rounds of beef? That he and Tydides should have higgled and haggled about the "excaimby," as we say in Scotland, or "niffer," like two Yorkshire horse-coupers? No, no. We acquit Diomed of being a kite, and Glaucus of being a pigeon. They were both eagles. The one was no more a sharp than the other a flat—Diomed was no Hookey Walker, nor was Glaucus a Yokel. In Homer's days, as now, "a fair exchange was no robbery;" and that, say we, is a fair exchange which is made with your heart and your eyes open, were it even a Number—Current and Double and Nox-Ambro-sial Number—of Maga for an old almanack. Glaucus behaved like a man, a gentleman, a soldier, and a prince, as he was—so did Diomed—and if Jupiter thought he had taken the Lycian's senses from him, then Jove was as grievously mistaken as ever he was in all the days of his life—even as when, on Mount Gagarus, he supposed he was embracing Venus, when, in fact, it was but old Juno.

But, after all, can the expression in the original, ἐξέλτε φεικας, bear a double sense? Gilbert Wakefield, alluding to the liberal interpretation of Chapman, Ogilby, the Daciers, Pope, Eustathius, Porphyry, and the "rest," says, "I wish their attempts were more convincing." We have looked at the two passages referred to by Pope—and in both the sense is, as he says, adverse to the liberal view of the case; yet Heyne, we perceive, has not been deterred, by his knowledge of these two passages, from saying, in a note on the words in question, "Παλαιὸν φεικας ἐξέλτε Ζηνι, antiquo sermone nihil amplius est, quam Glaucus de majore armorum pretio prorsus non cogitavit; adeo excogitanter egit, ut decuplo cariora paret Diomed, quam ut eo acceperat." It turns out then, on the authority of Heyne himself, whose authority as to the meaning of words and phrases no scholar disputes, that "it is all right"—nay, that Chapman, in attributing intentional generosity to Glaucus, has not even done that hero justice, for that he was neither vain-glorious, nor prodigal overmuch; but in pure forgetfulness of the relative value of gold and brass, and in simple magnanimity of mind, at the moment would have given Diomed his shield had it been "one perfect chrysolite," nor known that he had received a flawed Scotch pebble in return. In one word, Glaucus was a Hero. Just so, and in like manner, did Diomed care nothing, know nothing, at the moment, of the difference between brass and gold—but he took in the same spirit that he gave—in the same spirit that his ancestor Æneas had given to the ancestor of Glaucus, Bellerophon, when his guest in Argos, "the belt whose purple broidery glowed"—in the same spirit that Bellerophon had "a massive bowl all gold bestow'd," each Hero mutually feeling that their gifts "were twice blessed," blessing him that gave and him that received, which is the case as well when princes give to each other in their glory, as when in mercy they bestow a boon upon the poorest of their subjects.

Many a supposed sharp witticism has been grinned by the groundlings against the absurdity of this "celestial colloquy divine" of Diomed and Glaucus, on the score of its untimeliness, and of its being out of place—all of which have been well answered even by Dacier, (the husband,) though he was a Frenchman. Consult him and others, if you be a doubting or still dissatisfied boy, but first a few words more in your ear from old Christopher. The pause in the fight—and an "awful pause" there was—though not "prophetic of its end"—was most natural. Did you ever fight for half a forenoon in a stone or snow bicker? Well then—were you not very willing to have a "barley" (parley) for an hour, especially when the bicker was likely to prove, at the best, a drawn battle, and the forces on both sides were drenched, if not in gore, in sweat? And if the dux of the rector's class in the High School, and the dux of ditto in the Academy, had met, by mutual attraction, in the clear space between the bickers, and had agreed to discuss their family histories, involving various high and heroic ancestral and hereditary feuds between Scotch and English, would you not have listened with all your ears and eyes, forgetful of the snow or stones at your feet? But what are men but children of a larger growth? What else were they even in the heroic ages of Greece and Troy?

But farther—our dear boy—know that Poetry possesses powers and privileges which it holds by the tenure of divine right direct from Jove. Homer was commander-in-chief of both armies that fought for Ilion. Yea—even Mars and Neptune and Apollo served under him—Juno, Venus, and Minerva—and Iris was his aide-de-camp. Therefore he did as he chose day and night—and there was none to say that black was the white of his eye—though the whites of his eyes were large as stars in mist—for Homer, they say, was blind. The gods took away his sight, but they gave him in compensation the gift of song. Not that he was so blind, either, as not to see as far as the most lynx-eyed Lycian into a millstone. Then, so far was he from being deaf, that, like Fine-ear, he could hear the grass growing, and the dewdrop slipping from the blade. Well knew he the heavy tread of Ajax Telamon from the elastic spring of the instep of the swift-footed Achilles. A mile off could he distinguish the feet of Diomed, from those of Ajax Oileus, whose feet too were like feathers. Thus gifted with finest faculties of sense—though they say he was blind—so was he gifted with still finer faculties of soul—for it lived in the purple light of the World's earlier Morn.

"Brushing with hasty steps the dews away,"

Therefore in his own world—that is, the world of heroic poetry—Homer could not offend the gods, from whom all his gifts were derived; and if so, why should he offend men—or rather, why should they offend the gods by daring to find fault with the minstrelsy of him, their minister? Or to pick one diamond out of his jewelled crown that, for some thousand years, has been like a galaxy of stars—the Constellation Homer that will shine in heaven till time be no more?

But while Diomed and Glaucus have been speaking, or are speaking still, where has been—where is plume-waving Hector? Sotheby shall tell you—and, listening to him, you might here almost believe that you heard Homer.

"When Hector, now no more by war delay'd,
Had gain'd the Scam gate and beechen shade,
Troy's wives, Troy's daughters, girt him, throng on throng,
Sire, husband, brother, trembling on their tongue.
He view'd, and pitying, bade them heav'n implore
To ward the woe dark-gathering more and more.

"But when the hero came—where, broadly-based,
Majestic porticoes the palace graced;

Where fifty chambers, all of polish'd stone,
 Each join'd to each, in beauteous order shone ;
 Where the brave race that Priam's wedlock blest,
 Each with his beauteous wife found peaceful rest ;
 And 'neath th' opposed roofs, one after one,
 Twelve chambers of his daughters beam'd in stone ;
 Where in the circuit of that court enclos'd,
 With their chaste wives, their wedded lords repos'd ;
 There his kind mother, passing on her way,
 Where fair Laodice's bright chamber lay,
 Met her brave son, and clasping to her breast,
 Hung on his hand, and fondly thus address :—

“ ‘Why has my Hector left the field of fight ?
 Has Greece around these walls worn down thy might ?
 Or art thou come with wistful heart once more
 Jove on Troy's sacred summit to adore ?
 Stay till I bring thee here delightful wine,
 To hail great Jove and all the powers divine ;
 Wine, to war's wearied chief refreshing found,
 Such as thou art—sole guard of all around.’

“ ‘Not now—thou most rever'd—the chief replied—
 ‘Not now, for me, the nectar-bowl provide,
 Lest my strength melt away, dissolv'd by wine,
 And these uncleaned hands profane the shrine.
 Not so the votaries to the gods repair,
 And stretch their blood-stain'd arms to Jove in prayer.
 But thou call forth the matrons, lead the train,
 And with rich incense greet Minerva's fane,
 And spread the veil most priz'd of all thy store,
 The finest, fullest web her knees before,
 And yow twelve bulls, all yearlings, all unbroke,
 Shall hallow'd victims on her altar smoke.
 If the consenting goddess, at thy pray'r,
 Troy, and her wives, and speechless infants spare,
 And from the walls of Ilion turn afar,
 The fury of Tydides, lord of war—
 So hail the goddess : while my course I bend,
 To learn if Paris at my call attend.
 Oh, that now earth would cleave, and close his tomb !
 So dreadful o'er us lowers the impending doom ;
 So on his brow, to Troy, her king, and race,
 Great Jove has grav'd a curse and deep disgrace.
 Yet might I see him to the grave descend,
 That sight would all my soul's deep woe suspend.’

“ He spake, the Queen return'd and bade her train
 Call forth the matrons to Minerva's fane,
 Then to her fragrant wardrobe hither way,
 Where her rich veils in beauteous order lay :
 Webs by Sidonian virgins finely wrought,
 From Sidon's woods, by youthful Paris brought,
 When o'er the boundless main the adulterer led
 Fair Helen from her home and nuptial bed.
 From these she chose the fullest, fairest far,
 With broidery bright, and blazing as a star,
 Drew forth the radiant veil long hid from day,
 Then led the matrons on their solemn way.

“ Now, when they came, where, based on Ilion's height,
 Minerva's stately temple soar'd in sight,
 The fair Theano, brave Antenor's bride,
 O'er Pallas' fane selected to preside,
 The portal to their entrance widely flung,
 While to their cries the dome responsive rung :

Each hand was raised, each voice bade Pallas hail,
When fair Theano took the radiant veil,
Spread on Minerva's knees, devoutly pray'd,
And supplicating, thus implor'd her aid :—

“ ‘ Supreme of goddesses ! Troy's guardian, hear !
Break into shivers, break Tydides' spear ;
Prone, strike him lifeless, let the slaughterer fall/
Beneath our sight, before the Scæan wall.
Twelve yearling heaves, whose neck ne'er felt the yoke,
Now hallow'd victims on thy altars smoke,
So thou consent, and at thy votary's prayer,
Troy and her wives, and helpless infants spare.’ ”

“ But Pallas heard not, as Theano pray'd,
Nor listen'd to the vows the matrons made.”

What elevation is thus given to the character of Hector ! and how are our hearts thus interested far more deeply than ever in the fate of Troy ! We must not say that every touch of these pictures—for there is a beautiful succession of them—shews the hand of the great master. We rather feel as if they were all painted by Nature's own hand, and we wholly forget Homer. Matrons and maids meet Hector just within the Scæan gate—that is one picture. Hecuba and Laodice come to him as he reaches Priam's stately courts—that is another;—and when we think of the colloquy, in such circumstances, between such a mother and such a son, no scene was ever more affecting, or more solemn. Elevated, for a time, by the high sense of his sacred mission, above the wants and weaknesses of his ordinary humanity, Hector declines the wine-cup, almost with disdain, even from the honoured hand of Hecuba—nor would he even dare to pour it out, with those horrid hands of his, in libation to the gods—a natural sentiment often expressed in ancient poetry, which at all times doth breathe religion. Another picture is that of Hecuba heading the long procession to the temple of Minerva on Ilion;—the unfolding of the gates another;—and another, the priestess, Antenor's consort, Theano, amid all those supplicants, placing the veil on the knees of the goddess. Ut pictura poësis, indeed; and how instantaneously they brighten and fade !

“ With broidery bright, and blazing as a star,”

We love Hector now, whom before we had admired, or feared in fight—and recognise him as loving and beloved of the gods. Yet Minerva his piety may not appease, nor will Jove save Troy from destruction though himself had said, (here we use Pope,)

“ You know, of all the numerous towns that rise
Beneath the rolling sun and starry skies,
Which gods have raised, or earth-born men enjoy,
None stands so dear to Jove as sacred
Troy.
No mortals merit more distinguished grace
Than godlike Priam, or than Priam's race,
Still to our name their hecatombs expire,
And altars blaze with unextinguish'd fire.”

Hector, having done the work of his mission, before going into his own palace, where he believes is sitting Andromache, seeks Paris to reanimate him to battle. What a picture of the Seducer ! His palace is the most superb of all.

“ Plann'd by his taste, and by his wealth
array'd,
Where all their art Troy's craftiest sons
display'd.”

“ He found the youth, where, far from war's alarms,
He polish'd o'er and o'er his brilliant
arms
Gave his bright shield and breastplate brighter glow,
And smooth'd the graceful curve that shap'd his bow ;
While Argive Helen her train'd handmaids taught
To weave the image by her fancy wrought.
Hector beheld, and by just anger mov'd,
With words of bitter taunt the chief re-prov'd.”

Pope, who himself, as Lady Mary tells us, was not unambitious of the character of a gay deceiver, is partial to Paris. "He has the ill fate," says the author of the Rape of the Lock, "to have all his fine qualities swallowed up in his blind passion. * * * But as to his parts and turn of mind, I see nothing that is either weak or wicked, the general manners of those times considered. * * * So very amorous a constitution, and so incomparable a beauty to provoke it, might be temptation enough even to a wise man, and in some degree make him deserve compassion, if not pardon." That is all very pretty, Master Pope; but it was not according to the general manners of the age for people to run away, like Paris, with other men's wives, especially when, as strangers, they had been loaded with honours by their husbands, and their husbands kings. Hector would not have done so, Master Pope; rather would Achilles have bathed in fire his "inaccessible hands." You say it "is remarkable that Homer does not paint Paris and Helen like monsters, odious to gods and men, but allows their characters such estimable qualifications as could consist, and in truth generally do, with tender frailties." Now, we say it is not remarkable that Homer does this, for had he not, there would have been no poem. The female dog would have been flung over the wall. Neither do we hold with the author of the Moral Essay on Man, that estimable qualifications generally do belong to persons addicted to adultery. Nevertheless, it is true that Paris had some imperfect virtues, and many perfect accomplishments; which last were his character. He had, as Pope remarks, "a taste and addiction to curious works of all sorts, which caused him to transport Sidonian artists to Troy, and employ himself at home in adorning and furnishing his armour; and now we are told, that he assembled the most skilful buidlers from all parts of the country, to render his palace a complete piece of architecture. This, together with what Homer has said elsewhere of his skill on the harp, which, in those days, included both music and poetry, may, I think, establish him as a bel-esprit and a fine genius." That a furbisher and a fiddler is necessarily an established bel-esprit and fine genius, we should be slow to admit, even were he also a master mason; did we not know that, in Pope's day, the addition of bel to esprit, and of fine to genius, was made almost exclusively in cases of the weakest and most worthless of mankind, provided they were but lords; and Paris was a prince. Paris was not a coward; for, had he been, he might peradventure have won, but he could not have retained, the love of the sister of Castor and Pollux, and the wife of Menelaus. But brave he was not, if Hector was brave. His valour lay in his consciousness of surpassing beauty, and was animated, at times, by the blood that galloped through his veins in the rejoicing power of passion. Homer always paints him as the object naturally endowed to charm Helen's eyes. When first he comes before us, in the second book, what a bright apparition!

"Now front to front, as either army stood,
Young Alexander, beauteous as a god,
Loose from whose shoulders flow'd the leopard's hide,
And bow and falchion swung in graceful pride,
Sprung forth, and challeng'd, as he waved each spear,
The bravest chief to stand his fierce career.
Him, Menelaus, him at once descry'd,
On stalking in the madness of his pride:
And as a famish'd lion, gladd'ning o'er
A stag broad-antler'd, or huge mountain boar,
Gorges insatiate, nor forgoes his prey,
Tho' hunters threat, and circling blood-bounds lay:
Thus Menelaus' heart with transport swell'd,
When his keen eye th' advancing youth beheld:
Death, death, he deem'd, shall now deform those charms;
Down leapt, and shook the earth with clang of arms.
Not Paris thus: his heart convuls'd with fear,
Thrill'd, as he knew Atreides rushing near:

He dared not look on death, but back withdrew,
 Shrunk 'mid his host, and past away from view.
 As one, who, in a wood's entangled brake,
 Views the roused terror of th' uncoiling snake,
 Flies back, while all his limbs with horror start,
 And the pale cheek betrays the bloodless heart;
 Thus Paris fled, and 'mid Troy's sheltering band
 Shrunk from the vengeance of Atreides' hand.
 Him Hector thus rebuked: 'Thou girl in heart,
 Fair but in form, and foul with treacherous art,
 Far better had'st thou ne'er the light survey'd,
 Ne'er clasp'd a female, by thy guile betray'd,
 Than live defam'd, and die without a name—
 A scornful spectacle, and public shame!
 Hark! how the Greeks deride—how shout in scorn!
 Lo! whom the Graces with their gifts adorn,
 Sure—unto him a warrior's spirit giv'n,
 By valour to enhance the gift of heav'n!
 But—wert thou, dastard! thus ignobly seen,—
 So woe-begone, so spiritless thy mien,—
 When to far Greece, with Troy's exultant train,
 Thy streamers sweeping in their pride the main,
 Thou sail'dst, a stranger's kindness to repay,
 And steal the consort of the brave away?
 Curse to thy site, thy kingdom, and thy race—
 Densation to thy foes—thyself, disgrace—
 Hadst thou withstood th' Atreides, thou hadst known
 How brave the chief, whose bride thou call'st thy own.
 Nor thee thy lute, nor beauty had avail'd,
 Nor those fair locks, that death in dust had trail'd.
 Troy too is vile, or thou, ere this unwept,
 Hadst in thy stony shroud glorious slept.'

True, as others have said, that guilt made Paris quail before Menelaus; and that "conscience doth make cowards of us all." Yet Homer had no moral lesson in view in the Seducer's flight. For some seducers, even worse than Paris, would have hewed down the Spartan king if they could, and not turned tail so ingloriously in presence of both armies. But Alexander the Fair was more a woman's man than a man's man, and therefore he took to his heels and fled. Had Menelaus been a slight-made man of middle age, and a silly swordsman, think ye not that the Gay Cruel would have killed him? By and by, when he has recovered his breath, his brother badgers him back into a blustering bravery, or rather bravadoing; and nothing will content him but to challenge the Spartan to single combat with spear and sword. Here Homer again shews the Seducer beautifying himself for the fight; but, in the tussle, he is little better than a great girl.

"Now the proud Lord of Helen's peerless charms,
 Young Paris, mail'd his limbs in radiant arms.
 First, on his legs his greaves the warrior bound
 With clasps of silver, brightly starred around.
 Next, with Lycaon's armour aptly graced,
 Firm on his breast his brother's corslet braced;
 His silver-studded sword athwart him slung,
 Grasped the broad shield that far its shadow flung;
 The helmet clasp'd, where awful o'er his head
 The crest's wide-waving horse-hair terror spread,
 And brandishing the lightning of his spear Eyed mail'd Atreides as the chief drew near."

Paris makes, as you know, but a poor fight of it, and when Menelaus has thrown his lance, and his sword is shivered, and the fear-chilled challenger has him at his mercy, why instead of going in, he hangs back, apparently with his hands in his breeches pockets, till the "Strength of the People" grasps his casque, and drags him towards the Greek side of the ring, half-strangled,

— "by the lace that bound
The helmet's clasp the tender neck around."

Venus, thou knowest, fair reader, mindful of Mount Ida and the golden apple, cuts the string in twain, and wafts him to his palace in a dense veil of darkness,

"And gently laying on his peaceful bed,
Sweet balms, distilling fragrance, round him shed."

Helen, "with sweet reluctant amorous delay," following him from the ramparts, and half-ashamed, yet "nothing loath," in daylight, to the dismay of the doubting Madame Dacier, commits an additional sin against Menelaus—while we, in spite of

"Then loudly laughing, with contemptuous pride,
Ereapt from his ambush, and exultant cried,
'Yes, thou art struck; not vain my arrow sped,
Would it had pierced thy heart, and left thee dead!
Then had our host, now shuddering at my sight,
As she-goats dread a lion, bristled from sight.'
But Tydeus' dauntless son, thus scornful said,
'Vile bowman! slanderer! girl with glistening braid,
Come front to front, in arms my force assail;
Then shall thy bow, nor shower of shafts avail.
What! hast thou scratched my foot? Is that thy joy?
So wounds a woman, or a feeble boy.
Weak is the weapon in a hand like thine;
Far other far the wound that waits on mine.'" &c.

Such is the character, and such the exploits, of that "bel-esprit and fine genius"—Pope's favourite and Helen's—Paris—yet as well supported throughout as either that of Hector or Achilles. He reminds one of that gay insect-image in the Castle of Indolence,

"As when a burnished fly in pride of May."

He is a beautiful serpent. We might apply to him Wordsworth's rich description of the Anglo-American soldier, Ruth's seducer, who, in his civilisation, was yet a savage.

"He was a lovely youth. I guess,
The Panther in the wilderness
Was not more fair than he;
And when he chose to sport and play,
No Dolphin ever was so gay
Upon the tropic sea."

The Panther in the wilderness Ho-meby, persist in dropping the curtain. Yet in spite of all this discomfiture, the Seducer is soon as insolent as if he had never been drubbed; and after the disgraceful truce-break, when Antenor counsels the restoration of Helen to her lord,

"He spake, and Helen's youthful consort rose,
And dand with scornful words the chief oppose:

"'Ill suits my ear thy speech,'" &c.; while old Priam, "weak well-meaning man," like Eli of an older day, gives in to the beautiful profligate. Wherever and whenever Paris appears, he is always true to his character. Who "couch'd behind the stone, in darkness laid,
That cast o'er Hüs' ancient tomb its shade," who "arched the elastic horns," till the arrow pinned to earth the foot of Diomed? Paris, mer knew, and he paints, as we have seen, Paris in a panther's hide; nor do we doubt that he also knew the dolphin—the very dolphin on whose back Arion harped—the original of him whose image on the bottom of that famous bowl, like a "spirit from the vasty deep," has so often bade cheer Christopher and the Shepherd, "and they were cheered," at the Noces Ambrosianæ. Homer, however, likens not Paris to panther or dolphin, as Wordsworth has beautifully likened his poetic seducer, a kindred but still brighter and far bolder sinner; but he likens him, in his pomp and pride, to a still nobler creature, the horse—τις σφραγος ιππος—no such steed as was bestridden of yore by that tailor (one of the Place's mighty ancestors) thundering to Brentford—or by that famous train-band captain knight-errant to Ware—or by

Mazzeppa borne naked by a living whirlwind to the chieftainship of the Cossacks,—but a shiny-sided snorter,

“Far descended from the prophet line,”

—blood untainted through all his sires and dams, from him whose neck was clothed with thunder, and who cried among his enemies—Ha! ha! We wish we had room for the Greek. But turn up in your Homer.

CHAPMAN.

“And now was Paris come

From his high towers, who made no stay, when once he had put on His richest armour, but flew forth, the flints he trode upon Sparkled with lustre of his arms; his long-ebb'd spirits now flowed
The higher for their lower ebb. And as a fair steed, proud
With full-given maners, long tied up, and now (his head-sial broke)
He breaks from stable, runs the field, and with an ample stroke,
Measures the centre, neighs, and lifts aloft his wanton head;
About his shoulders shakes his crest, and where he hath been fed,
Or in some calm flood washed, or stung with his high flight, he flies
Amongst his females, strength put forth his beauty beautifies;
And like life's mirror bears his gait;—so Paris' son the Tower
Of lofty Pergamus came forth, he shewed a sun-like power bodily parts, address now to the strife,” &c.

SOOTHEBY.

“No Paris lingered; but in mail arrayed, *
Whose brilliant light the warrior's pride displayed,
Rushed through the streets—as when a stall-fed steed,
Swift, as he snaps the cord, from bondage freed
Strikes with resounding hoof the earth, and flies
Where spread before him the wide champaign lies;
Seeks the remember'd haunts, on fire to lave
His glowing limbs, and dash amid the wave;
High rears his crest, and tossing in disdain,
Waves o'er his shoulders spreads the stream of mane,
And treads in beauty, graceful in his speed,
Flies, amid the steeds that wanton o'er the mead—
Not otherwise, from Troy's embattled height,
In pride of youth, in power of mail'd might,
Exulting, on, impatient of delay,
Bright as the sun, young Paris sped his way,” &c.

COWPER.

“Nor Paris now delayed, but clad in arms
Of brightest lustre, wing'd his rapid course
Through the wide city right toward the field.
As when some courser, leaving far behind
His broken cord, on sounding hoofs escapes;
To lave, as on, in sliding waters smooth,
All joy he flies; or with exalted neck,
Wide-floating mane, and pliant limbs, to seek
In well-known haunts his fellows lost so long;
So clad in sun-bright arms, from Ilium's heights Down flew the joyful Paris; soon he came
Where, after sweetest colloquy, though sad,
With his Andromache, the godlike chief
His brother stood,” &c.

Virgil, you know, in the Eleventh Book of the Æneid, has borrowed Homer's Horse, misapplying the image from Paris to Turnus, and also marring its majesty; Tasso, too, has tried his hand upon it, and chivalrously; and so have so many other improvisatori, that were we to transcribe, in parallel passages, all their descriptions, Maga would be neighing like a Sporting Filly. Suffice it to say, that Sotheby, as you may see, is superior to them all—that his copy is equal to the original picture. His version—do not stare, nor let that surprise you—is at once literal and free—at once metaphorical, paraphrase, and imitation—the three heads under which Dryden says all translation may be reduced—and here we have the Tria juncta in uno," one of those speciosa miracula" which genius only, guided by skill and scholarship, can perform.

But we must say farewell—or farewell to Paris—remarking, as the glittering pageant disappears, that other bright but disastrous lights seem ever dazzling upon and around him, in the Iliad, coming uncertainly from afar, and not all evoked by Homer; for we dream of his shepherd life on Mount Ida, before he voyaged fatally to Greece, or Troy was beleaguered—of his famous Judgment delivered amid the divine air breathed from the three naked goddesses—of his humbler rural loves by Ovid sung—witness Cenone and many a nameless weeping mother ere she was a wife—of his pugilistic exploits among the shepherd-swains, for example, Dares

"Solus qui Paridem solitus contendere coëtra;

and last of all, ere closed "his strange eventful history," we think we see him, while Apollo guides the shaft, sending Achilles himself to the shades. For we hear Ovid speaking through Dryden—

"He said; and shew'd from far the blazing shield
And sword which but Achilles none could wield;
And how he moved a god, and mov'd the standing field!
The Deity himself directs aright
The envenom'd shaft, and wings the fatal flight.
Thus fell the foremost of the Grecian name,
And he, the base adulterer, boasts the fame;
A spectacle to glad the Trojan train,
And please old Prism, after Hector slain.
If by a female hand he had foreseen
He was to die, his wish had rather been
The lance and double axe of the Fair Warrior Queen.

Nor less dazzling than Paris is his Paramour. Her beauty, like that of Paris, was her fatal dower. 'Tis not so said by Homer, that we recollect; but the fame was, that she was of the seed of that Celestial Swan. Time touched her not; for at the end of twenty years' residence in Troy—where she was received but coldly at court—she was bright as on the eve when, in Craue's Isle, she first surrendered her charms to the Royal Shepherd of Mount Ida. Beauty is felt intenseliest, when it is most pernicious. Sin, crime, and wickedness set off its charms to their utmost witchcraft; witness Webster's Vittoria, the White Devil of Corrombona. Now Helen was the White Devil of Troy. She was so, though it is true, at the same time, as Pope says, that Homer did not paint her "like a monster, odious to gods and men." She was no monster at all—but a miracle. She was not odious to gods and men—better for them had she been—but she could move them all with her little finger. She shone—a Sin. For sin is soft and sweet, and bright and fair—and so is ushered into palaces and temples, and sets them all on fire. Why, Helen still loved her husband Menelaus, even when lying dissolved in the arms of her seducer Paris. Was not that amiable? Soon as she saw her Spartan, whom she had chosen, in her virginity inviolate by Theseus, from among a crowd of kings, to be her βαλεις παρκοιτης, entering the lists against her Trojan, why her poor, dear, weak, female heart flew again to the broad bosom of her lawful wedded lord, and she yearned once more to be an honest woman. Was not that amiable? We defy you to hate her, whom even Hector and Homer loved, and all the bright butterflies and grey grasshoppers on the plain or in the town of Troy.

"She walked in beauty like the light
Of cloudless climes and starry eyes;
And all that's best of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes."

Yet was she plague, pestilence, and lingering death. But try not to withhold from her your admiration—your love—for 'twill be all in vain—and should you say you do, you will merely be a liar. For there is another Sin, (may blush not,) not like Homer's Helen, who haply, after all, was but a shadow—but with a "brow of Egypt," "comely, though black,"—a living, breathing, burning, flesh-and-blood Sin—whom this very night you will visit, "though hell itself should gape and bid you hold your peace"—and who with smiles and tears, and a showery something, shining deep down and far out of her lustrous and troubled eyes, will, ere sunrise, have sworn your soul to irremediable misery, beyond the salvation of penitence or remorse, and for ever within the damnation of despair.

But, meanwhile, turn your eyes on Homer's Helen. See her at the hour when Iris, in disguise of Laodice, summons her to behold the single combat between her Seducer and her lawful Lord—

"The goddess found beneath her palace-roof

Fair Helen, weaving the refulgent woof,
Charged with the fortunes of the change-ful field,

Where Greece and Troy commingled, shield with shield,

And as she imaged forth the fate of arms,
Joid'd to destructive war her matchless charms."

See her attended by Clymene and Aethra, walking resplendent to the Scæan gate, where "in peaceful leisure sate" Priam, and those hoar chiefs Thymetes, and Panthous, and Clytus, and Lampus, and Antenor, and Ucalegon, and Nicetaon, once all great men of war, but now "garrulous as grasshoppers."

"They seem'd like shrill Cicadae that prolong

In summer bowers their sweet and tender song ;

And as they saw ascending to the tower,
Fair Helen graced with beauty's winning power,

Each to the other whisper'd, 'such, such charms

Repay the toils of Greece and Troy in arms !

Such are the beauties that, admired above,
Lure by celestial grace the gods to love .
Yet thus, so graced, let Helen sail afar,
Nor leave to us and ours eternal war."

Or see her now—blushing and abashed—or rather pale and piteous, "with heaving breast and soothing speech" confessing to Hector, even in presence of her paramour, and in midst of all her maids, that she is the "curse and scorn of Iliou!"

"My brother! hear me! Iliou's curse and scorn!

Oh! that the hour which saw my natal morn

Had seen me whirling in the tempest's blast,

On the wide ocean, or bleak mountain cast ;

That I had perished then without a name,

Ere witness'd deeds that brand my front with shame!

But—since the gods thus doom'd it—oh! that heaven

Had to these arms a braver chieftain given ;

One who had heart to feel, and shame to bear

The killing words that thrill his soul with fear.

But Paris, now, and aye, to reason blind,
Must reap the harvest of a wavering mind.

Yet, here, my brother, on this couch repose,

Here loose awhile the yoke of galling woes ;

Woes that on thee the crime of Helen draws,

And Paris, traitor to Jove's holiest laws ;
We, whose recorded guilt all men among
Shall pass from age to age in deathless song.

Ay—now she is all that is good—for she is standing by the side of Hector, and within the awful shadow of the virtue of "that godlike man." Yet another hour, and she shall burn to lie this very night in her Paris's bosom—as she did that forenoon she had wept o'er her faithlessness to her Menelaus. "Oh! that I never had been born!" is now the passion that storms her soul. "Oh! that in thy arms I might lie for ever!" will, ere midnight, "possess it wholly." Paris is a coward, she feels; for now she sees far above her head the waving crest of Ἐκτορος Ἀνδραγαθήν. But what will she care for the cowardice of the craven, when "the curled darling" of Venus again lays his head "insupportably" on the delight of her delighted heart? She seems to herself to scorn Paris, now "traitor to Jove's holiest laws." But even should the traitor visit not her couch this night, Dione shall send a dream that, unscared by the Thunderer, will "lap her soul in Elysium." See—through all her speech—sincere though she seems to herself to be—how she tampers with her conscience, and upbraids the heavens. "The gods have doomed it." And worse than foolish would it be—it would be impious—that the fair fatalist should struggle against Jove.

Are we too hard on Helen? Alas! we begin to feel "her conjurations and her mighty magic," and sorceress as we still know her to be in our wiser mind, our heart is almost willing to regard her with pity, even as a weeping Magdalene! Grief, and shame, and remorse—if there be not repentance—bedim and bedew her pernicious beauty; nor does illustrious Hector scowl now upon her on whom, fatal though she was, he had never scowled before, but utters for her relief those touching words—so beautifully given by Sotheby—"the words of ancient date he thus translates"—and they are at once light and music—"kind as thou art!"

"'Kind as thou art,' illustrious Hector said,

"Hector! to Helen's so I more loved than all,
Whom I in Ilion's halls dare brother call,
Since Paris here to Troy his consort led,
Who in the grave had found a happier bed.
'Tis now, since here I came, the twentieth year,
Since left my land, and all I once held dear;
But never from that hour, has Helen heard
From thee a harsh reproach or painful word;
But if thy kindred blamed me, if unkind
The Queen e'er glanced at Helen's fickle mind,—
For Priam, still benevolently mild,
Look'd on me as a father views his child,—
Thy gentle speech, thy gentleness of soul,
Could by thine own their harder minds control;
Hence, with a heart by torturing misery rent,
Thee and my hapless self I thus lament,
For no kind eye in Troy on Helen rests,
But who beholds me shudders and detests."

We have almost gone to the last of all the Iliad for this most affecting speech. How natural it is that such feelings should flow from Helen's lips, when they are thus listened to in conjunction with that soothing speech of Hector, addressed to her a few weeks before! Let the poor wretch have the benefit of "the natural tears she shed," even though 'tis not uncharitable to believe that "she wiped them soon." Paris, in that hour at least, had no place in her humbled heart—and as Troy was soon to fall, and "the whole inhabitants perish," or be carried into captivity, what mattered it if they from whose beauty came that fatal overthrow, wandered about joylessly together in the disastrous twilight,

"While peaceful slept the mighty Hector's shade?"

'Urge not my stay—nor temptingly persuade.

Onward I speed to front the desperate fight,

And succour Troy, that claims her Hector's night.

Thou Paris urge, let Paris rouse to fame,
And join me, while those walls my presence claim."

Or see her—hear her—at the last Lament over the body of Hector the Tamer of Horses—and methinks, gentle reader, that, high-souled though thou be,

"As Sydney's sister, Pembroke's mother," scarcely wilt thou withhold thy lingering reluctant forgiveness from one who, in goddess-doomed infatuation, set the brand of her beauty to the towers of Troy.

But let us return to the living Hector of the Sixth Book. He has now fulfilled his mission, and done all his duty to the state, and his "mighty heart" is free now to turn towards his own house.

"Home now I haste, revisiting in Troy,
My wife, my household, and my infant boy,

Whom—now foredoomed to bleed on Phrygia's shore,

Haply their Hector shall behold no more."

With swift foot he has gained his stately palace, but finds not her whom he seeks. For

"She with her babe and nurse that mournful hour, Watched, steep'd in tears, on Ilion's topmost tower."

"For, when 'twas widely bruited Troy had fled,

And Grecia to those walls the battle led,

Thy wife, where Ilion's tower o'erlooks
the fight,
With her loved child and nurse flew wild with fright."

The meeting is well managed by all the translators; but we must confine ourselves to Sotheby.

"Swift as the wind, impatient of delay,
Thro' Troy's proud streets the chief retraced his way;
And now arrived, where to the battle-plain
The Scæan gate recalled his steps again;
His rich-dowered consort, from Eëtion sprung,
Who erst held sway Cilicia's sons among;
And from far Thebes, and Hypoplacia's grove,
Led the fair virgin to her Hector's love.
Before him came—and with her came the maid,
On whose fond breast their child was softly laid—
Their only child, and lovelier in their sight,
And fairer far than Hesper's golden light.
From famed Scamander Hector named the boy,
But proudly called Astyanax by Troy,
In honour of his sire, whose single power
So oft had turn'd the fight from Ilion's Tower.
And now the father, bending o'er his child,
Eyed him in silent joy, and sweetly smiled.
The while Andromache, dissolved in tears,
Hung on his hand, and pour'd forth all her tears."

What a distinction, with what a difference, feel we at once and already between Helen and Andromache! No babe lies on the bosom of the once Spartan Queen. Barren is the adulterous bed, and nevermore shall she behold the face of her far-off Hermione. Such mothers forget their children. Not "wild with affright," but almost eager to behold the shew, had moved Helen in her transcendent beauty towards the lists, where her paramour and her husband might be about to die of mutual wounds—proudly conscious, no doubt, all the while, of its power, even over those ancient "Grasshoppers," nor loath, after Paris had been rescued, to shew her gratitude to his guardian goddess by fullest oblations at her shrine. But Andromache, had she seen Achilles in the remotest part of the same field with Hector, would have sunk into the earth. Yet that gentle Lady for Astyanax would have been bold as a lion—and would have shielded him with her bosom, without any shrieks. Look on her the chosen of the Prince of Troy—the loveliest, we ween—in her sorrow-shaded stateliness, of all the Trojan dames whose garments sweep the ground—ere long, in the sack of the city, to be sadly solled with rueful dust. She shines not from afar like the resplendent Helen;

but as she approaches, deeper settles down into your heart the looks of the wife and mother, the loving, lovingly, and beloved! Homer says not one single word about her being beautiful at all; for 'twas needless to tell future ages that the Defender was to a "radiant angel linked." They have all known well that Andromache was, at that hour, fair as the Lily of the Field—ere fear fell on her, bright as the Rose of the Royal Garden. Simple they have seen her as one bearing water from the well—yet majestic as the daughter of a Queen, which she was, the Queen of Cilician Thebè, whose throne Achilles overthrew.

The above is Sotheby's—and it is beautiful. We have not room to print, in comparison, the parallel passages, in full, from all the other great or good translators. But we must do so with a few of their most touching lines. And first, let us look at the image of the star—and the two lines of the original, in which it is enshrined,

Παῖδ' ἐπὶ κόλπῳ ἵχνη' ἀταλάφρονα, ἰππῶν αὐτῆς,
'Εκτερίζον ἀγαπητὴν, ἀλίγκιον ἀστέρει
καλῷ·

Chapman writes,

"She ran to Hector, and with her
Tender of heart and hand,

Her son, borne in his nurse's arms,
Where like a heavenly sign
Compact of many golden stars
The princely child did shine."

That is good—but the touching epithets, ἀταλάφροντα, ἡπιον, ἀγαπητὸν, are all left out—unless indeed "tender of heart and hand" apply to the child—which seems doubtful—for perhaps they apply to the mother. "Like a beautiful star," which is all that Homer says, Chapman has, in the intensity of his sense of beauty, expauded into a lustrous line, which we print here as if it were two—

"Compact of many golden stars,
The princely child did shine."

And he has our forgiveness.

Old Hobbes, whose bare and bald version is sometimes strangely illuminated by sudden gleams of natural inspiration, says,

"Now Hector met her with their little boy,

That in their nurse's arms was carried;
And like a star upon her bosom lay
His beautiful and shining golden head."

He, too, omits the three epithets—though "little" is endearing; but the rest is exquisite. Hobbes' philosophic creed was, of all frozen and freezing creeds, the most selfish; but "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin;"

and the old childless metaphysician—he was upwards of eighty, we believe, when he translated Homer—is vivified into a Man and a Father. Dryden says,

"The royal babe upon her breast was laid,

Who, like the morning star, his beams displayed."

He, too, leaves out the three endearments; but he alone of all the translators, gives Ἐνταῦθα, which is finely Englished, "the royal babe." He is also good about the star.

Pope says,

"The nurse stood near, in whose embraces pressed,

His only hope, hung smiling at her breast,

Whom each soft charm, and early grace adorn,

Fair as the new-born star that gilds the morn."

This, in itself, is not undelightful; but far less delightful than the lines in Homer. "In whose embraces pressed," is a needless departure from the Scriptural simplicity of ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ ἔχοντες; "only hope," belongs not to the "antique speech." "Each soft charm and early grace," is but pretty; and "gilds the morn," is an execrable libel on Homer—a lie—and worse, pure nonsense.

Cowper says,

"The virgin-nurse, enfolding in her arms

His yet unwean'd, and helpless little one,

Fair as the star of morn."

We love that, for the tendernesses are almost all there; and "virgin-nurse" lets us know that Andromache fed Astyanax from her own "fragrant bosom," for which we believe she is praised by Τασίλλο. Dryden, Pope, and Cowper, all call the star "the star of morn;" and, though Homer does not say so, we believe it was,—for we think on the morn of life.

Sotheby, as may be seen also above, says,

"Before him came, and with her came the maid,

On whose fond breast his child was softly laid,

Their only child, and lovelier in their sight

And fairer far than Hesper's golden light."

The second line is simple, but not so simple as the original, which it might easily have been; the next is very good. By the by, a spirited critic in the Edinburgh Review, (in an article in which he speaks justly of the "neuteness, vivacity, and elegance" of Mr Henry Coleridge's Introduction to the Study of the Greek Classical Poets;) says erroneously, speaking of Sotheby's translation of this passage, that there is great poverty in the simple announcement "Came with her infant on the nurse's breast," as a version of the two Greek lines we have quoted above. The ingenious critic must have been dreaming or nodding; for no such words are in Sotheby. The "only," "lovelier," and "fairer," must also be added to another "simple announcement"—the true one; and then, though the version hardly does justice to the exquisite beauty of the original, it is freed from the critic's objection. Stop—we find we are in the wrong. The critic in the Edinburgh may have taken the line from "Specimens of Translation," published by Sotheby, before the great work—the whole of the Iliad—and Sotheby may have improved the line objected to, perhaps at his suggestion. If so, we kindly beg our ingenious brother's pardon—but hating to blot out, we proceed to Andromache's address to Hector.

CHAPMAN.

"O noblest in desire!

Thy mind inflamed with other's good, will set thyself on fire;
Nor pitiest thou thy son, nor wife, who must thy widow be;
If now thou issue—all the field will only run on thee.
Better my shoulders underwent the earth than thy decease;
For then could earth bear joys no more, then come the black increase
Of griefs, like Greeks on Ilium! Alas! what one survives
To be my refuge? One black day bereft seven brothers' lives
By stern Achilles. By his hand my father breathed his last;
His high-wall'd rich Cilician Thebes sackt by him and laid waste,
The royal body yet he left unspoil'd—religion charm'd
That act of spoil, and all in fire he burn'd him complete arm'd,
Built over him a royal tomb, and to the monument
They left of him th' Oracles, that are the high descent
Of ægis-bearing Jupiter, another of their own
Did add to it, and set round with elms, by which is shewn
In theirs the barrenness of death; yet might it serve beside
To shelter the sad monument from all the ruffinous pride
Of storms and tempests used to hurt things of that noble kind.
The short life yet my mother lived he saved, and serv'd his mind
With all the riches of the realm, which not enough esteem'd,
He kept her prisoner, whom small time but much more wealth redeem'd.
And she in silvan Hyppocrate Cilicia ruled again,
But soon was overruled by death. Diana's chaste disdain
Gave her a lance, and took her life;—Yet all these gone from me, Thou amply render'st all, thy life makes still my father's be,
My mother, brothers, and besides thou art my husband too,
Most loved, most worthy. Pity then, dear love, and do not go;
For thou gone, all these go again; pity our common joy,
Lest of a father's patronage, the bulwark of all Troy,
Thou leavest him a poor widow's charge—stay, stay then in this tower,
And call up to the wild fig-tree all thy retired power,
For there the wall is easiest scaled, and fittest for surprise;
And there th' Ajaxes, Idomen, th' Atrides, Diomed, thrice
Have both survey'd and made attempt, I know not if induced
By some wise auguries, or the fact was naturally infused
Into their wits or courages."

DEYDEN.

"Thy dauntless heart, which I foresee too late,
Too daring man, will urge thee to thy fate.
Nor dost thou pity, with a parent's mind,
This helpless orphan, whom thou leav'st behind;
Nor me, the unhappy partner of thy bed,
Who must in triumph by the Greeks be led.
They seek thy life; and, in unequal fight
With many, will oppress thy single might.
Better it were for miserable me
To die, before the fate which I foresee;
For, ah! what comfort can the world bequeath
To Hector's widow, after Hector's death!
Eternal sorrow and perpetual tears
Began my youth, and will conclude my years:
I have no parents, friends, nor brothers left;
By stern Achilles all of life bereft.
Then, when the walls of Thebes he overthrew,
His fatal hand my royal father slew;

He slew Etion, but despoil'd him not,
 Nor in his hate the funeral rites forgot;
 Arm'd as he was he sent him whole below,
 And reverenced thus the manes of his foe.
 A tomb he raised; the mountain nymphs around
 Enclosed, with planted elms, the holy ground.
 My seven brave brothers, in one fatal day,
 To death's dark mansions took the mournful way;
 Slain by the same Achilles, while they keep
 The bellowing oxen and the bleating sheep.
 My mother, who the royal sceptre sway'd,
 Was captive to the cruel victor made,
 And thither led; but, hence redeemed with gold,
 Her native country did again behold,
 And but beheld; for soon Diana's dart,
 In an unhappy chase, transfix'd her heart.
 But thou, my Hector, art thyself alone,
 My parents, brothers, and my lord, in one.
 O, kill not all my kindred o'er again,
 Nor tempt the dangers of the dusty plain,
 But in this tower, for our defence remain. }
 Thy wife and son are in thy ruin lost;
 This is a husband's and a father's post.
 The Scæan gate commands the plain below;
 Here marshal all thy soldiers as they go; }
 And hence with other hands, repel the foe.
 By yon wild fig-tree lies their chief ascent,
 And thither all their powers are daily bent.
 The two Ajaces have I often seen,
 And the wrong'd husband of the Spartan queen;
 With him his greater brother, aid, with these,
 Fierce Diomedes, and bold Meriones;
 Uncertain if by augury, or chance,
 But by this easy rise they all advance."

HECTOR.

"Too daring prince! ah, whither dost thou run?
 Ah, too forgetful of thy wife and son!
 And think'at thou not how wretched we shall be,
 A widow I, a helpless orphan he!
 For sure such courage length of life denies;
 And thou must fall, thy virtue's sacrifice.
 Greece in her single heroes strove in vain,
 Now hosts oppose thee, and thou must be slain!
 Oh grant me, gods! ere Hector meets his doom—
 All I can ask of Heaven—an early tomb.
 So shall my days in one sad tenor run,
 And end with sorrows as they first begun;
 No parent now remains my grief to share,
 No father's aid, no mother's tender care—
 The fierce Achilles wrapp'd our walls in fire,
 Laid Thebe waste, and slew my warlike sire—
 His fate compassion in the victor bred—
 Stern as he was, he yet rever'd the dead;
 His radiant arms preserved from hostile spoil,
 And laid him decent on the funeral pile;
 Then raised a mountain where his bones were burn'd;
 The mountain nymphs the rural tomb adorn'd,
 Jove's silvan daughters bade their elms bestow
 A barren shade, and in his honour grow.
 By the same arm my seven brave brothers fell;
 In one sad day beheld the gates of Hell,
 While the fat herds and snowy flocks they fed,
 Amid their fields the hapless heroes bled;
 My mother lived to hear the victor's bands,
 The Queen of Hippolacia's silvan lands,

Redeem'd too late, she scarce beheld again
 Her pleasing empire, and her native plain,
 When, ah! oppress'd by life-consuming woe,
 She fell a victim to Diana's bow;
 Yet while my Hector still survives, I see
 My father, mother, brethren, all in thee;
 Alas! my parents, brothers, kindred, all
 Once more will perish, if my Hector fall.
 Thy wife, thy infant, in thy danger share—
 Oh! prove a husband's and a father's care.
 That quarter most the skillful Greeks annoy,
 Where yon wild fig-tree joins the wall of Troy,
 Thou from this tower defend the important post;
 There Agamemnon points his dreadful host,
 That pass Tydides, Ajax, strive to gain,
 And there the vengeful Spartan fires his train.
 Thrice our bold foes the fierce attack have given,
 Or led by hopes, or dictated from Heaven;
 Let others in the field their arms employ—
 But stay my Hector here, and guard his Troy."

COWFLR.

" Ah! doom'd! Thyself the victim of thy own
 Too daring courage! Pity of thy boy
 Thou feel'st not, nor of me, thy widow soon;
 For soon the whole united Grecian host
 Will overwhelm thee, and thou must be slain.
 Earth yield me, then, a tomb! for refuge else
 Or none so safe have I,—thenceforth forlorn
 Of all defence, since father I have none,
 Or mother's genial home to shelter me.
 Achilles, when he sack'd Cilician Thebes,
 And fired her lofty domes, my father slew;
 He slew Eetion; but a decent awe
 Forbidding him to bare a royal corse,
 He burn'd him with his arms, heap'd high the soil
 That hides the urn, and the Orades,
 Jove's daughters, circled it around with elms.
 My seven brothers, feeding in the field
 Their flocks and herds, all perish'd in a day,
 For dread Achilles found and slew them all.
 My mother, whom in all her green retreats
 Hypocleus obey'd, when, rich in spoils,
 The Conqueror steer'd his gallant bark to Troy,
 Came captive in the fleet, but, ransom'd hence
 At countless cost, revisited her home,
 And, by Diana pierced, at home expired.
 All these are lost, but in thy wedded love,
 My faithful Hector, I regain them all.
 Come then—let pity plead! to spare thy boy
 An orphan's woes, and widowhood to me,
 Defend this tower, and where the fig-tree spreads
 Her branches, station thy collected force,
 For there Idomeneus, the King of Crete,
 Tydides, either Ajax, and the sons
 Of Atreus, thrice with their united powers
 Have press'd to seize the city, whether taught
 By some interpreter of signs from Heaven,
 Or prompted by remark and self-advised."

SOTHEBY.

" Too rashly bold, thee, sole defence of Troy,
 Thy brave right arm and fearlessness destroy—
 Fails then thy child a father's heart to move?
 Fails then thy wife's unutterable love?"

Thy wife !—no more—Greece arms 'gainst thee her force :
 Thy wife ! a widow on thy blood-stained corse.
 Ah ! rest of thee, be mine the wish'd-for doom
 To hide my anguish in th' untimely tomb !
 Ah ! rest of thee, no hope, no solace mine,
 But grief slow wearing out life's long decline.
 No mother waits me, no consoling sire,
 The hapless victim of Achilles' ire.
 Ere from the sack of Thebes the chief withdrew,
 His ruthless rage my sire, Eetion, slew,
 Yet fear'd to spoil, but honouring, on the pyre,
 Him, with his arms, consign'd to feed the fire ;
 Then heap'd on high the earth, whose funeral mound
 With planted elms the Jove-born Oreads crown'd.
 They, too, in one fleet day all breathless laid,
 Seven brothers sunk at once in Hades' shade.
 These, mid their cattle on the pasturing mead,
 Achilles' fury doom'd at once to bleed.
 And here the conqueror, 'mid his plunder'd store,
 From Hyppocleacia's groves my mother bore ;
 Then, richly ransom'd, back restor'd again,
 Too soon to perish, by Diana slain.
 Yet thou, my Hector ! thou art all, alone,
 Sire, mother, brethren, husband, all in one.
 In pity guard this tower, here shield thy life,
 Leave not an orphan child, a widow'd wife.
 There, by the fig-tree, plant thy war array,
 Where, easiest of ascent, to Troy the way.
 Thrice have the boldest chiefs that spot assail'd,
 And thrice the efforts of the boldest fail'd.
 Th' Atreides, either Ajax, Tydeus' son,
 And Crete's fierce king, there led their warriors on,
 Whether by seer forewarn'd, or martial art
 There mark'd out lion's vulnerable part."

Let us try old Chapman in this passage by the principles by which he tells us he was guided throughout his translation, and we shall not withhold from him here our admiration. He demands the right of "periphrasis or circumlocution;" and sayeth, "always conceiving how pedantical and absurd an affectation it is, in the interpretation of any author (much more of Homer) to turn him word for word; when (according to Horace, and other best lawgivers to translators) it is the part of every knowing and judicial interpreter not to follow the number and order of words, but the material things themselves, and sentences to weigh diligently; and to clothe and adorn them with words, and such a style of oration as are most apt for the language into which they are converted." This and much more to the same purpose (which much offendeth Pope) sayeth this fierce old Trojan—nor shall we at present gainsay his creed. Let us therefore try his deeds by his doctrine; and, doing so, we declare at once that his version is a noble one.

The first words addressed by Andromache to Hector are worthy of his wife; "O noblest in desire!" and here they may even be the true meaning, for any thing we know to the contrary, of Δαίμον. The second line expresses, by a bold and bright periphrasis, the sense of Homer. "Nor pitiest thou thy son nor wife," is good as good may be; and so is "all the field will only run on thee." Deadly fear breathes in them, and they are Homeric. "Better my shoulders underwent the earth than thy decease," though quaint, smells strong of the Greek. "The black increase of griefs like foes on Ithaca," is Chapman's own, and affects the imagination, though we cannot call it natural. Yet natural it may be, nevertheless—although it did not occur to the heart of Homer's and Hector's Andromache. Chapman, it will be observed, in the narrative, puts the death of her brothers before that of her father, contrary to the original. No great loss in that, perhaps—and as little gain. The funeral of Eetion is grand; and we see what Chapman meant by the privilege he claimed as a translator in what he adds to the work of the Oreads. They planted elms round the tomb; but he adds, out of his own heart and brain, fiery and fertile,

——— "by which is shewn
In theirs the barrenness of death; yet might it serve beside
To shelter the sad monument from all the ruffinous pride
Of storms and tempests used to hurt things of that noble kind."

Ἐκτορ, ἀτὰρ σὺ μοι ἴσσι πατὴρ καὶ ποτνία μήτηρ,
Ἦοὶ κασιγνήτης, σὺ δὲ μοι θαλίος παρακλήτης.

Chapman has certainly rendered them well—better, as we shall see, than Pope or Cowper. "Thou art my husband too," corresponds exactly with the Greek words, and the same their position at the close of the line—a beauty not found in any of the other translations. "Pity our common joy" is extremely tender—and so is "lest thou leave him a poor widow's charge." Throughout the whole of Chapman's English, there is an earnestness—a beseeching and imploring affectionateness, which is also, though otherwise, breathed over all Homer's Greek—and therefore, without farther remark, we conclude as we began, with praise of the version—and request you to admire it along with us and not to be offended by its oddnesses or additions, or "periphrases or circumlocutions"—for, were you to do so, and Chapman's ghost to overhear you, it would call you "a certain envious wind-sucker."

Dryden's version, though in the simpler lines it loses not a little of the simplicity of the original, does not depart far from it; and throughout there is such an easy and musical flow, that we are almost willing to accept it instead of that simplest strain. "Better it were for miserable me," is extremely touching; though Dryden had not much power over the pathetic,

"Eternal sorrow and perpetual tears
Began my youth, and will conclude my years,"

have a truly tragic sound; and they have influenced Pope in this part of his paraphrase. Eëtion's slaughter and funeral are nobly given; and true Sentimental and stately—yea poetry—yet withal methinks more than Andromache was likely to have thought of saying to Hector. Yet, had Homer made her say it, we do not think we should have blamed him, and therefore we do not blame Chapman. The lines about Andromache's mother seem rather unintelligible, and rumble along like an old crazy cart. Then comes the TEST of translators—the two lines crowded with holy words:

to the picturesque of old Homer are the verses,

"A tomb he raised; the mountain nymphs
around

Enclosed, with plan'd elms, the holy ground."

And how stands Dryden "THE TEST?"

"But thou, my Hector, art thyself alone,
My parents, brothers, and my lord, in one."

Admirable—but of these lines a word or two hereafter.

"O kill not all my kindred o'er again,"

seems to have been suggested by Chapman, and is afterwards copied by Pope. It is not very good; for not very natural in feeling, and rather unnatural in expression. A few other flaws in the diamond we see—but it is a diamond—and almost of the first water. Let us do justice always to Glorious John—though in his strength he is too often a wilful transgressor.

Had Homer's Andromache never spoken in the simple strain in which, thank Heaven, she spake in the Sixth Book of the Iliad, Pope's lovely lady of that name would have been allowed by all to have uttered much natural pathos in the speech, which had then been not a paraphrastic translation from the Greek, but an absolute inspiration in English; and great had been the glory of the bard of Twickenham. For the lines are beautiful. But here, if anywhere, was Pope bound by the most sacred considerations to have adhered to the words of Homer, that all who might ever speak the English tongue might have known how, thousands of years ago, that high-priest of nature inspired, in the hour of trial, the lips of a Trojan princess pouring out the heart of a mother-wife to an heroic husband issuing to battle—the defender—if not the deliverer. In the first four lines Pope's Andromache utters three or four interjections, exclamations, or interrogations—Homer's Andromache but one—Δαίμονις. Pope's Andromache thinks first of herself and child—or chiefly so—for “whither dost thou run,” is but faint, and worse, it is not “all one in the Greek.” Homer's Andromache thinks first and solely of Hector—φθίησι τοι το σπέρμας, thy courage will be thy death! Pope's Andromache is almost verbose—“Ah! too forgetful,” &c.—“and think'st thou not,” &c., words, however, which we condemn not—but Homer's Andromache piteously upbraids Hector that he will not have pity—οὐδ' ἰλαίσις. She asks him not—as her Shadow does in Pope—why: nor exclaimeth she ah! but passionately tells him—for she sees it—that he will not pity—for his courage she sees has killed pity—even for Παῖδά παῖδας, καὶ ἐν' αἰμοσφοῖν—Hector's Andromache here putting their boy first—as was natural—but Pope's Andromache putting herself first—not unnatural either perhaps, in common cases, but assuredly so in that of the wife of “Εκτορε; ἀνδρὸς φρονίμοιο and of the waving crest.” The next four lines of Pope are glowing and fine; but in them he reverts to the strong words φθίησι τοι το σπέρμας, which “shine well where they stand” in Homer, but come in here flat, comparatively, and are unnecessarily expanded into a sort of moral apothegm, or general reflection on the danger of too much courage, which is a sorry substitute for the Homeric—“Thy courage will be thy death.” Homer's Andromache says to Hector, that “soon the Greeks will kill thee, all rushing upon thee at once.” Pope's Andromache says, alas! what at length may be seen in lines seventh and eighth of the translation. Let us not, however, further compare the two Andromaches, lest the comparison should seem invidious; but merely complain of, “O grant me Gods!” and “all I can ask of Heaven,” as untrue to the simple pathos of the original—and the two lines which follow as untrue to the sense—though in themselves unobjectionable. “I have neither father nor mother,” is all Homer makes Andromache say next; and out of that scripture Pope makes her spin—

“No parent now remains my grief to share,
No father's aid, no mother's tender care.”

The next fifteen lines are narrative—and Pope has, we think, on the whole, given them more than well—finely; and throughout his translation, he has felt that Homer made Andromache speak with composure of “sorrows long ago,” at least of sorrows that had been wellnigh forgotten in Hector's love, and that only now again came upon her in her dread of his death. That narrative over, Andromache turns to Hector in that most beautiful burst of affection, which has been for ever consecrated to tears, and which we have chosen, in our critical capacity, to call the Τέλει. Alas! the Pope is not infallible: for he fails where Homer and nature demanded that he should have been victorious over all hearts.

“Yet while my Hector still survives, I see
My father, mother, brethren, all in thee;
Alas! my parents, brothers, kindred, all,
Once more will perish, if my husband fall.”

The first two lines are almost, but not quite perfect—for we miss in them the two endearing words that, to Hector's ear, must have been the most affecting of all—the words that conclude the two most comprehensive lines ever love breathed—Σωτήρις παρκαύτης. “and thou art my blooming spouse!” While the last two lines—which contain the word desiderated in its proper place, “husband”—are too ingenious by far, and copied injudiciously from Chapman and Dryden, and after all, liker Abraham Cowley than Dan Homer. The rest of Andromache's speech is, with the exception of the first two lines of it, well done; and the two concluding lines, though not in Homer, make an affecting and a natural close, and may be more than forgiven.

Cowper at once seizes, grasps, and expresses the passion of Andromache. “Ah! doom'd!” is the very word—the sound and sense—so seemeth it to us—of Δαίμονις. Or is

It—Infatuate? Pope's "too daring Prince," is good—but this is far better—followed as it is, by "victim of thy own too daring courage," which, though inferior to the Greek, is forcible. "Pity of thy boy thou feel'st not, nor of me thy widow soon," is all that could be desired—and is Homer's, Andromache's, and Nature's self. So—nearly—are the two lines that follow. By Homer all this is said in three lines and a half—by Pope in eight—and by Cowper in five. Having thus started in power—and with the true heart of tenderness—how does Cowper continue to fare? Well—though not so well. "Earth yield me then a tomb," is far better than Pope's, "O grant me, gods," &c.; but "refuge else or none so safe have I," is, though simple, somewhat tame and cold; nor is "Mother's genial home" entirely to our liking for πόντια μήτηρ. The history given by Andromache of her parents is exquisite—especially the lines describing Etion's funeral. They are indeed very noble in Cowper—equal to those in Homer. Not less so is the slaughter of the Seven Brothers. But how doth Cowper conquer the two immortal lines, and reduce them under the English yoke? How stands he the Test? "All these are lost—but in thy wedded love,

My faithful Hector—I regain them all." Here the meaning, the feeling, the passion is doubtless transfused into a comprehensive power of "English undistilled." The lines are good and great lines—and worthy of Cowper. But Homer's, though not greater—not so great—are better, for there is a tenderness in the words he puts into Andromache's lips, which surpasses all other merit. Cowper says "all these are lost;" but Homer gives us "all these" themselves—over again—and in a heap—at once successive and clustering

——— *πύτιν καὶ πόντιαν μήτηρ,
'Ἡδὲ πασιγυῖτος, σὺ δὲ μοι θάλλεις παρμασίτης.*

No other words under the sun can make amends for the want of these—the eye must see—the ear must hear them—from Andromache's looks and lips—else neither her heart nor ours can be satisfied nor have any rest. "Come, then, let pity plead," is good—but too modern; Homer does not say "let pity plead," but, "come now, take pity upon us," which is infinitely fuller of prayer, and therefore more natural in Andromache. All the rest is what it ought to be—except, perhaps, the last line of all, which appears pedantic. As a whole, however, the translation is, to our feelings, better than Pope's.

Sotheby manifestly feels the force of the first words of Andromache's address to Hector, but he has not felicitously transfused them into his version, which is, indeed, awkward and tautological. "Sole defence of Troy," is not in the original; yet that here matters little or nothing, for such Hector was, and therefore was "The Boy" called Astyanax. Still, Sotheby should not have said so here, because Andromache does not; and, as sure as Homer is now in heaven, did Andromache say all, and no more, that was right. But "brave right arm and fearlessness destroy," is positively bad speaking and bad writing; whereas δαίμονις, φρίσσας τὸ σὸν μένος, is positively good speaking and good writing—we defy the tongue of woman, or the pen of man, to speak or write better at such a juncture. The four following lines are not much better—and they cannot be much worse. The repetition of the word "fail" is formal; and "unutterable" is unnatural. The repetition of the word "wife" is also formal; and as no such word at all is here in Homer, it is insufferable. "Blood-stained corse" is a voluntary commonplace, to the use of which we can conjecture no inducement. "Greece arms 'gainst thee her force," is but tolerable. "Wished-for doom," is but so so; and "to hide my anguish in th' untimely tomb," is not excellent. In the Bible, it is said that sinners will call "upon the rocks to cover them," that is, to hide them, from the eye of God. But Andromache did not wish her anguish to be hidden—for the sorrow of a widow is not shame. She simply wished herself to be buried—to be insensate earth—χθονὸς δρυμῶν—as Wordsworth's bereaved lover says, in equal passion—

"Rolled round in earth's diurnal course,
With rocks, and stones, and trees!"

What she said—so should have Sotheby. "Ah, rest of thee," is also unhomerically, if not anti-homerically repeated—repetition being, it would seem, in the eyes of Sotheby, a strong secret—in ours a patent weakness.

"No hope, no solace mine,
But grief slow wearing out life's long decline,"

is in itself good, because drearily expressive—but it wants the touching simplicity of Andromache's own words.

"The hapless victim of Achilles ire," seems superfluous—for we have in addition, with about one line intervening,

"His ruthless rage my sire Eëtion slew."

The next twelve lines are as good as can be—as sonorous as Pope's, and as simple as Homer's. How beautiful the picture of a Hero's tomb!

"Then heap'd on high the earth, whose funeral mound

With planted flags the Jove-born Oreads crown'd!"

Look at Pope's lines—and you see they are too ambitious—Sotheby's are purely Homeric. Now for the—TEST. Yes! Sotheby has stood it with high aid—and is triumphant.

"YET THOU! MY HECTOR! THOU ART ALL ALONE,

SIRE, MOTHER, BRETHREN, HUSBAND, ALL IN ONE!"

Let ten thousand Translators try it—and not one will surpass—not one will equal—Sotheby. True, that he is indebted for these two exquisite lines almost entirely to Dryden. But how could he help that? John was before William. Therefore, all that William could do was to study John; and, if possible, to polish up John, with the fine feeling fingers of the soul, to uttermost perfection. Pope tried to do so, and failed. Cowper proudly shunned competition, and gave the difficulty the go-by. Sotheby, by simply changing "my parents" into "sire, mother," and "lord" into "husband," and leaving alone and out the two false lines that follow, has given us Homer—and nothing but Homer—the Bill, and nothing but the Bill, and it is a true Bill, unlike some others we could mention, and may well bid defiance to farther reform. The rest is all good—but not perfect. "In pity guard this tower," is nearly what it ought to be; but Andromache says,

"Come now, have pity, and take your station on this tower," which is more tenderly beseeching; and she does not say, "here shield thy life," though we pardon Sotheby for making her say so, as beyond doubt that thought was in her heart, as indeed it betrays itself in her afflicted words. Yet terrified as she was, Sotheby knows as well as we do that Andromache would not, could not, have wounded Hector's ears with such syllables as "shield thy life." They would have made his crest shiver—and dimmed the shine of his golden helmet.

"Leave not an orphan child, a widow'd wife."

is faultless—and thus have we a few lines almost sufficient of themselves to redeem all sins either of omission or commission, which in this version, we fear, are neither few nor feeble.

This speech of Andromache has been subjected to some severe, and not very decorous criticisms by great authorities—one of whom is Dryden. "Andromache," says he, "in the midst of her concernment and fright for Hector, runs off her bias to tell him a story of her pedigree, and of the lamentable death of her father, her mother, and her seven brothers.

The devil was in Hector [we fear Christopher North sometimes falls into imitation of John Dryden! if he knew not all this matter, for she had been his bedfellow for many years together: if he knew it, it must then be confessed that Homer, in this long digression, has rather given us his own character, (what character is that? of an old prosier in his dotage?) than that of the fair lady whom he paints. His dear friends the commentators, who never fail him at a pinch, will needs excuse him, by making the present sorrow of Andromache to occasion the remembrance of the past; but others think that she had enough to do with that grief which now oppressed her, without running for assistance to her family." This is sorry stuff; Blackwood-Magazinish, and Edinburgh-Reviewish, in their less happy hours. Homer's "dear friends, the commentators," were in the right. Yet was Homer at no pinch. Sorrow evokes shadows of sorrow from the tomb, and they came trooping like ghosts. Pope answers Dryden well, too, when he says, "that nothing was more natural in Andromache than to recollect her past calamities, in order to represent her present distress to Hector in a stronger light, and then her utter desolation if he should perish." And we ask what although Andromache "had been Hector's bedfellow, for many years?" Never before had she been so inspired with those mournful memories as now; for they were standing together, husband and wife, as it were, in the shadow of death. And then it is that the soul re-sees the past, and prophesies the future—both black. To borrow Dryden's bold phraseology—"What the devil would he have made Andromache say?" Nothing so persuasive, by a thousand degrees, to Hector's heart. Devil take it, is it not natural for a wife, when in her misery beseeching her husband not to go to death, to remind him of what he has forgotten—the miseries she had already suffered, ere she saw his dear face—miseries huge and wild—yet though Ossa-and-Pelion-like in themselves, as molchills to his slaughter under the spear of Achilles? Achilles! ay, that was the dreadful vision ever before her eyes. She knew not—how could she?—that he was sitting sullen at his ships. Or if she did, might not the glaring lion come leaping from his den upon Hector? We could say much more for Andromache; but, haply, this is sufficient from Christopher, the Defender of the Faith.

Allow us to say shortly two other things: one from Pope—one from ourselves. First, these dreadful stories of Andromache's, again bring the absent Achilles before us—into the heart of the poem. Second, they must have delighted the listeners to the great Audæa, for who in the heroic age was like Achilles? And they delight the listeners still, as they see the golden helm of the Son of Thetis refulgent through the mist of years.

Allow us to say shortly two other things—both from ourselves. First, we defy you to imagine human language, simpler in style, more direct to the purpose of the passion, more prosaic, and less poetry, than all that Andromache utters, when Hector, and Hector alone, is in her quaking heart. Look at the Greek words—in their strength—and you will feel it to be so. Translate them into verses in prose, and they will read just like some of the most pathetic verses in the Old Testament—or the New—say the story of Joseph and his brethren—or David and Absalom—or the Prodigal Son, or even some still more affecting narrative. All great poets, in all ages, have always, on all great occasions of all great passions, thus greatly written; and Wordsworth,—though, in saying so, he said nothing new, yet something old that this flowery age of ours had, when first he began to flourish, foolishly forgotten,—was therefore greatly right when he called on all students in poetry to know that its language was common to prose—in its foundations, and likewise in its superstructures—except when—and then he told us, wisely and well, what the exceptions are—and illustrated the principles on which they occur to the inspired, in much of his own life-ennobling and immortal song. Second, see how Andromache adheres in her passion—it is the passion of fear—to its two objects—Hector, Achilles. Her soul for a while undergoes absorption. From that unendurable agony it seeks escape into the memory of past miseries—in which the Destroyer, slaying and slaughtering her kith and kin, is yet far off—his image is far off—from her husband. While she indulges in the distress of that dismal dream—there is to her relief in its worst horrors—for all the while Hector is held alive to her side—and hopes come to her out of the murders she narrates, that he will shun the murderer. These hopes not only suffer, but persuade her to speak more freely—fully—if you will poetically—about the persons, places, and things that pass before her imagination—her Seven Brothers slaughtered while tending their flocks and herds—her Father slain, burned in all his arms, and buried beneath a mound, which the Oreads, daughters of Ægis-bearing Jove—she calls them so—crown with elms—her Mother ransomed, and again reigning, and by Diana smitten—till Andromache being enabled at last, by the truce afforded by fancy to the feelings that at first were like to kill her, to indulge in the tenderness of affection, then it is, and not till then could it have been, that her whole love-charged heart effuses itself in one burst of divinest delight, as from lips to which we may think we see the colour coming back, and themselves quivering no more, is poured that utterance—

Ἐκτορ, ἅτ' αὖ σὺ μοι ἰσοὶ πατήρ κ' ἰππία μήτηρ,
Ἥδ' ἐκασίγητος, σὺ δὲ μοι θαλὴρὸς παρακαίτης.

What says majestic Hector to his Andromachæ? Thus:

COWPER.

"Thy cares are all mine also. But I dread
The matron's scorn, the brave man's just disdain,
Should fear seduce me to desert the field.
No! my Andromachæ! my fearless heart—
Me rather urges into foremost fight,
Studious of Priam's glory and my own.
For my prophetic soul foresees a day,
When Ilium, Ilium's people, and himself
Her warlike king shall perish. But no grief
For Ilium; for her people; for the king,
My warlike sire; nor even for the queen;
Nor for the numerous and the valiant band,
My brothers, destined all to lie the ground,
So moves me, as my grief for thee alone!
Doom'd then to follow some imperious Greek,
A weeping captive, to the distant shores
Of Argos; there to labour at the loom,
For a task-mistress, and with many a sigh,
But heaved in vain, to bear the ponderous urn
From Hyperæia's, or Messæia's fount.
Fast flow thy tears the while, and as he eyes
That silent shower, some passing Greek will say,
'This was the wife of Hector, who excelled
All Troy in fight, when Ilium was besieged.'
While thus he speaks, thy tears shall flow afresh,
The guardian of thy freedom, while he lived
For ever lost; but be my bones inhumed
A senseless store, or e'er thy parting cries
Shall pierce mine ear, and thou be dragg'd away!"

SOTHEBY.

"Hector replied—'These all, O wife beloved!
All that moves thee, my heart have deeply moved:
Yet more I dread each son of Trojan birth,
More than thy dæmons whose raiment trails on earth,
If like a wave, where chiefs with chiefs engage,
The warrior Hector tears the war to wage—
Not thus my heart inclines. Far rather far,
First of Troy's sons, I lead the van of war
Firm fix'd, not Priam's dignity alone
And glory to uphold, but guard my own.
I know the day draws nigh when Troy shall fall,
When Priam and his nation perish all;
Yet, less—forebodings of the fate of Troy,
Her king and Hecuba, my peace destroy;
Less—that my brethren all, the heroic band,
Must with their blood imbrue their native land—
Than thoughts of thee in tears, to Greece a prey,
Dragg'd by the grasp of war in chains away—
Of thee in tears, beneath an Argive roof,
Labouring reluctant the allotted wool,
Or doom'd to draw from Hyperæia's cave,
Or from Messæia's fount, the measured wave."

A voice will then be heard that thou must hear,
 "See'st thou you captive pouring tear on tear?
 Lo, Hector's wife, the hero bravest far
 When Troy and Greece round Iliou clash'd in war."
 Then thou with keener anguish wilt deplore
 Him whose cold arm can free his wife no more;
 But first, may Earth o'er me her mound uprear;
 Ere I behold thee slaved, or see thy tear!"

We hesitate not to say, that Cowper's version is perfect. Unequalled it is at present; excelled it can be—never. It is coloured not by the faintest hue of translation, but breathes throughout the pure, free air of a divine original. It is just as good as Homer. The first six lines of Greek are given in six of English, and their calm, firm spirit is finely preserved. All the others are exquisite.

We cannot say the same of Sotheby's. It is good—Pope's (which look at) is better—for with more faults, it has greater beauties—but Cowper's, we repeat, is best. For it alone is "the tender and the true." In Sotheby the first six lines of Greek become ten in English—and Hector seems to vaunt himself rather too much. "My peace destroy," is neither Homeric nor Hecorian: "yet less," and again "less," are feeble and formal, cumbersome and clumsy. "The grasp of war" is an unaffecting generality, compared with its definite original; we do not admire here the alliteration of "labouring reluctant the allotted woe," though others may; "measured woe" are two words not to our taste, especially the last, which is falsely poetical for "water." "A voice will then be heard that thou must hear," is not happy for καὶ ποτὶ τις ἴππῳ. "See'st thou you captive pouring tear on tear," is a negligent misconception of ὡς κατὰ δάκρυ χιούσαι, as Sotheby was in an instant see. "When Troy and Greece together clashed in war," is not the natural language of a bystander, like ὅτι Ἴλιον ἀμφιμάχοντο. The final line "Ere I behold thee slave, or see thy tear," is a poor impostor, detected at once in the attempt to pass itself off for

 πῶς ἴδωμαι.*

Hector in Homer speaks twice of Andromache's weeping—δάκρυον—κατὰ δάκρυ χιούσαι; in Sotheby four times—"thoughts of thee in tears"—"of thee in tears"—"pouring tear in tear"—"see thy tear." With more than double the effort, the translator produces less than half the effect.

Old Chapman felt Hector's address—and he labours to render it, if possible, still more dismal. He makes Hector say,

"And such a stormy day shall come, in mind and soul I know,
 When sacred Troy shall shed her towers,
 for tears of overthrow."

Not in Homer, indeed, but dreadful—and afterwards—

"As thy sad state when some rude Greek shall lead thee weeping hence,

Those free days clouded, and a night of captive violence,

Loading thy temples, out of which thine eyes must never see,

But spin the Greek wives' webs of task, and their tetch-water be."

Expansion and paraphrase all—but conceived and expressed in intensity of emotion, and full of ruth.

Who gives best the sense and feeling of

Καὶ ποτὶ τις ἴππῳ,——

"Ἐκτερος ἦος γυνή, ὅς ἀγριότητος μάχισθαι

Τρώων ἱπποδάμων, ὅτι Ἴλιον ἀμφιμά-χοντο.

Chapman says,

"This dame was Hector's wife.
 A man that at the wars of Troy did breathe the worthiest life
 Of all their army."

Dryden,

"While groaning under this laborious life,
 They insolently call thee Hector's wife;
 Upbraid thy bondage with thy husband's name,

And from thy glory propagate thy shame."

Pope,

"There, while you groan beneath the load of life,

They cry, 'behold the mighty Hector's wife!'

Some haughty Greek, who loves thy tears to see,
Embitters all thy woes by naming me."

Cowper,

"This was the wife of Hector who excelled

All Troy in fight when Ilion was besieged."

Sotheby, as you have seen,

"Lo, Hector's wife, the hero bravest far,
When Troy and Greece round Ilion clashed in war!"

Who, we ask again, is best? Cowper. Who next? Perhaps Pope—perhaps Chapman. Who next? Perhaps Sotheby. Dryden is the worst—inasmuch as he is the least Homeric—and his lines, though they have his usual copious flow, are failures; for "insolently" in the second is beyond and out of Hector's meaning; the third is superfluous, and the fourth absurdly and coarsely and vulgarly "propagated."

Dunces, with "hearts as dry as summer dust," have here found fault with Homer and Hector. Cold comfort this, they have said, from husband to wife. Hector is here chicken-hearted—cowed—crowed-down —cool in the pens—fugy, as cockers say; but he ought to have sung clear as unconquered chanticleer, dropt his wing, strutted crouselly, and sent his fair hen and chicken chuckling gayly to Troy. Such is the spirit of their fault-finding, though they were not up to the use of such appropriate terms of reprobation; for they are Fools. Hector speaks to Andromache, at first, like the heroic soldier—"jealous and quick of honour"—and conscious that in his arm lies the salvation of his country. But all at once, "O my prophetic soul!" He sees Troy taken—and Andromache captive. The vision asks not his leave—but embodies itself in words, leaving the choice of them to Love and Pity. Of that dismal day, "far off the coming shone" on his soul—and it will therefore speak as another great poet makes a sad seer say,

"Though dark and despairing my sight I may seal,

Yet man cannot cover what God would reveal."

But now for our concluding specimen of Sotheby, which completes the "Tale of tears, the mournful story."

"He spoke, and stretch'd his arms, and onward prest
To clasp his child, and fold him on his breast;
The while the child, on whose o'er-dazzled sight
The helm's bright splendour flash'd too fierce a light,
And the thick horse-hair as it wavy play'd
From the high helmet cast its sweeping shade,
Scar'd at his father's sight, bent back distress'd,
And shrieking, sunk upon his nurse's breast.
The child's vain fear their bitter woe beguil'd,
And o'er the boy each parent sweetly smil'd.
And Hector now the glittering helm unbrac'd,
And gently on the ground its terror plac'd,
Then kist, and dandling with his infant play'd,
And to the gods and Jove devoutly pray'd.
'Jove! and ye gods, vouchsafe that Hector's boy,
Another Hector, all surpass in Troy,
Like me in strength pre-eminently tow'r,
And guard the nation with his father's pow'r;
Heard be a voice, whene'er the warrior bands,
Behold the chieftain who his sire transcends,
And grant that home returning, charg'd with spoil,
His mother's smiles repay the hero's toil.'

"He spake, and gave, new sooth'd from vain alarms,
The lovely infant to his mother's arms,
And the fond mother, as she laid to rest
The lovely infant on her fragrant breast,
Smil'd in her tears, while Hector, as they fell,
Kist her pale cheek, and sooth'd with fond farewell.
'Grieve not, my love, untimely; ere the hour
My fate destin'd dread no hostile pow'r;

But—at the time ordain'd, the base, the brave,
 All pass alike within th' allotted grave.
 Now home retire ; thy charge, beneath our roof,
 To ply the distaff, and to weave the woof ;
 To task thy maids, and guide their labour, thine ;
 The charge of war is man's, and chiefly mine."

There is a scree—a sweep of Sotheby—gentlest reader—and as the parallel passage in Pope—who, you may depend upon it, was a poet—is one of the most popular in poetry, doubtless you have it by heart, and it comes in palpitations, pat for comparison. But first of all, see the ebb and flow of the tides of our sealike passions. A while ago the waves of sorrow came fast and loud, tumbling in, as

Drumly and dark they roll'd on their way,"

and rueful was the plight of Hector's soul as a surf-beaten ledge of rocks. It was drowning—drowned. But the overwhelming mass of foam all at once lulled, and wheeled back into the sea, leaving bare the bright-shelled sands to the sunshine of Heaven. Let that image suffice in its insufficiency ; and say simply that Hector again is, as the warful world goes, happy, and so is Andromache. Why not ? They know their fate, and to it are now "deeply reconciled." In such reconciliation there is often profound peace—sometimes still,—yea even brightest joy ;—and now the hour is blest, even

"As when some field, when louds roll thick and dun,
 Shines, in the distance, 'neath the showery
 sun ;

Or as some isle the howl of ocean braves,
 And rises lovely 'mid the dash of waves."

(CHRISTOPHER NORTH,
Miss. pences me.)

We said this moment "they know their fate, and to it are now deeply reconciled." Unsay the words—for they have forgotten their fate, and in their blindness are blest. Astyanax shall not be spun from the tower-top by Pyrrhus—Troy shall not totter to its fall—still shall Iliou salute the sky. For see παῖδ' ἰόν, how he smiles, as Hector high in the air holds up "his beautiful and shining golden head," starlike even in mid-day, before the "weepingly smiling" eyes of Andromache ! That is a vision "able to drive all sadness—even despair." That bud shall be a blossom—that blossom a flower ; and that flower shall bear glorious fruit—fruit worthy the scion of such a stem—deeds of deliverance, and the fame that flames before the feet of the free. Hector shall be eclipsed by Hector's son—and by none but he ; and the young warrior shall walk in the rescued city, among the music of perpetual hymns. Hector himself, ere then, may have "undergone the earth," and the green mound over his ashes be shaded with trees ; but Andromache will be surviving in her honoured and happy widowhood, and as her son comes to her from battle, glorious in the arms of some vanquished hero, χαρύν δι φρονι μάρτε. But why—oh why ! Sotheby ! Sotheby ! didst thou say that these three thrilling words mean

"His mother's smile repays the hero's toil?"

Hector, or his prophetic soul, had been glorying in the glory of his Astyanax ; but just as he is about to shut his lips, he thinks of what will then be the joy of his Andromache—and that is his joy as he places his boy on her beloved breast. This stroke of tenderness Sotheby does not seem to see ; and sorry are we to say it, for here between a hit and a miss, "Oh the difference to me !"

Now, let us take things calmly, and criticise the execution by the several translators, or engravers, of two of these celebrated pictures contained in this passage ; and first, that of the Helmet.

"Ὡς εἶπὼν, ὃ παιδὸς ὀρεῖτο φαιδρὸς ἔκτορ"
 "Ἀψ' ὃ εἰ παῖς πρὸς κέλων ἐν ζώνῃσι παῖδος"
 "Εὐλότης ἰδὼν, πατρὸς φίλῃ ὕψι ἀνυψήσας,
 Ταῖσ' ὅσας χαλκῶς τε, ἰδὲ λείων ἰσχυροχάτων."

Διὸν ἄπ' ἀγοράτης πόδας νύσσα νήσας·
 Ἐκ δ' ἐγίλασι πατὴρ τι φίλος, καὶ πόντιον μήταρ.
 Αὐτίκ' ἀπὸ κρατὸς κέρυθ' ἔλπιτο Φαίδιμος Ἑκτορ.
 Καὶ τὴν μὲν κατέθηκεν ἐπὶ χροῖι παμφανόσαν.
 Αὐτὰρ ὅγ' ὃν φίλον υἱὸν ἐπὶ κύσει, πρὶ λῆ τι χροῖιν,
 Εἶπεν ἐπυξάμενος, Διὶ τ', ἄλλοισιν ἠ' θεοῖσι·

CHAPMAN.

"This said, he reached to take his son; who, of his arms afraid,
 And then the horse-hair plume with which he was so overlaid
 Nodded so horribly, he cling'd back to his nurse and cried.
 Laughter affected his great sire, who doft and laid aside
 His fearful helm, that on the earth cast round about it light.
 Then took and kiss'd his loving son, and balancing his weight
 In dancing him, those loving vows to living Jove he used,
 And all the other bench of gods."

DRYDEN.

"Then holding forth his arms, he took his boy,
 The pledge of love, and other hope of Troy.
 The fearful infant turn'd his head away,
 And on his nurse's neck reclining lay,
 His unknown father shunning with affright,
 And looking back on so uncouth a sight;
 Daunted to see a face with steel o'erspread,
 And his high plume that nodded o'er his head.
 Then sire and mother smiled with silent joy,
 And Hector hasten'd to relieve his boy;
 Dismissed his burnish'd helm that shone afar,
 The pride of warriors, and the pomp of war.
 The illustrious babe, thus reconciled, he took,
 Hugged in his arms, and kiss'd, and thus he spoke."

POPE.

"Thus having spoke, the illustrious chief of Tro
 Stretched his fond arms to clasp the lovely boy
 The babe clung crying to his nurse's breast.
 Scared at the dazzling helm and nodding crest
 With secret pleasure each fond parent smiled,
 And Hector hasten'd to relieve the child;
 The glittering terrors from his brows unbound,
 And placed the beaming helmet on the ground
 Then kiss'd the child, and lifting high in air—
 Thus to the gods preferred a father's prayer."

LOWPER.

"The hero ended, and his arms put forth
 To reach his boy; but, with a scream, the child
 Still closer to his mother's bosom clung,
 Shunning his touch, for dreadful in his eyes
 The brazen armour shone; and dreadful more,
 The shaggy crest that swept his father's brow.
 Both parents smiled delighted; and the chief
 Let down the crested terror on the ground;
 Then kiss'd him, played away his infant fears,
 And thus to Jove and all the powers above."

They are all "beautiful exceedingly." Chapman gives strongest of them all, the terror of the child—"then balancing his weight in dancing him," though it has not the conciseness of πάλι τι χροῖν, is perhaps even more picturesque; "and laid aside his fearful helm, that on the earth cast round about it light," for τὴν μὲν κατέθηκεν ἐπὶ χροῖι παμφανόσαν, is very noble. In short, in Chapman's copy, you see the true character of a divine original of the greatest of all the old masters.

Dryden dashes off a somewhat too sketchy copy, but with fine free-flowing lines.

"The pledge of love, and other hope of Troy," is a needless line. The first half of it weak, and the second a repetition of what has been said before. "His unknown father," is a charming touch of Dryden's own, and flashes forth the soul of the sense; "dismissed his burnished helm," is a formality much inferior to the simple original, and he says nothing of it "lying all ashine on the ground;" "the pride of warriors, and the pomp of war," is sad slaving; but the end, with the exception of "hugged," which is not the right word, is excellent. Faulty but not feeble, you still see in the sketch the hand of "Glorious John," and therefore you may purchase it.

Pope's copy is almost as good as the original—to a common judge like Christopher or Nicodemus. The third and fourth lines seem to us perfect—"And Hector hastened to relieve his child," is, you will perceive, taken from Dryden. "Glittering terrors," in line seventh, are the same thing as "beaming helmet" in line eighth, which ought not to have been; and, indeed, Homer knew better than to have said "glittering terrors," a mode of speech the invention of a later day, when poets became impatient of speaking like other people, which Homer never was, nor even Apollo. Still, this copy from Homer by Pope, is a fine cabinet picture, and hangs in the Sanctum.

Perhaps you think Cowper's copy somewhat dim, and perhaps it is; but keep your gaze fixed steadfastly upon it, and the figures will come out upon you a bright and beauteous group. "With a scream," &c. for αὐθιγὴ ἰάχῃ, &c. is the truth most entirely; so is the word "dreadful" for δυνῶς, which we see not in the other copies—"sluggish" is fine; but "crested terror," borrowed from Pope's "glittering terror," is but a poor plagiarism, unworthy of Cowper. "Played away his infant fears," may give the picture to the imagination, but not to the eye; and Homer, you know, through the eye doth here appeal both to the imagination and the heart.

Sotheby's is far from a failure—but it might have been a more distinguished success. "Onward preat," &c. is minuter and more particular than Homer, who is here minute and particular just up to the proper point. "Bright splendour flashed too fierce a light," is not the best of modern English, and has no resemblance to old Greek. "Cast its sweeping shade," is a picturesque particular, but though it might frighten a child, it is not so well adapted for that especial purpose as the circumstance Homer mentions; the scaring, shrieking, (both in themselves good,) come in too late in Sotheby, for Homer, as was right, shews them the very first thing; and we are sorry to see that Sotheby steals the "terror" from Pope, who had just pocketed it from Dryden, and we insist on both pilferers returning the property to the lawful owner—which they may do without being the poorer, he the richer; for after all, it is not better than a Bandana. Yet with these faults, real or imaginary, the copy is a spirited—nay, a splendid one—and speaks of Sotheby.

Look here, before we part, at another picture.

"This said, the heroic sire
Gave him his mother, whose fair eyes fresh streams of love's salt fire
Billowed on her soft cheeks, to hear the last of Hector's speech
In her wish'd comfort. So she took into her odorous breast
Her husband's gift, who, moved to see her heart so much oppress'd,
He dried her tears, and thus desired," &c.

DRYDEN.

" Thus having said :
He first with suppliant hands the gods adored ;
Then to the mother's arms the child restored.
With tears and smiles she took her son and press'd
The illustrious infant to her fragrant breast.
He, wiping her fair eyes, indulg'd her grief,
And eased her sorrows with this last relief."

POPE.

" He spoke, and fondly gazing on her charms,
Restored the pleasing burden to her arms;
Soft on her fragrant breast the babe she laid,
Hushed to repose, and with a smile survey'd ;
The troubled pleasure soon chastised by fear,
She mingled with the smile a tender tear ;
The soften'd chief with kind compassion view'd,
And dried the falling drops, and thus pursued."

COWPER.

" He spake, and to his lovely spouse consigned
The darling boy, with mingled smiles and tears,
She wrapped him in her bosom's fragrant fold ;
And Hector, panged with pity that she wept,
Her dewy cheek strok'd softly, and began."

GILBERT WAKEFIELD.

" This said, he plac'd his infant in the arms
Of his loved wife ; she to her fragrant breast,
Smiling in tears, received it. Pity touch'd
His soul ; he fondly prest her hand and spake."

Here, again, all the Seven are beautiful—from Homer to Gilbert Wakefield, who in general was no great beauty. Chapman, as usual, is intense—and not satisfied with Homer, he must needs translate δακρυῖν γλάσσειν into "fresh streams of love's salt fire hallowed on her soft cheeks," an atrocity deserving death. Still the passage is passionate ; and Chapman having chosen to add "dried her tears," which is not in Homer, (but afterwards in Milton,) almost all the other translators have followed him in this—and, without blame, as there can be no doubt that Hector did dry Andromache's tears with his lips from which "not words alone pleased her," and that without those kisses her heart would have broken.

Dryden is not correct in saying that Hector first "with suppliant hands the gods adored." For Hector had done that already ; but "wiping her fair eyes," is, if not in Homer, Chapmanish and Miltonic, and mighty motherish ; and therefore, "dear child of nature, let them tell," the version is good.

Pope's translation is, in itself, so delightful, that we have no heart to breathe a syllable in its depreciation, dispraise, or disparagement. Yet "fondly gazing on her charms" is not so true to nature, as the simple ἀλγχοις φίλης ἰς χρεὼν ἰδῆται—for Homer, though he knew that Hector felt how beautiful was Andromache at that hour, likewise knew that all the world would know it without being told so, in secula seculorum. "Pleasing burden," is a pleasing expression, and always will be, in spite of its being so very common a one ; but how much better is παῖδ' ἰόν ? "The troubled pleasure soon chastised by fear" is very unhomeric—and though at first hearing it sounds very fine, yet is it essentially faulty ; for observe that the word "troubled" doth of itself necessarily imply in the pleasure the very "fear" which is said soon to chastise it ! (Call not this, we beseech you, O reader ! a verbal criticism, for it strikes at the root of an error originating in the brain that at the time was trying to do the business of the heart.)

Cowper is very tender. "Lovely spouse" is just ἀλγχοις φίλης, "darling boy," is just παῖδ' ἰόν, according to the corresponding spirit of the Greek and English speech ; with "mingled smiles and tears" comes as near to δακρυῖν γλάσσειν as may be, without attempting to give the peculiarity of the expression; "panged with pity" is strongly true for δαίρει; "stroked softly" is right, and καὶ is well changed into "cheek;" "wrapped in her bosom's fragrant folds," is very motherly, and very sweet. In short, though not perfect, the version in spirit is "tender and true."

Sotheby has much of the mellifluousness of Pope, with more of the delightful definiteness of the Homeric touch. He alone gives δακρυῖσι γάλασσιν aright—"smiled in her tears"—literally, "weepingly smiling,"—our version of the two well-matched words. "Kissed her pale cheek" we approve of—since it is written—and therefore the whole is good.

But after all, to give the demon his due, the most Homeric of them all is Gilbert Wakefield. Poor Gilbert! We have by heart one of his affecting confessions in one of his notes. On quoting that famous line—οὐκ ἀριστὺν καὶ ὑπερχοῖν ἡμῖναι ἄλλων—he says, "a maxim imbibed by the writer of this note with such effect, even to the marrow of his soul, to use a bold expression of Euripides, that, could genius and fortune have conspired in his favour, he had owned no superior in literary accomplishment; but circumstances were unfavourable, and nature infused a large portion of cold blood about his heart."

None of the translations have missed Andromache's "fragrant breast," καὶ δὲ γάλαρ; but we know not if any one of them knew why it was fragrant—the sole reason being, as Blackwall somewhere informs us in his rambling Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer, that the Trojan ladies put certain odorous plants or preservatives into their clothe-baskets and chests to save them from the moths!

But we are at the end of our article—which, long as it is, may haply seem not too long, since it overflows with Homer—and ends with the parting of Hector and Andromache.

CHAPMAN.

"O! went his helm, his princess home, half cold with kindly fears,
When every tear it rind' back her looks, and every look shed tears;
Ere shutting Hector's house soon reach'd, her many women there Wept all to a cheer in his late great Hector's funerals were;
Never looked any eye of theirs to see their lord safe home,
Snapt' from the gripe and powers of Greece," &c.

DRYDEN.

"At this, for new replies he did not stay,
But laced his crested helm, and strode away;
His lovely consort to her house return'd,
And looking often back, in silence mourn'd;
Home when she came, her secret woe she vents,
And fills the palace with her loud laments.
Those loud laments her echoing maids restore,
And Hector, yet alive, as dead deplore."

POPE.

"Thus having said, the glorious chief resumes
His towering helmet, black with shading plumes.
His princess parts, with a prophetic sigh—
Unwilling parts, and oft reverts her eye,
That stream'd at every look, then moving slow,
Sought her own palace, and indulg'd her woe.
There, while her tears deplored the godlike man,
Through all the train the soft infection ran:
The pious maids their mingled sorrows shed,
And mourn the living Hector as the dead."

COWPER.

"So saying, the hero to his brows restored
The tufted helmet, and his lovely spouse,
Oft turning as she went, and showering tears
Of tenderest sorrow, left him, as he bade.
Arriving where, the terrible in arms,
Her Hector dwell, with such afflictive moans,

She pierc'd their hearts, that all her numerous train
Mourn'd also; mourning Hecuba, still alive,
In his own palace, as already slain,
For all hope fail'd them of his safe return."

NOTES.

"He spoke; then rais'd from earth and firmly press'd
On his brave brow the helmet's wavy crest.
She homeward went, and slow and sadly past,
Oft turn'd, and turning wept, with woe o'cast.
And now beneath her Hector's proud abode,
Tears of deep grief from all around her flow'd,
One woe is all, while all alike deplor'd
In his own home, as dead, their living lord,
Who ne'er, they deem'd, escap'd the battle plain,
Would look on his lov'd wife and home again."

Dryden says, that Homer is "much more capable of exciting the manly passions than those of grief and pity." Are grief and pity not manly passions? Ay that they are, whether in heroic or Christian hearts. Homer had power given to him over them all; and he knew when and where to touch them—the proper place and the proper time—and the key to which each heart-chord responded in terror or in tears. Mighty masters of emotion as were in a later age the three tragedians, neither Æschylus, Sophocles, nor Euripides in that power transcended Homer. But Homer seldom puts that power forth; for it is not the prime end of the epic, as it is of the tragic, to purge the soul by pity and terror. "Homer," Dryden says again falsely, "was ambitious enough of moving pity, for he has attempted twice, on the same subject of Hector's death; first, when Priam and Hecuba beheld his corpse, which was dragged after the chariot of Achilles; and then in the lamentation which was made over him, when his body was redeemed by Priam; and the same persons again bewail his death, with a chorus of others to help the cry. But if this last excite compassion in you, as I doubt not but it will, you are more obliged to the translator than the poet, (he alludes here to Congreve!)" for Homer, as I have observed before, can move rage better than he can pity." Dryden uttered this sad stuff, we suspect, because he was the translator of Virgil. Now Virgil's pathos is certainly more profuse than Homer's—but it is not so profound; although, as certainly, it is more characteristic of his delightful genius. Pope, too, in deference perhaps to Dryden, has observed, "that pity and the softer passions are not of the nature of the Iliad." Wood, the author of the Descriptions of Polynra and Balbeck, in his Essay on the Original Genius and Writings of Homer, remarks well on this; that Pope might have said that they "are not of the character of Homer's manners. Yet when they are introduced amidst the terrors of death and slaughter, the contrast is irresistible; and a tender scene in the Iliad, like a cultivated spot in the Alps, derives new beauties from the horrors which surround it." Well said Wood. But you say not so well, when you go on to say, "should I presume to see a fault in this admired picture, it is one that falls not upon the poet but his manner; and may help to explain my ideas on this matter. Andromache having raised our pity and compassion to the utmost stretch that tragedy can carry those passions—Hector answers and concludes Ἄλλ' ὅς σε δάκρυ ἰδύμεν, &c. His meaning here was to divert Andromache's attention to other objects, and the expression was meant to convey the utmost tenderness; but has it that effect upon us? Is not the English reader offended at a certain indelicacy in those words which Homer puts into the mouth of an affectionate husband to his wife? A certain indelicacy forsooth! No—the English reader is not offended—nor the Scotch reader either—nor yet the Irish; for there is no indelicacy, but all is beautiful and Bible-like—wiltch, dear reader, you will feel to-morrow—for it is the Sabbath—so farewell!

"Ἦ καὶ ἴσας ταῖς πάντα μέλει, γύναι"

EDINBURGH ELECTION.

We modern Athenians, with our unfinished Approach and Parthenon, and with our finished pride and presumption, have of course the loftiest opinion of ourselves among all mortal creatures, and are constantly seen by our introverted mental eyes towering conspicuous, mountain-like, over all the other nations of the earth dwindled into molehills. On us, and on our altitude, all the regards of all those pigmy peoples are at all times uplifted and concentrated; we are the cyrenosure of the extensive neighbourhood of the universe. Our literature, our philosophy, our poetry, our politics, our patriotism, are all transcendental and supermundane; and no wonder, therefore, that the genius of Scotland vainly attempts to hide her head among the stars. There it shines lustrous and more lustrous in that transparent ether; on clear nights it might be mistaken for the moon, but for the multum-in-parvo superiority of its lustre; Hesperus has too much good sense to compete with its radiance; and as for Lucifer, shorn of his beams, he winks in presence of a luminary prouder and brighter than ever he was, even before the revolt in Heaven.

As Pope's Homer says,

"The conscious swains, exulting in the sight,
Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light."

"Conscious swains" here mean mankind—"blue vault" is the world—"useful light" Scotland; and we

put it to you if a finer picture can easily be imagined than that of the whole inhabitation "exulting in the sight" of that one "bright particular star," perfectly fixed—yet harmoniously uniting within itself the elsewhere incompatible attributes of planet, comet, and meteor, except on those occasions when it would seem absolutely to be "another sun risen on mid-day."

Let this image suffice for the present to shew our perpetual sense of our national supereminence. We are aware, at the same time, that Scotland has often been laughed at by the "conscious swains," when the moods of their own minds have been wearied of admiration; and that in sudden revulsions of feeling, they have not scrupled not only to regard us with evil eyes, but to bestow upon us some very scurvy epithets. We confess that we are unwilling to lay much emphasis on the term "scurvy;" willing to lay less on the term "itch;" anxious to overlook entirely the term "sulphur;" and earnest to forget that there is such a word in the language as "brimstone," or such a disease in "man, in nature, and in human life," as that to which it has often, we shall not say with what propriety, been applied;—but still the fact itself we cheerfully admit, that the "conscious swains," and more especially such of them as rejoice in the name of Englishmen, not unfrequently within the last quarter of a century, and sometimes before it, while they have been "eyeing the blue vault," instead of "blessing our useful light," have been in the habit of swearing that it was both dim and disastrous—encircled, in short, with a halo of Scotch mist, quite sufficient to wet an Englishman to the skin, and involving this our northern hemisphere in a perpetual dizzle, through which we raw-boned Scotsmen, though in reality of mere mortal dimensions, see each other standing like trees, or in the deceptive atmosphere moving to and fro like a race of giants.

Both views, thus taken of us by others, and by ourselves, are just; for a greater mistake cannot be than to suppose that truth lies in the middle point between two extremes. It lies alternately in each extreme, passing imperceptibly from one to the other—for eye never saw thought, though it sees the flight of an arrow. Thus the mind that oscillates, never does more, at the best, than momentarily touch truth; at the worst, which is the most frequent case, it misses truth altogether; for truth, which is an "extravagant and erring spirit," is at the one extreme, while the oscillator is at the other; and thus the poor pendulum keeps swinging to and fro for ever, without perhaps once coming into contact with the capricious charmer.

Let no man, therefore, as he values his temporal and eternal welfare and wellbeing, regulate his political, philosophical, or religious creed and conduct by that unhappy heathen rule, "in medio tutissimus ibis." The mean, ignorantly called golden, is but gilt—'tis a mere plated article, unfit for this Magazine. In politics, especially, the mean—the brazen mean—is worst of all—and they are fools, if not knaves, who follow it. In bold and bright Britain, shame on all trembling trimmers; let us have—friends and foes—all true men. The trimmers draw themselves up, like cowards as they are, on a "hill retired," and there they keep prating and palavering away of peace all the while the two great armies are engaged in battle, waiting till they see one host or another reel with bloody "barred gored," that then the traitors may rally under the victorious and main region of our speech." We were approving, on principle, of the very different lights in which the "conscious swains," especially the English, at different times regard our national character—and we now say, the character of Maga as its representative. They see in her an Angel of Light, or a Demon of Darkness—and she is both—but neither long. Were she always an Angel of Light, we are persuaded that her circulation would be gradually narrowed within the limits of religion—were she always a Demon of Darkness, subscribers would fall off in superstitious fear, and contributors baseerch shelter even in the Balaam Box. But Maga, by an alternation true to nature, of Angel and Demon, "we verily believe, promotes her sale;" and thus though neither fit for Heaven nor its antipodes, continues to rule the roast on earth, a tower of strength to the Tories, and of terror to the Whigs, till periodical literature and periodical revolutions shall be no more—till the Examiner shut his eye, because there is nothing to examine—the Spectator shake his head, to think what has become of all the shifting scenes on the stage of Life—the Atlas cease to support the Globe—the sightless Courier of the air be as motionless as any Morning or Evening Post—the Standard turtled for ever—the rosy-fingered Herald of the morn gone to chaos and old night—all Chronicles swept into oblivion, and the evil spirits of the Times for ever laid in the dead sea of eternity.

But not till then—shall we cease to be the scourge or knout of the Whigs. We, the Incomparable Christopher—She, the Matchless Maga—as We and She blush to hear Ourselves universally denominated—We, the Socrates—and She, the Aspasia of the Modern Athens. Yes—the Modern Athens. Our modesty never could have so christened Edinburgh, nor our second-sight have discerned the similitude between the two illustrious cities. But the learned Theban south of the Tweed saw, we shall not say the resemblance, but the identity; and from the baptismal font in the Castle-cliff, close beneath the "kittle-stanes," priest-like they laved the water on Edina's broad

But we are forgetting ourselves, and permitting fancy to waft us away on her wings from the "haunt and lofty forehead, and in the presence of innumerable godfathers and godmothers, all religiously anxious to vow themselves to the guardianship of her spiritual welfare, gave an immortal name to the Queen of the North, who now "proudly flings her white arms to the sea," and at sunset and sunrise, blazes, a cloudlike apparition, among her unconquered mountains.

In return for their complimentary kindness, what have we done to the Southrons? Heathen'd their metropolis the Modern Babylon! No, England! "thou can'st not say I did it," 'Twas done by "Moody Madness, laughing wild—amidst severest woe." We never nicknamed London, it being "a thing so majestic." That dissyllable sounds magnificently in our ears—so does the Thames, like the sea. But Cobbett called it—"The Wen." In his eyes it seems a large excrescence from the Body Politic—far heavier and more hideous than that—though it weighed fifty-six pounds—(now a separate and independent preservation)—which lately hung from the stomach of that poor Chinese, smiling to the last, who gently "sank" (what a sweet word for "died!") under the tender hearts and scientific hands of his executioners, blindly anxious, poor Tiffed-Pow! to be relieved—at any risk—from his overgrown metropolis! True, that we pointed to one Plague-Spot—called Cockaigne—sallow symptom of the sweating sickness. But not in scorn—in sympathy; and, fearless of the infectious matter, we knocked out the pus from the purulent part of the patient—yes, even with the knout—and lo! London, restored to her pristine sanity, walks stately along her bridges, and—not ungrateful to her wise Physician and sagacious Surgeon—breathes again the bold breezes that come joyously up with the foaming tide a-tumble from the Nore.

All this may be very fine, and perhaps not wholly unamusing; but it may be hinted that it helps us no great way on towards our intended political article, the Edinburgh Election. True; but these our prefatory paragraphs may probably put the Pensive Public into good-humour; and, as the subject is susceptible of considerable irritation, we are not without hopes that, in our treatment of it, people will imitate our example, and keep their tempers, which are by far too good things to be thrown away, and when lost, not likely to be recovered before another dissolution of Parliament.

But the prime object of this prelude has been to conciliate the favour of our readers south of the Tweed. The time was when Maga was supposed to breathe too much of her birthplace,—when the honey that distilled from her lips was accused of having always a heather-taste;—when, in short, it was unscrupulously said, that she whose feet were beautiful on the mountains, smelt too much of the shop—that is, of Scotland. The reproach that — "She narrow'd her mind,

And to Scotland gave up what was meant for mankind,"

has been long wiped away from her character; and, indeed, of late years Maga has been perhaps too much of a Cosmopolite. A leading article about Edina, therefore, seems to be required for the redemption of her nationality—a prejudice, or rather a virtue, essential to all living worth.

The city of Edinburgh sends one representative to Parliament; and, by our present constitution, the members of the Town Council are the electors. Two candidates for that honour appeared—Robert Adam Dundas, Esquire, of Whiterigg, and Francis Jeffrey, Esquire, the Lord Advocate for Scotland. Like honest and independent men, they elected the first of these gentlemen; and hence a howl of Whig and Radical rage, savage as if Wombwell's caravans had let loose over the city their awkward squads of laughing hyenas, growling bears, roaring lions, chattering monkeys, screeching macaws, and, loud above all, the lowing thunder of that surprising animal, the bonassus. Such another hubbub we do not remember to have heard, since one day in Paris about forty years ago, not very long before the murder of the king.

The Town Council elected the man whose political principles they approved, in preference to the man whose political principles they condemned; and for having done so, they have been brutally abused by a tyrannical jumbo, and their slavish tools, as traitors to their king, their country, and their conscience. They have been true to all three; and should this be the last exercise of their highest privilege, they will have, while they live, the satisfaction of knowing that they did their duty, in scorn of many formidable dangers, brandished in their faces by mobs and demagogues, as ferocious and as iniquitous as ever scowled and howled the first threatenings of revolution.

Who, asked all the lower orders of the Whigs and Radicals—is Mr Robert Adam Dundas? That, we answer, was no business of theirs; they had nothing in the world to do with him or his concerns; with the rights of the electors, or with the exercise of those rights. Not to be known by such persons, does not surely “argue oneself unknown;” and it is one recommendation in favour of any candidate to begin with, that his name should never have been heard or remembered by the pack that gave tongue in that canine outery.

Who and what Mr Robert Adam Dundas is, was already well known to thousands of the respectable citizens of Edinburgh, and to those who did not know, but wished and were entitled to be told, the answer was as easy as the question—and most satisfactory to every honourable mind, whatever might be the political creed of the interrogator. Mr Dundas is unwearied to the late member for the city; and has been for some years in Parliament for Ipswich. He there successfully stood a contested election against Major Torrens, we believe—one of the political economists—who must surely be dead—and on the hustings distinguished himself by great presence of mind, great readiness of talent, and great strength of character. In Parliament he proved himself an able, attentive, and useful member—and on the debate on the Bill, spoke well on the side of the Constitution. He is known, in short, by all here who are not determined to shut their eyes and their ears against all merit in their political opponents, young and old alike, to be a person of good family, good fortune, good education, good talents, good manners, good morals, good business habits, and good principles—and worthy, therefore, to represent the city of Edinburgh in Parliament.

Good principles—ay, there comes the rub. Good principles, in the opinion of all that great part of the population of Scotland that belongs to what we shall now take the liberty of calling the Conservative Order—Bad principles, in the opinion of that likewise great part of the population of Scotland that belongs to what we shall take the liberty of calling (with certain limitations to be afterwards attended to) the Revolutionary Faction. All the first, therefore, desired his election; all the last would have moved heaven and earth—and another region—to prevent it. They did move some districts of the second and third—but ineffectually; and though the Lord Advocate lost his election, as yet we see no frowns on the face of the first.

Mr Dundas being in himself—personally—thus worthy of the honour to which he aspired—and admitted to be so by all those in the ranks of his political opponents, who know how to judge of the character of a gentleman—and they are many—and in distinct terms by the Lord Advocate himself; this contest was in no one point whatever distinguished from any other between the two great parties in the state. Each party—on the one hand Tory, and on the other Whig—Reformer and Anti-reformers—or say rather, Friends “of the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill,” and Foes to the Bill, in that its obstinate resistance to all alteration in its principle—and, indeed, also in its details—each party, it is plain, was resolved to do its best (and one of these—which we need not say—its worst) to carry the day;—and now, therefore, from this little sunny knoll, shaded by a single tree, let us look over the city, and, like philosophers as we are—though not, perhaps, without the partialities and prejudices of men—sitting in the calm, decide on the merits of the principles and practice of the conflicting parties, as exhibited before, during, and after that election, at least in the ears of us Modern Athenians.

“Whereof all Europe rings from side to side,”

In the first place, the canine outcry against Mr Dundas, as an unknown stranger, was kept up by many of the pack—the cross-bred curs called yelpers—till their tongues lolled out of their mouths, and they were fain to quench their thirst in the gutters. His character being free from all taint or stain,* even the most rabid dared not to calumniate it. His gentlemanly manners, and his intelligent mind, pleased all the electors whom he canvassed; nor, among them, did the bitterest of his political opponents behave towards him otherwise than with courtesy; but part of the press ventured of course to scribble about him, with their usual insolence, and occasionally, we believe, also to compliment him, jibingly, on certain personal points, of which they, indeed, must be the very nicest judges. No great harm in all this, surely; for, though at first their liberties were not unloathsome, they became at last merely ludicrous; and their lubrications “fit audience found though few,” in the retired shades of the Pozzi.

But finding nothing they could successfully attack in the character of the candidate, a person of excellent performance and high promise, they turned with all their fury on his family, and loaded the name of Dundas with all the vulgar varieties of execration. With too many who ought to have spurned the slaves, such wretched ravings were, we are sorry to say it, not altogether unacceptable—while to the palates of not a few they were even as marrow and as fat—and they smacked their lips as they gorged the greasy offal. That in Scotland—in Edinburgh—there are many honourable men on principle opposed to the policy that has for many years regulated the public conduct of the members of that distinguished family, all the world knows; and they must always be the political enemies of every one belonging to the house of Arnlston. It is well that it should be so; and from all such Mr Dundas must have been prepared to meet with the most uncompromising and inveterate hostility. But what shall we say for the forgetful, or ungrateful, or temporizing crew, who have not only deserted their benefactors, and the benefactors, in a thousand things, of their country and its metropolis, but turn upon them viperously, and sting the hands that fostered them and their families through a long period of time, when, but for the Dundasses, they would have been trodden down under the feet of an unsparing faction? And, setting all these personal considerations aside, what shall we say for them, who, looking abroad over this City of Palaces—for, contrasted with what it was thirty years ago, it is a City of Palaces—and over our beautiful country, “made blithe with plough and harrow,” and benefited in its agriculture, its manufactures, and its commerce, by none of its native statesmen in such measure as by the great Lord Melville—and great he was, and great they called him, when alive to hear their worship—because the stream seems to be waxing strong in favour of that party who were the sworn foes of himself and of his house, have now the audacity to charge a candidate for the representation of Edinburgh with the crime of being a collateral descendant of that illustrious patriot? Such baseness, we know, is despised and abhorred even by the Whigs themselves, while they employ, or suffer, the services of the worthless instruments. And what honest man respects not the enlightened character—public and private—of the present Lord Melville? What honest man denies that he has had always at heart the good of Scotland, and successfully promoted it? The integrity of the late member for the city—Mr William Dundas—was always beyond suspicion—nor did he ever cease, to the best of his excellent abilities, to promote every measure that, in his opinion, was calculated to benefit Scotland. These men, and others of the family, belonged, and belong, it is true, to the Tory party; and by the Whigs let their political principles be impugned now as vehemently as heretofore; but let no Tories join the cry, either loud or low, or directly or indirectly encourage it by a shew of approval or indifference, for at such a crisis there is no distinction between a trimmer and a traitor.

But why, on such an occasion, speak only of—or to—Whig—and Tories? Such is not our wish. We speak to the citizens of Edinburgh, and to the men of Scotland; and we say—not leaving all political opinions out of view—for on such an occasion that would be indeed most outrageously absurd—but giving to conscientious differences of opinion—deep and lasting as we know they are, and which we assuredly desire not to see extinguished or confused—full and free scope and play, in practice as well as principle—allowing to all men expression of them to the utmost verge even of such license as must always prevail during a season of political excitement—as cheerfully granting all this to the opponents of Mr Dundas, as they, we hope, are willing to grant it to his supporters—we then say, that the hubbub and hullabaloo that have been for weeks echoing and reverberating through our lanes and closes, from the hole-and-corner committees of tag-rag-and-bobtail against the very name of our member, howled as they have been by the rabble-rout, are disgraceful to the city—as long as that Figure stands on the Monument in St Andrew's Square, erected by gratitude in lasting memory of the dead; and that all who like or fear that hideous vociferation, are bound in consistency to call a public meeting, and propose to the citizens that that statue shall be pulled down, and that pillar prostrated, and not a vestige left there of any memorial of Melville. There would not be wanting apostate and renegade miscreants among the ingrates to go with pick and shovel to work. But before it comes to that, we must bridle these operatives, and it shall not be with a snaffle, but a curb.

The Lord Advocate entered the field personally a few days after Mr Dundas. All along that side of the course on which Mr Dundas was to run (for the City-Plate—one heat) had been dug treacherous pitfalls, and strewn thickets of thorns and furze, which it was expected would either cause him to bolt, or be distanced; while the turf on his Lordship's side was smooth as a shaven lawn, and in fine order for a daisy-cutter. Even before the riders mounted, the crowd had ~~demanded the prize~~; and during the race one could hardly see the joggling and spurring, for the moving mass of vociferation that shut out all view of the goal. At the distance-post, you might have covered them with a sheet. On reaching the ropes, his lordship seemed to be making a little lee-way; when about fifty yards from home he began to swerve—and at the judges' stand he was beat by three good lengths, though certainly in any thing but a canter.

But to speak less sportingly, the whole Whig party, with all their collected craft, and united intrigue, sought to drive Mr Dundas off the field, by intimidating the Council. All fair means were employed for that purpose, and all foul—the fan, we would fain believe, by the Lord Advocate and his personal and political friends, the foul by the lowest of his unhired and undesired adherents. The foul consisted, among other legitimate appliances, of the most unbounded and exaggerated panegyrics on his Lordship's genius, talents, learning, virtues, and patriotism. Never before had the world seen such a man. In literature as well as in law, in philosophy as well as in politics, he was Nature's paragon. To oppose him appeared to be absolutely impious; the folly of such opposition was lost in its wickedness; and the "universal Edinburgh Whig-nation" set up as their idol and worshipped it—execrating all who refused to do so as heretics—the distinguished ex-editor of the Edinburgh Review.

Now, that Mr Jeffrey—allow us to call him by a name justly celebrated—is a person of brilliant and various talents, of the highest professional eminence, and most estimable and delightful in private life—we, who are not among the number of his idolaters, feel the sincerest satisfaction in declaring, if not in such elegant language, we hope with at least as clear an understanding as even the Deacon of the Tailors. The Deacons, indeed, of no fewer than Eleven Corporations memorialized the Town Council in eulogy of Mr Jeffrey's incomparable literary powers and acquirements, which seemed justly to have excited their admiration and astonishment. They have now rashly given, we think, their sanction to all his critical dicta; and Wordsworth and Southey, and many a hapless scribe beside, must veil their faces before the Bonnetmakers —blush deep before the Dyers—and, as they value a sound skin, offer no resistance to the Hammermen. The Eleven are all delighted with his literature, and virtually declare, that without elegant literature, no man ought to represent in Parliament the metropolis of the nation of gentlemen. Whatever else he may be, he must be a critic. One of the Eleven speaks of “the eminent services he has rendered his country,”—without thinking it necessary to enter into any details—leaving the Council to establish the general principle by an induction of particular facts. And others speak of him—as we observe he did t’other day of himself at Perth—as having been for many years the firm and consistent friend of reform. We observe, however, that considerable caution is observed by most of the memorialists in speaking of Mr Jeffrey’s political writings; we know not whether because they are not so familiar with them as with his purely literary labours, or because their light has been dimmed or extinguished in that other brighter lustre.

Meanwhile were held meetings of what were called—if we mistake not—the inhabitants—or citizens of Edinburgh; at which Highland laird and Lowland loon declaimed away in panegyric on the Friend of the People, in all sorts of styles—the business-like and acute matter-of-fact or no-matter-of-fact of the leading lawyer—the prolix prosiness of the fast superannuating young pleader at the side-bar—the unswallowable prescriptions of formal physician, contrary to all use and wont of the craft, embodied in nautical slang, picked up apparently in Cockaigne—the rhodomontade of half-pay officer, buckled up to the black stock, in a blue surtout, by no means rough in the pile—and the raving of Dunne-wasal from the mountain, which we should not fear to back at odds against any bit of insanity, of equal length, from any cell in Bedlam.

That most influential of all bodies, too, the Edinburgh Political Union, like a clocking hen, gathered its chickens under its wings—most of which were shivering in the pip—and amidst much chuckling, there was a sound uttered by one cock, which with some passed current for crowing, but which seemed to our ears—we but heard the echo—about as senseless a scraunch as ever disturbed a dunghill. We are far, however, from meaning any disrespect to the Political Union, which, though laughed at by all but its members, and we must believe by many too even of them, and the most childish of all nurseries for radicals in daidle or dotage, we cannot help liking—while, on other grounds, we have much esteem for more than one of its members. The newspaper editors here do not patronise it, and under their scowl what flower, however fair, will not wither? For our own parts, we should wish to see it more prosperous, which it never can be till it is commonly consistent; for such is their power of miscellaneous swallow, that the Unionists strenuously recommended the Town-Council to elect Mr Jeffrey—in furtherance, we presume, of the political objects which it is the beginning and will be the end of their own existence to promote—short Parliaments and vote by ballot—these being the two measures which Mr Jeffrey has lately set his face against most frowningly, and pledged himself to oppose, as pregnant with confusion and ruin to all regular and established government.

The Edinburgh Political Union, too, holds fast, it would appear, by the skirts of Mr Jeffrey’s creed in its literary faith; and one young gentleman, as learned as he is facetious, delighted the assemblage by a wonderful—nay, almost a miraculous tale of his having absolutely—and bonâ fide—with his own eyes—and no deception—seen translations into the French tongue or the German, we forget which, of certain extracts from articles of Mr Jeffrey’s in the Edinburgh Review, in the hands of the Monks of St Bernard, who gloated over them with greedier eyes than did ever priest over virgin kneeling at the confessional!

The young, and indeed also the middle-aged and old Modern Athenians, have got a ready knack of making themselves publicly ridiculous, by binding themselves into small knots—bouquets, where a few fresh flowers are sometimes mingled with those that have long been faded, and with weeds that were better dead—and thus flaunting themselves abroad on the eye of our little world here, which is as ready with its admiration of any thing new to-day, as it is with its contempt to-morrow. At present, no individual can be sufficiently obscure or absurd to be entitled to a denial of admission into any Society, Union, or Club—literary or political—of which one object is to promote the cause of Reform. Every prig and puppy who, from prating habits, supposes he has a voice, wishes that it may be heard by the ministry, and the nation, and the king—and must in some place or other, so public as to be at least out of his papa's house, make a speech, to be foisted into some newspaper, mutilated and in great affliction. If the young Demosthenes has not had sufficient strollings on Leith or Portobello sands, with some chucky-stones in his mouth, he confines himself to writing, and adds his signature to a requisition. It gratifies us to see that the Six-Fect Club have kept themselves aloof from this folly—though Lord Errol's body-guard—and henceforth, in our eyes, they will seem to hold their heads higher than ever.

The Whigs of Scotland have their headquarters, of course, in Edinburgh; and numbering among them some men of great, and many men of considerable abilities, ready enough with tongue and pen, though tongue be their more powerful weapon, which they keep wagging indefatigably in pursuance of all political purposes, however apparently insignificant—you may imagine, if you can, the shout set up on this occasion, by so many active agents, in honour of their Great Sultan. Pipes and trumpets (they can be purchased for a penny) were never for a moment silent, and the pigmies who played upon them conceived themselves musicians. Even the "God-help-you-silly-ones" of the set, bestirred themselves surprisingly; and still the cheep was, "A Jeffrey! a Jeffrey!" from the beaks of the tiniest bantams. The newspaper press, with almost the exceptions alone of the always stanch and spirited Evening Post, and the now right-thinking and judicious Advertiser, kept up a ceaseless, though often ill-directed fire of paper pellets of panegyric on the man of the people; and thus, on the day of election, Mr Jeffrey had really much need of a slave to keep whispering into his ear, "Remember, O Francis! that thou art mortal!"

In all this, it is too plain almost to bear mention, that nothing was heard but the expression of the opinion of the Whig party through all its restless organs; yet had that party the audacity to declare, and some of them the folly to believe—for the delusions of unprincipled and self-conceited weakness are incredible—that it was the voice of the whole city, nay, of the entire nation!

Had the party been satisfied with such vain-glorious assumptions and assertions, their behaviour had been worthy but of laughter; but while they thus raised their idol to the skies, they strove to sink all who would not worship it into the dust—after having bedaubed one and all of them over with filth that flies filthier from the hands that hurl it. With several of the newspapers there was but one general rule, without any exceptions. Every man who opposed the Bill was a fool, or knave, or both; the abusive, but somewhat vague, epithet "boroughmongers" being first applied to them all—they were pictured as all wallowing in political profligacy and corruption; and this language was, with all the familiar insolence of low-born and lower-bred apostates, levelled not against this or that individual, whose conspicuous talent or integrity might have made him a mark for their mire—for the calumniators we allude to are the obscurest dastards—but against all those classes of citizens whose opinions they knew to be adverse to such a plan of Reform as blunders in the three bills—with the principles and details of which these starveling scribes are at this moment as ignorant as they are of the meaning of the simplest Latin sentence they have ever misquoted. We allude not now to any of the long-established and consistent papers—such, for example, as the Scotaman, which has all along advocated the same principles, and is entitled now to advocate them more strongly than ever—nor to the Observer, which, though its politics be too moderate for our taste, is edited by a scholar and gentleman—but chiefly to those apostate upstarts, that from Tories, high or low, have become Whig or Radical. Into their columns communications are constantly admitted, of which their reputed editor, men of character, if they ever think of the past, must be in their hearts, and on their faces, most painfully ashamed. Of the Electors, supposed to be in the interest of Mr Dundas, some wretched ingrates have lately written "with a libellous quill, ludicrously quivering to the apprehension of the law; and with the most brutal threats they have at times kept mingling the most nauseous flatteries, as if on wiping their slaver from his sleeve, any honest man could think it worth his while to consider whether it had been spat in the drivel of fear or favour. Seemed you but to shew to their bleared eyes but one single solitary symptom of being like themselves, an apostate, and the shout in a moment would have been, "hail goodfellow well-met, we are all Friends of Freedom." Had it been but suspected that you were even candid to the claims of Mr Dundas, you would have been set down instantly and thenceforth as a corruptionist.

But this was but a small part of the policy of the Billmen. They kept threatening the electors who should vote for Mr Dundas with vengeance, and pointed their fingers at them in the face of a populace, whose their base and brutal arts had exasperated and infuriated; and warned them, "but with no friendly voice," that if blood were shed—which probably it would be—if the people were defrauded of their right to the Lord Advocate—for it seems his Lordship is their natural or acquired property—that it would lie at their doors, and for ever stain their thresholds. No more savage system of intimidation ever raged in Paris under the sway of the Jacobins, than that which was transacted here—on a small scale indeed—against all those respectable citizens who were supposed to be in the interest of the "corrupt candidate," forsooth—a man, like his fathers before him, and all his race, of the highest and most stainless honour, equal to that of the Lord Advocate himself, and far superior indeed to that of many, if not most, or all of his noisiest agents and supporters.

People living in a prodigious place like London, can have no notion of the power of political personal persecution in a small spot like Edinburgh. One of a million and a half of inhabitants, what the deuce need you care for an angry buzz, here and there, at a few points of the immense and enormous hive? In your own cell you are secure—and make or eat your own honey, without caring either for grones or workers. Seldom or never does a long lank wasp force his way beneath the lintel of your skep, and threaten to sting you to death, unless you suffer him to rummage at will in the interior, and to convert your balmy store into poison. We mean by a long lank wasp, neither more nor less than a ferocious political agent of some fine or thin-skinned candidate, who darkens the doors of your domicile daily till he finds you in the dumps or dismals, and wrings or rugs your vote out of your conscience; and then leaves you naked of principles, and covered with promises, as sorry a sight as may be seen in a summer's day. Bribery and corruption, we doubt not, are plentiful as blackberries in London; but her citizens of credit and renown, during times of political ferment, in the exercise of their elective franchise, are seldom, if ever, we believe, exposed to an organized system of merciless persecution, whose ministers haunt their daily and nightly life, and threaten, if they withstand it, to cut them off from fire and water. Nay, such political persecution is not, we verily believe, in England at all; she has no such tyrants—no such slaves. But Scotland, small and savage, (start not at our seemingly inconsistent speech,) has many of both breeds—or rather, here many Whig tyrants do sometimes, on such occasions, prevail over a few Tory slaves, and, with liberty on their lips, affix to the limbs of their victims, irons that eat into the bone—and into the soul. It needs rare strength of mind to stand out against such devilry;imps swarm round your very hearth, and Satan himself, in the figure of a tall man in black, or perhaps in blue, with cord breeches and top-boots, assails you on your threshold, over which you have neglected to nail a demon-driving horseshoe. The lost elector goes to bed dazed in despair, and, waking early in the morning, shivers to feel that he is no longer an lowest man;—for that he “has sold to brass what gold could never buy.” Never anywhere in small and savage Scotland, had the political persecutor been abroad, with the bootikins and the thumbikins that crush the heart, in such truculence as in Edinburgh on this Election. Men’s wives were tampered with—we mean their fears and their loves for their own husbands; and small families of children—consisting, perhaps, each of about a dozen—in silence or in squall beseeched daddy to vote for the Lord Advocate, that they might see his Bill. It must have happened that the elector who had resolved to vote according to his conscience, did, in some instances, begin to doubt if he were human—and not a misbegotten and almost anonymous monster. What! shall seventeen citizens presume to set up their private or public opinion against seventeen or seventy thousand? Are they wiser in their generation than all the Eleven Corporations, each with a distinguished Deacon at its head? If they think so—why then they are fools—if they do not think so—but vote against the man of the people—then they are knaves; but whether fools or knaves, or both, let them cut their cozen’d consciences, and come over, and then the city shall celebrate their names in annual pomps, instead of tramps hawking them, as now, about the streets in opprobrious ballads.

That seventeen citizens—for such proved to be the amount—should suppose themselves sufficiently capacious to contain the wisdom of seventeen or even of seventy thousand, does, indeed, at first hearing, seem not a little presumptuous, and such self-conceit appears not undeserving of reproof, or even punishment. But, on consideration, ‘tis not more unreasonable than for seventeen or seventy thousand to blow their stomachs up with the windy belief that they are continent of the lore of at least a million. On the lowest computation there must be some million Anti-Reformers and Moderate Reformers—Tories—within the four seas; and while they come to the relief of the presumptuous seventeen, they do not hesitate for a moment to knock the breath out of the bellies of the inco-lent seventeen thousand, till you think you hear the bursting of all the bladders in the island. This is the only logical mode of putting the question—and exposes, it will be seen, the Whigs of Edinburgh, whatever may be their numbers, when in a state of fancied security to castigation, which it would be equally disagreeable to hear as to see, and indeed odious alike to all the senses. A few grains of modesty, therefore, might not be amiss to relieve their swollen stomachs—and so save them from the necessity of having recourse to medicine “made of sterner stuff,” which would waste them to shadows.

The same logic applies strictly to the question of honesty. That any seventeen citizens should have more honesty than seventeen or seventy thousand, we should hope—without selection—for the honour of human nature, is unlikely: though it will be granted that it is certain there must be among them less dishonesty;—but then, again, what can the amount be of the honesty of such a mere trifle of men, as seventeen or seventy thousand, in comparison with that of some millions? And by what powers of the differential calculus might La Place himself, were he now alive, work out the result, in that more than “irreducible case,”—if you will allow us to confuse geometry and algebra,—where the thousands happen to be Whigs, and the millions Tories?

And this brings us back, with a beautiful airy motion, like that of a glad bird on full-imp’d wing floating through the sunshine homeward to its native tree—back to the tower of Toryism, the stronghold of truth. The seventeen electors uttered the voice of the friends—the fourteen electors uttered the voice of the foes—we use the words in a political sense—of their native land. Look at the Scotch counties—listen to the speeches of such men as Sir George Murray and Sir George Clerk, and compare their eloquent speeches with such dismal drivel as the attempt of that apparent imbecile, Sir John Dalrymple, t’other day, at our County Meeting, or with such inflammatory Radicalism as that of Mr Maxwell—though he is a man of talents, accomplishments, and worth, the more's the pity he so should speak—and then dare to talk of the intelligence of all the Counties, as well as of the Boroughs, being in favour of the abortion.

What, then, was the real meaning of this audacious and profligate demand and command, that the seventeen should elect the Lord Advocate? Risum teneatis?—That the Tory power should lower its banners to the Whig, without a blow, deliver up its camp, and be marched, bound two and two, under the yoke. Unstomachable insolence! bespeaking tyranny that had suddenly lost its senses, in its supposed escape from a long life of servitude!

Let us tie down these idiot Whig despots to the iron prison-bed they had prepared for us Tory kings, and administer to them some of their own intended discipline. Do they say, that in all cases—everywhere else as well as in Edinburgh—where a celebrated man of sixty opposes an uncelebrated man of thirty—he shall be elected by them, Tory, in preference to Whig? Cashier Mr Kennedy then, though he is fat, fair, and forty—and elect CHRISTOPHER NORTH. Do they say, that in every contest for city or county, the political principles of the candidates must by their respective friends be set aside, and nothing be considered but talent, or the reputation of talent, or the glory of grizzled hair? Do they say, that nothing else shall be considered, in addition, but the voice of the majority, though that majority be composed entirely of their own political foes? Bah! They would bluster till they were black in the face to bring in, in opposition to Sir Walter Scott—Mr Robert Hunter!

If not—let them commence their career—and, out of courtesy, the Tories will follow them on their grand discovery of a new patriotism. Let them work a miracle before our no longer incredulous eyes, and when they have the black and white balls in their own hands, send to Parliament half a score, or half a dozen, or even one old, eloquent, ingenuous, and amiable Tory—the brilliant counterpart of Mr Jeffrey—in preference to a young, tongue-tied, undeveloped, and sulky Whig—the cloudy counterpart of Sir John Dalrymple —and then we shall confess that their practice is consistent with their profession—that the world must be very near its end—and that there will be no loud laughing even for the Times' reporter in Parliament, on a motion by Mr Perceval for a general fast.

Political principles, forsooth! reform! What do these useless words of a few unmeaning syllables signify, when genius is in the field, arrayed in his golden helmet and resplendent arms. Blow, heralds! blow! clear the way, cavaliers!—for lo “star-bright his head appears,” and the wide welkin of Scotland is torn with one national shout that hails the glorious advance of—Sir Walter Scott. There is a Knight of the Shire! His “European reputation” is even equal to that of the illustrious Ex-Editor of the Edinburgh Review. Yet hear it, ye Whigs, and give ear, O thou radical, “the foremost man of all this world” is assailed by culprits you cherish, with a dismal hiss, the sound of public scorn! Return him to Parliament! No! Rather than that it should have his vote, not a Whig, or Whigling, but would pluck up courage to endure, without much shrieking, the martyrdom of the first joint of his little finger chopped clean off above the dirt-encircled nail—and expresses would be sent all over broad Scotland to announce the glorious intelligence that a Cockney-cub, the reputed author of a rejected article for the Edinburgh, was cutting his monkey capers, to the delight of all true believers, at the top of the poll.

The truth is—the truth must be—that the Whigs care little or nothing—in most cases—about the talents of their own members of Parliament, provided only they stick to the leading articles of their creed. This accounts—and there is no other equally handsome explanation of the fact—for the excessive stupidity of the Scotch Whig members of Parliament. There are many men of talent in the party—then why do they in Parliament so rarely appear? The men of talent are generally embarrassed in their circumstances, or if not, tied to the professional oar; they lie by, and send up some richer ninny who prates at their disposal—and at their cramming; and thus cooks at a distance rule the roast which their creature merely turns; they wind up the jack, and round he goes; when about to go down, another wrench on the wheel, and away he flies reasoning in a circle; or in this age of improvement, especially in the mechanical arts, our friend revolves by his own smoke, which, like a good and grateful boy, he in turn consumes.

Thus, and hence, when by the chances and changes in the political world, the Whigs found such a man as Mr Jeffrey—Lord Advocate—and had him to send to Parliament—his genius, glorious through their gloom, seemed to be the only light in heaven, and they called on the stars at his sight not only to hide their diminished heads, but to retire from the contest, and from their own dim nooks afar not to venture even so much as to twinkle towards the luminary that flamed unapproachably over the whole region.

Perhaps, then, we are not going too far in saying that liberty was not the distinguishing feature of our late Election. To a lover of liberty like the Lord Advocate, the want of that feature must have disfigured its whole face, and given it the look of a diseased wanton who had lost her nose. Yet his lordship, a few months before, had an opportunity of seeing a borough or two even more uncomely; nor do we think that his own conduct at Forfar was such as to kindle a smile on the countenance of that flirting fair. It was acknowledged on all hands, that the feather he added to his cap in Fife, whatever might have been thought of it in that kingdom, possessed, if a peculiar, not a very pure, lustre on this side of the Frith. His friends could only be silent with regard to his availing himself of the vote of Dundee, which still stood disfranchised, to get himself illegally thrust into the House. He had himself been counsel for Colonel Ogilvy, and had given his opinion that Dundee had no right to send a delegate to vote at the election, an opinion which was afterwards at once confirmed by the House of Commons. But worthless as every one knew the vote to be, it was grasped at even by a high-minded man; while he and his adherents set every engine to work to raise the popular feeling in his favour, and, by harangues and inflammatory placards, and by the nighious use of the diligence of the law (arrestment of a voter for debt, a most mean expedient,) he had nearly succeeded in securing a majority of votes in Cypar. The mob there was in his favour, and he and his deputies (how dignified they!) received with delight its acclamations, leaving the other party and their friends to be hooted and pelted without offering any protection. The affair was not very serious, and little or no mischief done; but it so happened that the mob of Forfar, incredible as it may now appear, were against his lordship; and though the affair there was as little serious as at Cypar, and little or no mischief done there either, except that his lordship "was rubbed," an express was sent off in-stanter to Perth for a troop of dragoons, whose clanking hoofs, ere rosy-fingered morn tipt with fire the steeple of that ancient burgh, disturbed many a dream, and awoke the burgesses from their ideal worlds of bliss. We shall see, by and by, that his lordship's military ardour is of the nature of an intermittent fever—and excited by alarms only on one side of the House.

By the vote of a non-existence the Lord Advocate got into Parliament—and by a vote that was a non-existence he may be said to have carried the second reading of the Reform Bill. The glorious Uilt was a cipher.

How sarcastically Mr Croker cut his Lordship up for that undaunted deception, after his having had the injudicious, or rather infatuated audacity to accuse all the members legally and honourably returned for boroughs, of occupying seats they had no right to there, and of speaking and of being about to vote unconstitutionally on the Great Question! They were in his Lordship's haughty eyes—interlopers; then what was he who had practised a political cheat upon a political cheat, and was sitting there at the moment, not on a sound vote of a rotten borough, but bolstered up by the sag-end of a dead borough, that had once been the rottenest of the rotten, but had since ceased to have any vote at all? A ludicrous sight it must have been to see those stalwart knights, Lord J. Russell and

Mr Kennaedy, running, open-mouthed, to the aid of the fallen champion. But the unparing Ex-Secretary drove off the ineffectual rescue, and the Ex-Reviewer, by his silence, signified submission.

A man cannot be, like a bird, at all places at once; and this want of ubiquity on our part must be our excuse for not attempting Chronicles of the High Street and the Canon-gate on the day of the Edinburgh Election. His Lordship's speech was—for him at least who speaks in general so admirably—a poor—an impotent one, and, as might perhaps have been expected, very peevish. Brrr it had none—nor fashion. It had all the inflammatory symptoms, without any of the convulsive strength, of a brain-fever. Did we not dislike exaggeration, we might say that it reminded us of delirium tremens. The Tories, as is the use and wont of gentlemen on all occasions, listened mildly to its rapid, or, at least, airy nothings, and gave the speaker not a moment's interruption, even while prating his way through some paragraphs that might have been thought somewhat insulting to the Elective Body, and through others not free from the expression of something of the same feeling towards the party who were his opponents. Of Mr Dundas his Lordship spoke courteously—as it is his nature to do; yet in his niggard compliments there was a tinge of hauteur that was far from being impressive. But the Whigs—and the Whiglings! How they did crow! Their eyes seemed absolutely leaping out of their heads from the mere force of want of expression. During the whole speech, all their mouths stood wide open—and ever and anon, as they drank and devoured the manna, those children of Israel bolted out in return small hurried hurrahs, that, though feeble in their individual capacity, formed at times a passable enough cheer—which being taken up from a batch of blockheads on the balcony, was mouthed to a blotch of blackguards below, and so, like a sort of lumbering electricity, the rational and patriotic noise pursued its path down the High Street, and died away in the distance among the general jakes. Of course, what they were howling, and hurraing at, is to the blockheads and blackguards then and there congregated, unknown even unto this day. Sufficient to set afloat “that windy suspiration of forced breath,” was the knowledge of the mere fact that the “holy sigh” was in utterance from the lips of the Man of the People.

Though we have called the mob by their proper names of blockheads and blackguards, we are far from meaning you to believe that all Whigs and Radicals assembled there answered to that description. Nay, far from it, indeed. There were, of course, besides Edinburgh Tories, always peaceable, many hundreds of obscure people of unsuspected worth—some hundred of respectable, and half a dozen distinguished persons—among the latter, with the fine face and head of the Solicitor between, a brace of members of the late Parliament, blooming from the bed of her sudden dissolution. The dense, foul, and black mud of the mob was sprinkled—studded—with countenances of the “finer clay.” A few flowers, (how poetical!) both bright and bold, were blushing among the briarweeds—here and there a lily or a rose—(how more poetical still!)—among the wretched ragweeds that were scattered midst gaunt and ghastly Scotch thistles, abungered as the hemlocks by their side, which, again, looked so shabby, that no gentlemanly dog would have condescended to honour them en passant by the uplifting of his thorough-bred leg. An English radical mob is often a fine, jolly-looking fellow. A Scotch radical mob always painful to look on, from the inhuman length of his cheek-bones, and the unearthly length of his jaws. When you hear him—and, what is more trying, see him—about, you know not how to behave; for the sight and the sound—to say nothing of the smell—is at once so ludicrous, so loathsome, and so frightful, that you are lost between merriment, disgust, and terror, and unable to determine whether you shall laugh, puke, or faint—such is the puzzling power of that most unholy triple alliance.

Pray, will you be so considerate as to tell us how it happens, that on no occasion whatever does a large collection of people, assembled to petition for any thing, ever dream of behaving themselves in such a way as might induce those who have in their hands the thing petitioned for, with right and power to bestow or withhold it, for a few minutes to be so silly as to believe it possible that the petitioners may, in some measure, deserve the boon? It might be unreasonable to expect a composed and demure demeanour from the petitioners, few of them probably being Quakers; but why not—on such an occasion as this, for example—should they not attempt to treat us, if not with a little common sense, at least with some small share of common decency? Of the seventeen thousand inhabitants of Edinburgh who had petitioned the Town Council to elect the Lord Advocate, ~~at~~ the person in their humble judgment best qualified to represent them in Parliament, a few thousands, let us suppose, of about the average merit of the whole, were present at “the place where merchants most do congregate.” They surely should not have all hissed like geese, and brayed like asses at every intimation, however indistinctly conveyed to them, of a vote having been given in favour of Mr Dundas. That the candidate should be elected unanimously was a very unreasonable expectation in a world of sin and sorrow, or, in other words, of Whiggery and Toryism. It was “really too bad” not to allow one single vote to poor Mr Dundas, if it had been but for the look of the thing; and then they should have reflected that the finest racehorse—Friam himself, or Riddleworth—is never seen to ~~take~~ advantage than when walking over the course. Besides, since they had proved that they could not only read but write—witness so many thousand signatures—they should have assumed some shew of still higher mental cultivation, had it only been to justify the Schoolmaster and the Lord Chancellor. Instead of that, why, they furnished the enemies of popular education with arguments against it, to which it became impossible to turn a deaf ear; and forced all, who, like us, are its friends, to confess, in disgust, that a tolerable knowledge of letters—yea, even of the whole twenty-four—may be found united in great masses even of the reformers, if not of the reformed, with an intolerable ignorance of the decen-cies of life, and with what would even seem to be the habitual practice of some of its worst brutalities. Such beastly bawling, to say the least of it, was neither witty nor wise; and, had we had any doubts about it before, would, we fear, have forced us to feel that such a body of self-appointed electors were fitter to run up a beer than a Reform bill—to carry down coals in silence to a cellar, than to carry by acclamation a member to Parliament. Many mobs there are, which we know must be of desperadoes “all compact;” but we were hardly prepared to find this one falling so unexceptionably under that appropriate description. That so many ruffians should have been enemies of the magistracy it is easy to understand, but puzzling even to conjecture how they should have been such friends of the Lord Advocate. Perhaps they wished to curry favour with the highest law-officer of the crown; but, if so, their lungs have lost their labour; for though his lordship did certainly address them in language not usual with such a dignitary, “imploring” and “beseeching” them as “friends” to behave after the fashion of human creatures, and that he would order away these nasty soldiers, that extreme urbanity cannot be expected in the nature of things long to survive the day of election; so that some of them may yet curse the change of his courtesy into what to them will then appear cruelty even beyond the law, when, at the instance of his Majesty’s Advocate, they stand quivering at the bar, uncertain, during the dreary length of a trial, curious from its circumstantial evidence, whether their doom shall be transportation for life, or simply “to be carried to the usual place of execution, and there, between the hours of eight and nine of the morning, on Wednesday the — of April, (1832,) to be hanged by the neck till you are dead, and the Lord have mercy on your soul!”—a prayer in which one criminal would one day or other have stood much in need, had he not been prevented, by our chief magistrate’s strength and intrepidity, from throwing the right honourable the Lord Provost over the North Bridge. The ruffian had hold of his lordship for that especial ———; but we much falls off between the cup and the lip, so does much between the curb-stone and the parapet. "If I go over the ledge, you go with me," said, grimly, the unterrified Tartar whom the baffled butcher had caught; and the cowardly miscreant, extricating himself from the powerful grasp of a brave man, replunged, with half-throttled execrations, into the dense mob of electors yelling for blood.

The announcement of the election of Mr Dundas had roused the rabble to madness, and they had striven to storm the Hall, that they might murder him and his supporters. If that were not their intention in their furious onset against its doors, will any one of themselves, or of Mr Jeffrey's other friends, please to inform us what they were intending, when hundreds of the ragged and raging regiment were beaten back from the assault by a score of batons? Were they wishing simply to get a sight of Mr Jeffrey, whose person was as yet known but to such of them as had ever figured "as prisoners at the bar," "panels," whom his ingenuity and eloquence might have been instrumental in helping to escape the hulks or the gallows?

Hang-dog-looking blackguards most—but not all of them—were; the only persons among them, that seemed at all respectable—some hundred or so of shabby-genteel young Whigs expected, who, we believe, had no harm in them, in either will or power, and had got hustled in among the gang—being manfully adorned for the occasion by those wretches who come up to the unsuspecting passer-by, and hesitatingly mutter something offensive about old clothes. These in the brilliancy of their appointments were the élite of the corps—but the shirtless led the van in the cast-off pantaloons and boots of valets and butlers, that they might not bring disgrace on the great cause by too glaring a want of stockings.

The high-minded Whigs will thank us now for these distinctive traits of our description. Yet most culpable were they in priding themselves, before the day of election, on having with them the mob as well as the people. They never could allude surely to the people, in their forewarnings to the Town Council of violence and bloodshed—for the perpetration of such deeds, from such motives, has always, in the opinion of the high-minded Edinburgh Whigs, been held to be alien from the character of our middle classes. How bitterly—justly or not we are not now saying—they abused the late Lord Advocate Rae, but for saying something to that effect in the House of Commons! From the rabble alone, therefore, must it have been that they feared danger to the persons and properties of the citizens from the election of Mr Dundas. Indeed, had it been from that class which includes those who, by the new bill, would as £10 a-year householders become themselves electors, that they apprehended the commission of robbery and murder, they might have communicated their fears to the Council as potent but not as very heroic arguments in favour of a friend of that measure. They must have meant then the rabble—the whole rabble—and nothing but the rabble; and even then their argument was as insulting as it was foolish; for it is the duty of good citizens to enlighten the heads and to strengthen the hands of their civic rulers, against all criminal intentions and acts of the rabble—and, above all, is it their duty to do so, in those cases where the rabble in their ignorance have been exasperated by the conduct of those very good citizens themselves—conduct which in itself they seem to think needs no justification—by their speeches, their placards, their newspapers, their agents, and their agencies, against another part of the citizens not so good, we shall suppose, and not so wise by far, but still vested with undisputed authority, and with certain powers and privileges as yet constitutional, and which they were about, as they ought, constitutionally to exercise. Let us hope that these gentlemen did not know, previously to the hour of their election, what a murderous mob was on their side. And yet, without including all the vicious vagabonds in Edinburgh, how could the petition for Reform have borne thirty thousand signatures? All the male adults—including those in their dotage—do not amount to that number—and how many thousands are there who, sooner than have signed that petition, would have put their hands into the fire? Of the seventeen thousand subscribers, again, in support of the Lord Advocate's claims, some thousands must have formed sad, sorry, and scoundrel sets. Such admirers of honour, virtue, and chastity, as hailed Caroline for their Diana, and, with Denman, declared that Queen of the Liberals pure as the unsunned snow in the mountain hollow.

Suppose a bee-hive upset—or rather—for we must not calumniate the most peaceable and industrious of all the working orders—a wasp's—or hornet's nest dug up from the dust, or blown to rags on a tree. There's a ferment! Into a motley globe of insect-life exploded, as from a small centre, the thunder-shower-swarm of stings. Each yellow wretch seems a dragon, and each dragon a devil. What a raging round-robin torments the sultry air! We defy you to fix on the ringleader, for they are all ringleaders. Yet, strange to say, it is all a hum. Whiz naturalists, we know, have said, that in this state of objectless excitement, three thousand wasps (a populous nest) are less to be dreaded than one intruder, who, intent on jam or jelly on the breakfast-table, comes, in his enmourment, with ferocious insolence in at the window, which has been left open for the sweet entrance of the breath of incense-breathing morn, preluding its approach by a rustle in the lattice-loving tree, as if the house were his own, and in a sudden change of passion, foul ravisher curls himself up in an agony of hateful love on Lavinia's lip—no more "a rose without a thorn"—rankent poison interfused there, alas! with the medicinal balm one drop of which might turn bale into bliss, death into life, and earth into heaven. We have also heard the same Whig naturalist say, that the aforesaid thunder-shower-swarm of wasps is not so dangerous as one single enormous ring'd robber, rushing right, on blowing wings, into a butcher's shop, and then with fierce feet traversing a round of beef, till suddenly you see him settle down on the bit, in fiercest instinct pierce the bloody prey with his proboscis, clinging to the red ooze as if he would incorporate himself with it. This relic of an incomparable cow from Colossus, and become, on the spot, part and parcel of the yet uncut steak, already almost broiling in the sun, so hot his "perpendicular height" in the meridian hour of the dog-days. Disturb him then, and the scientific warn you that you are a dead man. Fell then is the poison in his punctum labris. Your little finger, we shall suppose, is in possession of the "stang." Look at it now, and but for its manual position you would swear 'twas Tom Thumb. The whole hand—erewhile so dexterous in its muscularity—is now swollen into a blue-puff about as big as a pigeon. The inflammation extends rapidly to elbow—shoulder—neck—back of the head—head—spine—rump; and 'tis all over with you ere vespers. Whereas, contrary to all rational but ignorant expectation, the thunder-shower-swarm of wasps keeps humming so harmlessly over your head, that by and by you suspect them to be absolute sirens in disguise—the masquerade becomes most musical—without being, like Philomela's strain, most melancholy; and falling asleep under the very hornet's tree, through "dream and vision do you sink" away among the Silent People in Fairy-Land; till, without a single sting on your sun-bronzed face or fingers, with a staff you awake in the midst of your nuptials with the fairy queen, back into this noisy world, a perfect bachelor, at the tingle-tingle-ting of the dinner-bell, or the sound, mayhap, of the great gong, that in India used sublimely to give forth the dull monotony of its dismal thunder through clouds of Mahratta-Horse hanging or rolling along the open bases of the wooded mountains—and how large the leaf of those gorgeous Oriental trees!

Now we believe our Whig naturalist was pretty much in the right of it in these his anecdotal notices of wasps and hornets; but he fell pretty much into the wrong of it, when he began, from certain facts in the natural history of those winged insects, to utter certain falsehoods as facts in the political history of these unwinged ones, called Whigs and Radicals—to wig that a mob of them will not hurt a hair of your head, if you but let them alone—whereas, ten to one that a single blackguard, if you but look at him, will strike you; till we add, of course by a legitimate conclusion from the premises—especially the major proposition, which you take care to keep in your own hand—you knock down the ruffian.

The absurdity of this sort of analogical reasoning from wasps to Whigs, became particularly transparent in the old and new town of Edinburgh on this disgraceful day. No single ruffian would have dared to look at you even in the darkest close; for he knew not but that you might be a true man, and feared the Tory-ast. But compress some thousand cowards into a close and compact mob-mass; and though in the mud there be but the "false seeming" of courage, yet there is there a formidable reality of brute-force, which may sweep the streets as a spate the gutters. But, oh! how unlike the mighty measured march of that fine Highland regiment—those noble young fellows, officers and men alike, the 79th—"moving along with military glee" to the wild mountain music of their streamer'd bagpipes—and the mean and miscellaneous movement of a Lowland rabble, tumultuously rushing, the devil only knows where or wherefore, to the filthy flats and sharps of their windpipes too, their own gray gullets, which emit yells even more vulgar than they are ferocious!

We have seen many mobs in our time, and without vanity may say that we have a scientific acquaintance with their most remarkable phenomena. Meal-mobs, even, have we assisted at, (you are a French scholar, and know our harmless meaning,) that were at once beautiful and sublime. How picturesque the many-coloured gathering of the clans into a mottled multitude, harmoniously proportioned even in its irregular patches of men, women, and children, hatted, broad-bonneted, mottled, capped, and bareheaded, with grey and golden tresses all mingling in the wind, and here and there a bald scowle black in a mass of shade, or brighter in a flood of light, that would have enraptured Rembrandt! On the peaceful sacks, high-heaped, and bulging over the waggon-wheels, how fierce the onslaught! Feeble elders find now that their backs can yet bear many blows—hobblethoys make no thing of the weight of two bolts—and milliners go to work like millars. The carts have all got the white-vomit. And now, through the meal and flour that lightens—not darkens the air—how fly the more than peripatetic potatoes! You might fondly dream at small expense of poetry, that the mealies and waxies, as they revolve through the many-circled air in fantastic gyrations, have been for the nonce endowed with wings like butterflies or birds; till ever and anon you are awakened from the dear delusion by a bash on the face from a morning call from an unceremonious visitor without either down or plumage. All over the empty sack-beadren street or square of market-town on market-day, through an atmosphere afloat with the almost invisible spiritual essence of wheat, oats, and barley, shines out the merrily—the wicked sun, as fond, undisguisedly, of a row by day, as the moon, hypocritically, by night. Beneath that soft, aerial, yet dusty and almost husky haze, rolls and raves a sea of men, women, and children, as when a neap-tide comes flowing beachward in a pitchy swell illumined with a crest of breakers. Shut your eyes, and the deafing din reminds you of sea and shipwreck. But 'tis an inland town—not a sailor there—though tailors in tens and twenties—a perilous people, and fractious exceedingly—shepherds from the hills—farmers from the carse—horse-cowpers from the plains—cattle-dealers from the isles—horsemen travellers in the hard, and eke in the soft line—(videlicet nails and sugar)—bagmen in gigs from far-away towns and cities—forty miles off at the shortest computation—pedlars on their annual excursion among their rural customers—learned clerks on a visit to their native place from the confinement of a coach-office—and the stubborn versus the obstinate pig-drivers, sulky from the suburbs, personified curses with up-lifted cudgels all a-swear for ever at their own pecuniary of the ewinish multitude. Creed and caste are forgotten; all are instinct with one spirit. The barber is bound by sympathy to the smith—in spite of both the formal and essential difference of their tongue; and you see the tailor flourishing his dry scissors along side the ditcher brandishing his hedge-sheers like a very Polish Scythian. Out sallies Sally of our alley from the dairy, whirling her churn-staff—and meets the cook of the “Hottle” with her spit, full in the face red as her own fire. Weans that had been fechtin and rugging one another’s hair, now amicably unite in still farther emptying sacks already full of emptiness—naw and then licking up a mouthful “of the finest,” till their faces are “like wines in craureuch,” and auld wives, instead of “g’ien them their licks,” encourage the imps in their deeds of whiteness, and grossly abuse the barns, and vituperate the garnets. Tost to and fro is that multitudinous motion, as when cross currents, cross winds, and cross tides meet in some strange-shaped sound between inextensible capes, and list! in the centre of the mid-passage a whirlpool,—learnedly called a vortex,—roaring through the spray-mist for ever, with the noise of innumerable chariots. The contest is carried on here exclusively between animate and inanimate matter. The drivers have all fled, and are seen high upon hill-sides, and darting, like deer, into woods. Nevertheless, nothing very violent can be done in a religious country like Scotland without cursing and swearing; but here we have not, as in the sister kingdom, much variety of oaths—the few simple natural ones being, however, most blasphemous and brutal. Blood is flowing; so there must have been blows—but one really sees no cause of quarrel; for, like a bull in a china-shop, the mob has it all his own way, nor can an empty sack offer much resistance; though in a full one is formidable, as you may learn from those feet sprawling under a load that leaves you in doubt if they have any intermediate connexion with that “grey dis-crowned head,” face downwards in the gutter. And where, pray, may now be the primus mobile of all this hubbub—the meal? Vanished from all mortal eyetight into thin air like a ghost! A mournful shew—there lie the empty sacks, like shawls and shroud left by resurrection-men unshovelled into the grave! There stand—as they have all along been standing—small, snug, and not unsocial parties of horses, still in their respective carts, with staff-supported trams, affording to each dobbie’s back pleasant relief—and a woollen or canvas bag of oats dangling daintily (as Barry Cornwall would say for the thousand-and-oneth time) at his fine Roman nose, which ever and anon he caveth suddenly (see Dr Jamieson) in the sun, to shake off the teasing flies, or on a sudden smites it against his fat flank, in anger with the clegs (see, again, the Doctor); while you cannot but admire the nobleness of his clustering forelock, nor less the unshorn strength that roughens at his fetlocks, and shags the very iron that glances—as he kicks or stamps—on his “inaccessible” heels. Quiet has been the rational animal, and all his compeers, amidst the irrational creation; in a meal-mob on Saturday feeding away as gratefully as in a grass meadow on Sabbath. And now the canine have ceased barking—and cur, colley, terrier, bull-dog, mastiff, setter, greyhound, and lurcher, (ah! the poachers,) are snuffing their way in search, each of his own master, through the broken fragments of the departing and departed crowd. What a change of scenery and figures, both on foreground, and background, and in the middle distance! (Curls have been all drenched out of matrons’ and maidens’ hair (why so many of them carrot?) by streams of sweat,—or, as the very village dames have learned now to call it—perspiration. What a picking-up, and a putting-on, and an adjustment, without looking-glass, of kerchiefs of spot or stripe, Belcher or Bandana! Sad the loss, and joyful the recovery of much mutch; the order of the garter goes a-begging in various lengths of tape—honi soit qui mut y pense; “Mysie, ma woman, is this your bawble?” and, by all that is most fashionable, yonder wouns a spanker-boom—an Amazonian virgin with legs fearful to look on—sans huggers, sans shoes, sans mutch, sans petticoat, sans every thing—joking round carts and corners, amidst the unextinguishable laughter of the now rolstering rioters, almost skuddy, such has been her tear and wear of duds in the rippet, and laudable her not uncandid exhibition of the naked truth in the eyes of the whole world!—Afraid she too—all the while as she sends—that some mischief has befallen her lover—now nowhere visible—distraughtly, and with a face of many colours—as she ranges round her own kail-yard, far aloof from these ribald reformers—shrieks she on her Bill! her whole Bill! and nothing but her Bill! whom she fears the wretches have curtailed of his fair proportions. But long since her dear Bill had withdrawn to the Hanging-shaws, from the clutch of some ancient bel-dains who began the mob, and at night-fall she may depend on him at the gable end of yonder barn-like building by itself on the wood edge, true to the hour of assignation as buck to doe when the quiet hour brings out the conies, whole and sound both in his principles and his details. Boys are jumping sack-races now for half-penny prizes given by the drunken ganger; and the chief baker stands smilingly at his door, with bare arms a-kinabo, prophetic of the rise of his bread—even of the batch now in the oven. Slow and stately from the mause on the brae, in its green-palised garden, down comes, at what may be safely called the eleventh hour, though yet it be but breakfast-time, the minister—yet pompously redolent of last year's moderatorship—and attempts explaining to his parishioners, out of McCulloch, how the price of meal and flour is enhanced alike in town and village, by scattering it, in immense quantities, along the stony streets, which, whether paved or Macadamized, are barren—and thus sown can yield no return. From this doctrine there are many dissenters; and one of the old school predicts, with all the confidence of assured experience, that next market-day they will see meal down twopence the peck; at least, so it always has been with the spilling of sour-milk—and, though he is willing to grant that sour-milk is not meal, yet they are both commodities; and what is more vivers; and what always happens with the wet, must often happen with the dry. To which reasoning, the ex-moderator, having got the stot by rote, stutters out an ineffectual and unsatisfactory reply, leaving the victory, by acclamation, in the mouth of the sagacious old annuitant, once supervisor in the * Excise. And now there are in the market-place but here and there some small knots of people, hanging loosely together, and soon untying themselves into strings of lazy loiterers, who again drop away, one by one, into their own houses, or by twos and threes into public; you hear the smith re-blowing up his forge; from his skylight Snip pops out his pericranium, curious he knows not of what, ere he sit down to serious stitching; laddies, mutually cuffing the few remaining meal-marks out of each other's jackets, pursue their path pensively to school, almost with the looks of evil-doers; douce folk (why not douce before?) are shaking their heads in a style at once mysterious and alarming; and who may those men be, preceded by a few who seem to march with a military step, with staves, alias batons, in their hands? Heavens and earth! has it come to this—and are they, groans an antique crone, the Lord High Constables? Something of that sort they certainly are—followed by the farmers and the farmers' men—to identify and seize the ringleaders. Violence is evanescent, but law eternal. The village is in a funk—death-pale as she would swarf. "Where," asks the King of the Lord High Constables, "where, folk, is the CORPUS DELICTI?" Not a soul in the village can tell—for not a soul in the village knows the import of that dreadful question. But there lies the poor lost corpus delicti, faintly whitening the streets as if there had passed along them a hundred chinky lime-carts. 'Tis a critical moment—but lo, lightning! and hark, Jove thunders on the left—a happy omen! Well—such another plump of rain, each drop as big as a blue-berry, we cannot charge our memory with since last Lammas flood. The ducks are already in the gutters—and that dead cat, which every body complained of, but nobody would remove, will be floated away at last into the Leithen. The corpus delicti is providentially done into daigh, and he would be a fine-eyed farmer who could swear now to his own meal. But the sacks! Why the sacks are to seek—and are lying with truth at the bottom of a well. But what say you to the carts and horses? Not a word. They had better be driven home by their owners—lost they should catch cold. Meanwhile the fifty pound loss-holders, and the Lord High Constables, retire, at certain masonic signs, with some of the chief heads of L. 10 a-year houses—retire into the “hottle,” to fix among themselves who ought to be apprehended as ring-leaders. Not considering ourselves safe in the councils of such an unreformed parliament, we drop down from the roof on which we had chosen our station of survey—the roof of an edifice somewhat dilapidated, which had of old been a Catholic chapel, but is now a cow-house—one day or other, perhaps, with its sacristy yet to be restored—and whistling carelessly along the front windows of the Horns, as if just entering a fine, open, airy, one-streeted town, we never look back till we have reached a road-side grove, commanding a clear view of the church tower above the dim houses, and there sitting down on a milestone—we forget the number—moralize on mankind in general, and the inhabitants of that pretty place in particular—wondering, among a thousand other speculations, whether or no it would be greatly benefited by Burgh Reform.

Were we to paint in this style (for what we meant to make but a slight sketch has grown into an unfinished picture) all the mobs that have met our eye, there would be no computing the longitude of this article. Lord George Gordon's mob of London we never saw—nor were we at the destruction of the Bastille—but we have “counted the chimneys at midnight” with those who of that “disport took largely,” and who were always ready at the slightest hint, though during their later years it must be confessed somewhat prosily, to describe the pastime with true religious and patriotic enthusiasm. The Newcastle keelmen got up a mob well—nor much amiss do the Whitehaven colliers. The Tranent mob about the militia, some thirty years ago, was about the best, that is the bloodiest, we have had in Scotland in our time, and the people fell under the fire of musketry from the tops of their old red houses in no inconsiderable numbers. The mob of the Bloody Head—so we named it who were students there that session—looked so well at its acme, that there seemed small reason for doubting that it would effect the demolition of Glasgow college. A child's hand had been judiciously hung up to ry—like a haddy “while it was beifg rizzer'd”—on the cheek of a window open to the public eye—and in a minute the stones of the street leapt up into life and became raging people. No better subject indeed for a mob than a corpse, real or imaginary, doubled and bundled up with its knees to its chin in a sack—or supposed to be stretched at even more than its full length on a table, “gashed with many a gory wound.” So much the better if discovered by a schoolboy—“fancy's painted devil”—by a peculiar crook in the big toe of the left foot, to have once been his grandmother. That horrid aggravation makes the mob—as our dear Shepherd would say—“just perfectly-right-even-down-red-wud-stark-staring-mad-a'thegither ;” and nothing will satisfy them but to pull down a university. Since the exploits of Knox, Burke, and Hare, however, regular resurrectionists have grown into favour, and may be said to be even comparatively popular.—But the mob which at first was the most rational, and at last the maddest of all imaginable mobs we ever witnessed, was a mob that mistook a private madhouse for a bagnio, into which it was rumoured young children had often been enticed or entrapped for violation or prostitution. How the windows and doors flew into shivers—and of slates in five minutes how bare were the wretched rafters! Out were haled by the hair of the head the old cronies, who, in a woeful but no wicked sense, were keepers—but no procurers they—and you would have thought that the very curses of eyes would have blasted them ere claws had time to tear them into pieces. Well might you pity the poor visiting physician—skipping out in a full suit of black, with laced ruffles, and silver buckles, and gold-headed cane, and his “wee three-cockit!” But lo! glaring ghastly, like wild-cats from a wood on fire, rush out of their cells several shrieking maniacs, and leap, though arm-locked in strait-waistcoats, and two or three of them in chains, all females, in among the frightened crowd that recoil in horror—while others stalk forth unconscious of the tumult, blind and deaf in their insanity to all we call the world, yet wailing in a worse world of their own—a world worse than “any hell which priests or beldams feign”—as all now see from their wan and haggard faces, ever and anon dreadfully convulsed into leering wickedness, and then suddenly wrenched back, as if by the demon within them, into tortured misery—just the same, seemingly, as if one had pulled a string whereby to keep incessantly shifting the features of some movable mask into all possible faces of the ludicrousness, the loathsomeness, or the dreadfulfulness of mania, frenzy, and delirium. What a revulsion when, all at once, the truth broke upon the mob! Monster no more—the multitude was but as one man. It sighed—it groaned—it wept—it bowed down its head—it held up its hands—it prayed. There pity and compassion, and remorse and penitence, were even rarer far than, a few minutes before, had been wrath and the lust of blood. “The mob”—said we, as we beheld the gentle hearings along in arms of them whom some one has dared to call the “God-deserted”—“the mob is a Christian.” But our memory forsakes us, and fades away glimmeringly into oblivion and the black extinguishment of night.

Masters as we are, then, of mobs, you will easily believe that we are not easily pleased with such exhibitions of humanity—that we are entitled to be fastidious—and that, unless got up spiritedly, and on a considerable scale, neither author nor actors can expect any applause from such an old critic as Christopher North. We either yawn at the stale and stupid representation, or hiss the piece off the stage. Now the mob, on the day of the Edinburgh Election, was a mean and miserable affair, and most deservedly damned. The piece prepared for him, in which he was to act the principal part, possessed not one glimpse of genius—one trait of originality—and was borrowed, or rather stolen, from the Westminster Election and the Westminster Review. The only endurable characters were “the walking gentlemen;” but they were so few as to be lost in the general blackguardism of the scene. Yet was there an attempt to give a classical air to this farce of the Modern Athenians. It was constructed on the principles of the Greek drama, and scrupulous regard paid to the unities of time and place. The scene shifted but from the Old to the New Town—an allowable license—and the time occupied in the representation did not exceed twelve hours, the period, we believe, prescribed, as the utmost limit, by Aristotle or his commentators. The Lord Advocate delivered a feeble prologue with forcible applause—and by about three o'clock was concluded the First Act, which though hot, heavy, and hissing, as a tailor's goose—nay, even as the Glasgow Gander himself—waddled its way off and on the stage, the exit being equal to the entrance, the débouché to the début. Contrary to all rules of nature and of art, in the Second Act we were favoured with the catastrophe. But it proved a complete failure. The actor who was to throw the Lord Provost over the bridge, having neglected to attend the rehearsals, did not know how to lay hold, forgot his part, struck his own forehead instead of Glen's, and not having activity to leap into the orchestra among the fiddlers, as a horse did one night not very long ago, the ass retreated tail foremost in among the scene-shifters, and ill fared the cuddie in his own crowd. The opening of the Third Act shewed us some spirit-stirring scenery, in which there was no still life—the High and Low Terrace, and head of Leith Walk, from the Register House to Ambrose's hotel, the opposite and extreme points of vision being Prince's Street and Picardy. There was a good deal of bustle in this act—but the actors were absolute stones, and many of them had faces like brickbats. The interest hung on a battle, and on a city distracted with civil war. But such fighting! Never beheld our young or old eyes so abortive a bicker. There were far too many blackguards on the stage at one time—and we might have said, “Enter the mob solus.” Conscious of miserably enacting the parts that had been set them by the managers, they anticipated or rather turned the tables on the audience or spectator, and not only hissed, but battered the dress boxes, in one of which was sitting the Lord Provost with some of his friends; while two persons, one pragmatical and one pedantic, who thought they enjoyed the confidence of the mob, and deserved their friendship by having curried their favour, began spouting advice to them from the pit, with gesticulations of face and hand that only aggravated their fury. Meanwhile the head of a column of constables—high and special—appeared first in the back and then on the foreground—and then ensued a general mêlée. This was the only part of the performance in this dull and noisy Third Act worth looking at, and 'twas really not ill got up; but after all, though intended to be a tragedy, 'twas but a melodrame. The act closed with a procession—partly peaceful, and partly warlike—of dragoons; but blows from the flats of sabres are not impressive, and horses ought to charge with their shoulders, not their hips, in serious composition. In the Fourth Act the scene shifted to the High Street, with a fine full front-view of those noble buildings, the Exchange. The Dramatic Censor must have been astonished; for, now and here, in place of performing their own parts of first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, &c. &c. &c. and so on blackguard, as they had been set down for them, why the mob with one voice called out for—

"The Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate!" And, to the utter and eternal confusion of Romance and Reality, (let the fair and ingenious L. E. L. look to it,) leaning over a balcony, like Juliet to her Romeo, "alike, but oh! how different," that distinguished performer "beseeched and implored" his dear mob, the "loving, lovely, and beloved," not to stay—as did that love-sick bride her "imparadised form of such sweet flesh;" but with the most lack-a-daisical want of gallantry, "as Mob valued his good opinion, and wished well to their common cause," entreated her "to go home!" But home, sweet home, at that hour had no charms for Mobby; and the waving of greasy caps, and the roaring of greasier gullets, "bailed and wished him long," out of the ghost of a perfect gentleman, that apparition of the most imperfect of all possible demagogues. You may guess what confusion now tumulted the stage. But the act—which had but barely begun—terminated with an unexpected coup d'état et coup d'état. His lordship was suddenly clapped into a hackney coach—for the property-man could not be expected to have ready his triumphal car—and a tremendous team of animals that ~~shall~~ be nameless having been yoked into the vehicle, less splendid, surely, than that on which Sardanapalus used to issue forth to battle from the gates of Nineveh, as painted in the immortal epics of an Atherstone, with no needless Jarvey on the throne, away rattled the imitation-thunder along the Mound, nor ceased till, like Jupiter descending from a cloud, Mr Jeffrey got out at No. 24, Moray Place.

"While all Olympus trembled at his nod." The Fifth Act was long and tiresome—in absence of the only performer worth either looking or listening to, the Lord Advocate. Never felt we before the force of that well-known passage,

"As when some well-graced actor quits the stage," &c. ;

so, "thinking his prattle to be tedious," we left the mob in disgust, and forgot it, and our ennui, and all our mortal miseries, in the Blue Parlour over a board of oysters.

Seeing the haste, if not the hurry, in which we now, and indeed always write, the gentle reader will excuse any confusion of metaphor or figure of speech that may appear to run through the above unpremeditated passage, which is as extemporaneous as any thing well can be, flowing from the point of time and pen. But suppose for a short season we try to be serious—not solemn—but simply and earnestly serious—and then Finis.

For eight or ten hours, then, after the Election—during it there was but senseless shouting and brainless bluster—before it but savage scowls, slanderous insinuations, warning threats, and all the systematic enigma of tyrannical intimidation;—but for eight or ten hours after the Election, there was what might truly be called the Reign of Terror—if that expression did not convey an erroneous notion that there was Fear as well as Danger. The mob were up—and had been put up to the pitch of any, the uttermost wickedness; but they laboured under two wants that made them impotent—concert and courage. An Edinburgh mob is cruel, but craven—senseless as savage. There is no more discipline among them than among a herd of swine—nor is their valour at all different; for hit them on the snout as they advance on the grunt, and you may take them by the tail without having any reason to pride yourself on your intrepidity. They shewed this from afternoon till midnight; you saw everywhere the white feather; and, on the whole, they were pretty well, though not sufficiently well, bruised and battered. We do not exactly know how the High Constables behaved; well, we must believe, (for they received thanks,) as a body, when called upon to act with the baton—indifferently well, when of their own accord, many of them, how many we know not, as individuals, joined their shouts to those of the mob during the Election, at each echo of a vote for Mr Jeffrey, and their hisses to those of the mob at each echo of a vote for Mr Dundas. As private individuals they did not stand there; and whatever were their wishes, they were bound then and there to be mute. Many of themselves had given warning of what was likely to happen—disorder and violence; and, from men with the emblems and weapons of civil authority in their hands, such shouts and hisses were incredibly foolish,—and far worse than foolish—being the best, as the only means in their power to adopt, for exciting that turbulence which they were sworn to suppress. The dragoons, it was afterwards said in some of the newspapers, cheered the mob; but this was a lie, which could be swallowed by no one who knows any thing of the discipline of British soldiers. They behaved, as they always do, with heroic forbearance; while showers of worse than hailstones were clattering on their skull-caps, few faces even frowned; and some of the veterans could not but smile at the childish cowardice. As for the Special Constables—a band of brothers, though of all parties in politics—young, active, and fearless—they wedged their way through the mob, a hundred times, at its densest and its fiercest, and shoved, or knocked aside the ninnies like nine-pins. But humaner lads,—and all gentlemen are humane—never rattled a rabble. The word, to “Move on,” preceded the blow to lie down; and a piteous expression on many a blackguard’s face saved many a blackguard’s head from the uplifted baton. How many heads they broke cannot well be counted, but it is satisfactory to know, as many at least as would save a borough from being included in schedule A; while their own heads, though scores were cut, are all now, with a very few exceptions to the general rule—not to last long we trust, for they were among the boldest—as sound as roaches. At two or three places where the Special Constables were very few in number, perhaps not more than 20 in all, and these separated into sixes and sevens, the mob, by mere brute weight, overpowered the gentlemen, and you may guess how they treated them—with the most murderous ferocity! The Police Officers, more especially when the mob were about to attempt, for the second time, to murder the Lord Provost, were neither slow, nor yet particularly civil, and have since been ludicrously accused of generalization, by a few noisy noodles, who maintain the exploded doctrine of the neutral flag, and while putting it into practice near the Terrace, where shouts and stones were flying in the air, cats and curses, and brickbats were bucked at long odds against batons, had their heads prepared for casts for the Phrenological Society, with the bumps conspicuously apparent of all the thirty-three faculties. This was as it should be, and the Society look to such specimens for an extension of the science. This small and insignificant sect of Antiburghers, are bitter on the Anti-reformers, and have since striven to support this thesis, affixed to different columns, “That had the electors, and especially the Lord Provost, remained all night—(it originally stood, in the MS., all week)—in the Council Chambers, there would have been no riot at all, and that the mob stood all the time on the defensive against the borough-mongers.” This is a new form of the Row Heresy, and therefore will have its converts.

But we are rationalists, and not to be deluded with vain doctrines. It was rash—it was fool-hardy—it was nothing short of braving, nay of bullying the people—scribbled some calumniating cravens in the radical newspapers—in the Lord Provost to leave the Council Chambers so soon after the election. A pretty Lord Provost—say we—he would indeed have been, had he remained a moment longer than he did within these buildings, or shewn one seeming symptom of a fear that never found entrance into his breast. Not even to the rabble-roust was he unknown—or known but by the proceedings of that day, which with pride he will always remember—but generous, liberal, and charitable in his wealth, the Lord Provost was the Friend of the Poor—the benefactor of the classes who now, contrary to all expectation, appeared to thirst for his blood. Attended by the usual officers, he walked into the street, neither fearing nor braving the brutes; but then indeed he soon found that he had not understood the cowardice and the cruelty of an Edinburgh political reforming mob. His very gentlemanly appearance even was hateful to them; and they would fain have torn to pieces a figure so unlike that of their own best-dressed and genteel leaders, who, nevertheless, were no inconsiderable dandies. The hatred of bond fide beasts to men is nothing like so intense as that of blackguard- to gentlemen. Had his lordship worn a mean, low, Whig look, at once sulky and sneaking, we verily believe they would have huzzared; but he looked every inch, (six feet and upwards,) the Tory, and therefore “over the Bridge!”

The Whigs—who are not in their own conduct, when mobbed, by any means the most magnanimous of men—witness that of the best man among them at Forfar—affected to laugh at this mob as a sorry illustration of the Perils of Man. Certainly the city was not burned to the ground—nay, it was not even set on fire. Neither did the streets run ankle-deep in blood. Heaps of slain did not darken the first-floor windows—Arthur's Seat echoed not the groans of the wounded—nor were surgeons seen amputating on long tables formed of barrel-supported shutters the limbs of one half of the population. The day was not even like any one of the “Three Glorious Days in Paris,”—for the mob had no military to fight with, and no pretty patriotic urchin, stealing under the bellies of the horses with a brace of pistols, brought down right and left a brace of troopers. Some soldiers were indeed present—but in civil broils the sabre loses its edge, its point the bayonet, and the brave disdain hostile contact with a base bluster of bullies. Yet of all that breathe, Whigs dislike most shrinkingly the breaking of their own dunderheads; and had this mob, by some strange reversal of the laws of nature, been a Tory one, how the Revolutionists of 1831 would have scampered! Clean heels they might not have made, any more than clean hands; but they would have disappeared into chimks and crannies to the tune of “(Off she goes;” and the military, both horse and foot—would to a dead certainty have been ordered to charge. We speak advisedly; for we think of Forfar. To be sure, there was no charge at Forfar except in the iuns; but a squadron was ordered up to “quell the floods below” of old women and weans, and next morning, lo! the Lord Advocate on his way to Perth with a guard of honour!

You must swallow this opinion of ours about Whig intrepidity cum grano salis; for it has been wrung out of us, in much wrath, by their presuming to laugh at the dangers and disasters of us Tories on a day disgraceful to the grinners. That they set a mob upon us they do not, we presume, attempt to deny, nor that it was composed of the lowest Whig and radical materials. It was several thousand weak, and wished to beat, bruise, knock down, and trample on, all Tories. No Tory would suffer such a construction to be put on the treating act “on any account whatsoever;” so suddenly pushing ourselves from our stools, we turned the tables, and (for we are constables) beat, bruised, knocked down, but did not trample upon, all such reformers as came in our way, whether they had pieces of palling in their paws or not—drunk or sober—frightened or ferocious—provided only they were in the act of breaking the peace of the city and of the sky, by their mouthings, and their movements, and their misdeeds, and if not absolutely killing—for that depends upon circumstances over which they had some, but not sufficient control—yet cutting and maiming the lieges, and disfiguring their handsome faces, perhaps, for life. It was no joke, we assure you, or a bad one; such urbanity was far from facetious; and though Shakespeare it is, we believe, who says you may find “sermons in stones,” we are not such a melancholy Jaques as not to prefer them—even though heavier still—from a stick in a wooden pulpit. Suppose there had been no surly police-officers—no special constables—no companies of the gallant 73th—no troop of the bold dragoons, (and the Lord Advocate would have indignantly disbanded the military,) where would have been the writer of this article, and other preservers of the peace and guardians of the constitution? We shudder to think where, and beg you will not mention it; but this much we will say, that there had been an end to this magazine.

“Old men,” quoth our worthy red-haired friend, the driver par excellence of the Carlisle Mail, between that merry town and blue-roofed Hawick—“Old men,” quoth he, looking at us with the tail of his eye, as we sat trembling at his left hand on the box, on the taking, at a railroad rate of eighteen miles an hour, of that trying right-angle formed by Canonby Bridge perpendicularly touching the royal line of road which there overhangs the magnificent rock-scenery of the Esk, at some hundred feet or two above the rocky and roaring channel—“Old men are timorous.” The dangers of that night, therefore, we must not exaggerate in our imagination; and we confess that in a faithful description—in a true picture—and we wish ours to be so—Edinburgh on that night should not exhibit from the pen or pencil of that great writer and painter, Christopher North, in the 181st Number of Blackwood’s Magazine, such gloom or such glare as Troy now does in the second book of the Æneid, a poem attributed to Virgil, with about the same reason as the Iliad is to Homer. The truth is just this, and no more;—That, excited partly by their own evil propensities,—for principles they have none,—partly by the epidemical fever of this Bill, which “hangs in the sick air,” and poisons poor people—but chiefly by the incendiary arts of the whole Whig party, high and low, who were determined at all risks, and at all sacrifices, to carry their man and their measure, not only would the mob, on that day and that night, but for the firmness and moderation of the civil power and of the military, have wreaked their wicked vengeance on the properties and persons of all such citizens as they thought mainly instrumental in preventing the election of the Lord Advocate, but the whole city, instead of being threatened with many and formidable dangers thus finally crushed, would have been at the mercy of a lawless multitude, who, judging from the enormities which they, even as it was, could not be prevented from perpetrating, would in all probability have stained our streets and dwellings with blood. That such mischiefs might happen, if the Council elected Mr Dundas, many a radical Cassandra with flowing hair, and many a Whig Calchas with bald head, prophesied; that it did not happen, was owing, assuredly, not to “The Right Hon. Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland.” And this brings us to say a few words about his Lordship’s share in these transactions, by way of practical conclusion to, we fear, our somewhat too long discourse.

In the first place, his Lordship knew, that all the memorials, requisitions, and petitions, in favour of his claims upon the Council, however honourable many of them were to himself, shewing, as they did, not only how high he stood in the estimation of his own immediate political party, a fact he knew very well before, but also in that of his fellow-citizens generally, which neither before could he have doubted, though such expressions of it must have been most grateful,—his Lordship, we say, knew well that not one sensible, and honest, and independent man of that political party, to which he had been all lifelong opposed, and never before so vitally as now, could do otherwise than most earnestly desire that all fair means might be adopted, by all concerned, to prevent his being returned Member for the city. He, at least, whatever others might be, or pretend to believe, could not be deluded into the belief "that Scotland, to a man," was for the Bill. In the Council he knew that the strength of the two great parties would be tried; and that though the personal merits of Mr Dundas were such as to entitle him to come forward, it was on the strength of the Tory party, and of the enemies of the Bill, both in its principle and details, that his opponent stood. He knew that among the "Borough-mongers," as the parrots chatter them, and as the apes would too, if they could articulate—there are hundreds of thousands of as honourable and patriotic men as himself; and that, to divide a nation of fourteen millions of freemen, which in numbers and character we believe the British to be, into thirteen millions, nine hundred thousand, nine hundred and eighty-three Reformers, all admirers of "the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland," and into seventeen Anti-Reformers, all favourable to plain Mr Robert Adam Dundas, is a division, that, even in the Moon, could not be told even to the marines.

In the second place, his lordship knew, that, in this contest, he was merely what is called the popular candidate. Prodigious popular excitement he knew there was, and that his opponent and his party, and especially his electors, would be exposed to the brunt of the mob. What an Edinburgh mob was likely to be, at this crisis, nobody could foresee with clearer eyes than his lordship's, which are about the brightest we ever looked in; and having been more than satisfied with a very slight taste of the quality of a Forfar mob, he might have had something more, we think, than a passive sympathy with what were likely to be the feelings of Mr Dundas, on the treat in preparation for him by the mob of the modern Athens. But his passive sympathy seems to have been so deep, that it could not pass into an active one; and we cannot see, that, during the dangers to which that gentleman, and all who supported him, were exposed, and from all of which he himself stood free, his lordship exhibited any desire—most certainly he adopted no determination—to shelter those respectable fellow-citizens of his from the perils of his own mob.

In the third place, we beg to suggest to the popular and unsuccessful candidate, the consideration of the very striking contrast afforded by the Lord Advocate's passage of the Mound and the Lord Provost's passage of the Bridge. There, was "the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland," sitting or lolling in his own carriage, in the midst of his faithful friends, his own Carriage-and-Fourscore, a set-out that would have extorted three rounds of applause from the palms of Jehu. There, was William Allan, and he too is a Right Honourable, and eke a Lord, but the reformers had stripped him of all his titles, trudging on his own pins, in the midst of his faithless enemies, such a set-out as might have reminded a Pyrenean traveller of an encounter with a pack of wolves. We are still partial to soles, and once were celebrated pedestrians. But it is curious to remark how different are the impressions men receive from the same objects, according as they are on foot, on horses, or in chariots. The philosophy of this we are at present pinched for time to explain; but allow us to turn your attention to a single illustration. From the window of his Carriage-and-Fourscore the Lord Advocate of Scotland looked east and looked west, and to the pupils of his eyes the whole city seemed less like the Modern Athens than the metropolis of Paradise. The figures, moving to and fro the ethereal brightness, looked all angelic; including the hierarchies "in linked sweetness long-drawn-out" in front of his own chariot. The sounds that played softly on the drums of his ears, "sole or responsive to each other's voice, to him their great creator," were as the music of cleansed and beatified sinners—in simpler words—saints. The Reign of Reform had already begun on earth—and Auld Reekie appeared to be the New Jerusalem. But to the eyes and ears of the Lord Provost what reversal of all this more than garden of Eden! What a North Bridge—"with dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms!" One peep over the parapet, and he felt the force of the

Virgilian demiverse, "facilis descensus Avernus." (Hæos seemed to have come again—and that Anarch Old to be howling from the Calton to the Acropolis. "Oh! king, live for ever!" was still the cry that saluted the Lord Advocate's ears—those of the Lord Provost were regaled with, "Throw him over the Bridge!")

But as in "the soul are many lesser faculties, reason the chief," false or exaggerated impressions fade or fall away from the sensorium, and the soul sets her reason to see the truth. If for a time, times, or half a time, she has been deluded by her senses, she dismisses those bad and faithless servants to their cells, and leaves the sole management of her house and kingdom to reason, her chamberlain and her prime minister. Now, twice during the course of that day was the Lord Provost assaulted to the danger of his life, and after being driven to shelter, or rather save himself from death, in a shop, he was pursued by the murderous Macadamers to his own door, which was opened and shut hastily, and then barricaded against the gang, while dragoons guarded the porch. Next day his Lordship's indignation was much abated—and he pitied more than blamed the wretches that had forgotten they were men. Now, twice during the course of that day was the Lord Advocate hoisted into his carriage, not to the danger of his life, though to the disarrangement of his habiliments, and after being dragged by a posse of the élite of those "animals that chew the thistle," from the Lesser along the Greater Mound, and so on in his career of glory, he was safely deposited at his own door too, which opened and shut slowly upon the godlike man, who in a few moments afterwards reappeared on a balcony, and on the haunted heads of his idolaters "than honey from the honey-comb, that droppeth sweeter far" distilled the eloquence of his speech. Next day, wethinks, his Lordship's admiration must have somewhat abated, of the man creatures he had changed into cattle; and he too must have pitied more than condemned the wretches who had forgotten that they were men. Both their Lordships, in short and in long, were next day placed nearly in the same predicament—such is the inevitable recoil of natural sentiment in the minds of rational beings, soon as the pressure of some accidental external force has been removed, and the energies within suffered to exert their inherent elasticity.

But, in the fourth place, after having "looked on this picture and on this," and seeing that both are true to nature and to life—quoad istam diem—of which—had you given you your choice—could, would, or should you wish to have been the original—the Mob-Victim, or the Mob-King?

In the fifth place, when the Lord Advocate, after his double-deification, condescended to revisit the earthly Exchange, and once more to mingle with mortals, at the written request of Bailie Learmonth, as yet but a mortal citizen, (and a narrow escape did he too make of immortality from immolation by the mob,) ought he not to have remembered that he had once been but human, like the poor blind creatures who were now asking his advice and his aid? There they were, in what may be called durance vile, in the custody of the leaders, if not of his party, of his carriage, nay, of the entire team. But ruth and pity his lordship had left behind him in the mansions of the sky—and "fire-eyed fury was his conduct now." That the magistrates had ordered out the military he heard with visible indignation. It was an absurd and needless step for men to take in their position. There was his own sweet, subservient, servile, lacquey and cattle-mob; and there were two companies of the seventy-ninth Highlanders! How he frowned with his black bent brow, like the Jupiter of Phidias, on the tartan—kilt, plaid, and plume! How he smiled with fairest forehead, like the Venus of Praxiteles, on the fustian—breeches, buff, and beaver—all much the worse for wear—while the evening air would have been aswarm with insects, had niggard nature but gifted them with wings! He sweetened—he soothed—he promised—he beseeched—he implored—he prayed—and he pledged! And as the last echoes of the measured military tread died away in the distance, maybe he had a dream of Forfar, and, in the midst of all his triumphs, a shade of sadness did fall upon his spirit, to think how inconsistent and contradictory a composition of clay, at the best, is that poor weak creature—Whig-man!

In the sixth place, his Lordship ought, we humbly think and say, to have remembered throughout all these transactions, that he was not only "the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland," in the eyes and ears of the many foolish people who had no idea whatever of what those sonorous words may mean, and of the many more blackguard people who in their hearts wish such an office had never been invented, but that he was so before his country, and in that character had not only privileges but powers, and not only rights but duties. His chief duty, as Lord Advocate, during great part of that day and that night, was to assist the other authorities to coerce the mob. That mob, he has told us himself, grievously and grossly offended against the law; and why did he not interpose the shield of his power between them and the people? There can be but one answer,—because he was a candidate for their favour,—and hoped on another occasion to have their sweet voices. Nor let any timid trimmer hint that in saying so, we are doing injustice to a high-minded gentleman. We respect the character of Mr Jeffrey more truly, and on firmer and broader grounds too, than perhaps most of his noisy friends, and certainly than all the insinuating sycophants who, incapable of appreciating the worth of such a man, yet eat his figs and lick his phlegm, and, after all, care not, so that they gain their ends, if he were dead to-morrow. But it was natural that he should have been with the mob, for the mob was with him; and it seems worse than ungracious, most ungrateful, to do even one's duty to a mob of one's own creation. The more so, the plainer that duty may be; for in this case, what could it be but to assist the magistrates and the military with baton or with bayonet to charge, disperse, arrest, imprison, and punish? So far from showing a vigour beyond the law, he shewed a weakness that was nothing less than dangerous injustice; and the recollection of his having called dragoons into Forfar all the way from Perth, when nobody was in any danger but himself and his friends, and that danger, by all accounts, so very slight as almost to be beneath the ludicrous, comes painfully across one's mind, do what one will, when one thinks of his seeking to soothe the infuriated Edinburgh rabble then threatening destruction to so many of his opponents, by telling the mob that the soldiers should not have been called out, and promising that they should immediately be withdrawn, (a promise he had no power to perform,) at the same time pledging himself "for their good and peaceable conduct!" Such were his Lordship's words—the good and peaceable conduct of the identical set of ruffians—the few seized by the police excepted—who had twice attempted the life of the Lord Provost, wounded hundreds to the effusion of their blood, and who were still breathing vengeance against those they had so savagely insulted and injured! Long before this time (it was about seven o'clock when his Lordship thus addressed the military, having been sent for, as we have said, to Murray Place by one of the Magistrates still imprisoned in the Exchange), the Riot Act had been read, and placards posted up warning the mob of the dangers they would face by continuing on the streets after such a warning; and these placards his Lordship ordered to be destroyed, as we have been told, with apparently much indignation. He has not ventured to say that the Riot Act ought not to have been read—nor will he venture; and if it was right to read it, it was incumbent on the Magistrates, as men of common humanity, as well as common firmness, to forewarn the deluded miscreants—(and who else but miscreants would continue to rage along the streets of a city after that reading?)—of the fearful liabilities they incurred by persisting in their defiance of the law? Why did the Lord Advocate angrily order or enjoin that those placards should be effaced? Could he for one instant have been so deluded as to dream that the Magistrates were instigated by the same sort of feeling—anger—to bid them be put up—as he seemed to be instigated by in bidding them be pulled down? If so, then notwithstanding the reason they had already read to him, he little knew his men. They were actuated by a thoughtful humanity—he by a thoughtless gratitude—to the mob. The voices of the Magistrates who read the Riot Act, though at different places, could not be heard over all the streets and squares where the mob was raging; but the stone-deaf are not always stone-blind too; and by such placards alone could proclamation be made to the mob that had so long had possession of the city, that the time had come when they might be lawfully treated as its enemies, and visited with extremest punishment. But in the teeth of such telling, the Lord Advocate delivered another doctrine more palatable to those who had drawn him in triumph to his house, and driven the Lord Provost in terror (no—in peril) to his; and Mob, being assured on the authority of their own member, that they were safe from the soldiers, and that the ugly placards were sent to Pozzi, after such pause in their proceedings as they thought in politeness, or rather in loyalty, due to their King, (for they have no God,) sent him back to his palace in triumph under guard of the drag-division, and with increased courage resumed the campaign—in many a savage skirmish, for they aye refused the offer of a pitched battle—through all quarters of the town.

In the seventh place, who would wish to fire wantonly upon a mob? Not we, as we hope to be saved. We are confident, that even the Whigs and Radicals themselves will believe us; for we never fired wantonly upon them, when threatening to blow up our very Magazine, not even after we had read the Riot Act in their hearing, with the voice of a Stentor. A mob is not—like other great big wild beasts—always a beast. It is not with him once a mob always a mob, as it is with a war-wolf, once a war-wolf always a war-wolf. Were it so, we should not wait for the Riot Act to fire upon him, but sling him a pill to swallow, of such wondrous potency that he should be “hoist with his own petard.” But soon as this multiform Polypus has fallen into pieces—and he is almost sure to do so within twenty-four hours of his birth at the farthest—the same being of the race of the ephemerals—why, in many cases, each piece of the inexplicable monster becomes not only a quiet citizen, but a not unexemplary Christian. A friend of ours insists that not one man in a million dies without having committed a capital crime; a severe libel, we hold, if the truth be so, either on human nature, or the criminal law of England. Without feeling ourselves necessitated either by experience or observation to acquiesce with that dictum of our wicked friend, who we hope may escape hanging, there can be little doubt that few men deserving the name but have been in a row, and that a row is uterine brother to a mob. Their constituents are sometimes pretty much the same; they differ—by the by, like almost every thing else—but in degrees. In the meal-mob which we described a few pages back, there was the flower of our village population. Had you fired upon it, there had been broken the stalk of rose or lily, full-blown or budding, and there would have been grief both in field and garden. The mob we have been treating of just now was a very different mob indeed—hardly human on the day of election, and many of its members not human yet, nor likely ever to become so,—yet, generally speaking, human, and in the long run, though it will again lose its humanity on passing of the Bill. Even in it, on that day, besides loungers, spectators, lookers-on, bystanders, idlers, amateurs, connoisseurs, et id genus omne, there were doubtless some innocent, some thoughtless, some joyous, some reckless, some drunk, and some dismal souls, incorporated with its brute-bulk, any single one of whom almost under any imaginable circumstances, it would have been as pleasant to a good citizen to knock down, as painful to fracture his skull, and most miserable to shoot through the heart. Here a knave, there a fool—yonder a simpleton who believes in a hell of Gilmerton coal, and by his side an atheist—the bully of a bad-house arm-in-arm with the teacher of a Sunday school—the jail-bird who has broken his parents’ hearts “keeps together in his chivalry” with a journeyman-mason who supports both his widowed mother and his grandmother—that is the heavy head of a thrice-transported felon, who, had he not turned king's evidence, must have been hanged for murder, creating the bright poll of a boy, who last week saved a stranger's life, by leaping, though a poor swimmer, from Leith pier in a surf—and that, we perceive, is a pastry-cook's apprentice, whose greatest guilt, up to this hour, has consisted in being an accomplice of his master's in passing off cat for hare-soup, and kitten for veal-pâtes, cheek-by-jowl with an incendiary worse than Jack the Painter, for he was an instigator of the Kent burnings. Such and such-like is the composition—if sifted by practical moral philosophy—of that mob, which we should be most loath indeed to fire on, for that might be inhuman—and just as loath to pledge ourselves, as the Lord Advocate did that evening, “for their good and peaceable behaviour,” for that would be irrational—and still more loath, for that we know not what to call, to post up, of and to them, in different parts of the city, as the Lord Advocate did on the night following—“The Lord Advocate entreats all who bear him any friendship or respect in this city, to abstain at this time, from any public demonstration of their feeling, and especially to withhold their countenance, either by their presence or otherwise, from any indication of hostility or disrespect to any individuals whatever.” To say no more about mobs—we feel strongly tempted to say a word or two on such sweet entreaty and soft remonstrance, which, did we not know the reverse to be the truth from a hundred quarters, would have gone far to convince us that his lordship is a very selfish and unfeeling personage. But you say that here he was not speaking to the mob? And has he then such friends as could instigate the mob in any way to acts of hostility against the seventeen electors? And deigns he thus to cajole them, instead of flogging their soul friendship from him with a scornful sense of contamination and dishonour? What had “all who bear him any friendship or respect” been doing? Threatening and attempting to commit murder. On whom? Why on those whom his lordship alludes to in that pretty periphrasis, “any individuals whatever”—and who they were is known to all reformers.

But let Juvenal answer Senex if he can. Hear Senex addressing the able Editor of the Edinburgh Advertiser :

“But I wish to call the attention of yourself and the public to the precious placard by the Right Hon. Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of (N. B. it should be for) Scotland, posted up since the riot of Tuesday. This most extraordinary composition, by the First Law Officer of the Crown—an Officer of State—and, since the abolition of the Scots Privy Council, the principal officer of Police in Scotland, begins thus—‘The Lord Advocate intreats all who bear him any friendship or respect in this city to abstain,’ and so on. A second Daniel! but it is a Daniel O’Connell!! What! the Lord Advocate for Scotland does not enjoin and command the people to respect and obey the King’s authority—to keep the King’s peace, and not to invade the persons or property of his Majesty’s peaceable subjects—but he humbly entreats them, out of friendship and respect for him, forsooth,—for him, the late, if not present Editor of the Edinburgh Review!—for him, whom your Correspondent Consistency shews up as the decided enemy ‘of all rash projects—all wholesale reforms—all theoretical system-mongers, who will have every thing or nothing’—(the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill)—out of friendship for Him, to be so good as not again to threaten to throw the Lord Provost over the North Bridge—not again to attempt to break into the Council Chamber—not again to besiege the Councillors there for hours after the election was over—not again to commit the savage outrages of Tuesday night on the constables, soldiers, and yeomanry. In short, to be good boys in future, not in obedience to the laws, but for the sake of Him! Francis Jeffrey!!

“But this is not all. Does the Lord Advocate declare that he will do every thing in his power to discover and bring to justice some of the persons who were observed to be active in the outrages already committed? Oh, no. He is to let bygones be bygones; it is only in case of any repe-tion of their outrages that he tells his friends (for so he designated the mob at his own house) 'That he will co-operate with the civil and military authorities to repress them, and to bring them, as is his peculiar and most important duty, to condign punishment for their offences.' Good! So it is no part of his 'peculiar and most important duty' to bring to condign punishment persons guilty of past rioting, and assaulting persons and property, in proof of their friendship for him, and to show their zeal in his cause? But if they shall ever do so again, when their friendship and zeal can no longer serve him and his cause, then, forsooth, his good friends shall be brought to condign punishment!!

"Is this the man that is fit to be Lord Advocate for Scotland? Is this the man to whom, in times like these, we are to look for wisdom in council—for energy in the exercise of his office—for protection to our lives and properties against infuriated mobs, first inflamed by his own previous writings and speeches, then treated with impunity for past outrages, and only threatened with future punishment for riots, which, perhaps, may have no reference to him or his cause? Was it thus that Lord Advocate Dundas (the last Chief Baron), the gentlest but the firmest of human beings, acted, in order to protect us against Margaret's and other mobs at the commencement of the French Revolution? No, indeed. If the Lord Advocate of those days had acted as the Lord Advocate of this day has done, the question of Reform would have been settled long ago by the British Convention, à-la-mode of Robespierre and Marat."*

But let us hear Senex again, for he is no ordinary old man. If not restrained by modesty, we should call him a second Christopher.

† "Sir,—I have a few remarks to make on the speech of the Right Hon. Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland (at full length, as his friends affect ostentatiously to call him) to the Town Council, at the late election, as reported in your paper.

"In the first place, he denied, that, in the exercise of their privilege of electing a Member of Parliament, the Councillors had a right to vote according to their own opinions of the candidates, or of their principles. You report him to have said, 'that it is a privilege which they are not called on to exercise in their own right;'—and again, 'but as to the Town Council, with great submission, he would say, that they were merely the office-bearers of the Corporation, merely the organs by which it performed certain functions.'

"This is quite new doctrine—that electors are not in reality electors—to decide and vote according to the dictates of their own consciences—but mere organs, puppets, machines, to be moved and guided by the petitions of Mr Jeffrey's friends out of doors.

"Well, be it so. The Town Council are to be considered as mere organs, trustees, as he calls them in another place, for the public. Then, pray, what will his 3000, or 4000, or 5000 ten-pound voters be? They will no doubt be a more numerous body of trustees. But still, according to his argument, as they will form but a very small proportion of the male population of Edinburgh, they will be only organs, or trustees, for the public, and ought not to vote according to their own opinions and consciences, but according to the dictates of 'the one hundred and twenty thousand of the most enlightened and intelligent people to be found within the bounds of the empire.' By the by, this 120,000 enlightened and intelligent people includes, at least, 70,000 or 80,000 women and children; and, of the men, also includes the thousands of most 'enlightened and intelligent people' who acted the dignified part of coach-horses to the Right Hon. Francis Jeffrey, on his return from the election.

"Therefore, according to the principles of the Right Hon. and Learned Lord, his ten-pound voters are only to be the organs of 120,000 enlightened and intelligent non-voters. Now, what is this but universal suffrage in its worst and most mischievous and equivocal shape? If we had universal suffrage, out and out, then there could be no doubt or ambiguity as to the wishes and opinions of the multitude, as each man would signify them unequivocally by his own individual vote.

"But, according to the learned Lord's new principle, that voters are only organs and trustees to echo the sentiments of others, the opinions of those other influential people, those non-voters, and yet virtual and real voters, are to be collected from petitions and counter-petitions, and, probably, in the end, from mobs and counter-mobs, and to be gathered and counted according to the number of broken heads in said mobs.

"In the next place, let us see what the right honourable and learned Lord says on the Reform Bill. 'He would take leave only to say this, that he understood the government did not consider themselves pledged to all the details of the Bill.' Now, sir, I am bound to believe that this is the learned Lord's understanding; but, if so, I believe that it was not the understanding of any one person of the 120,000 enlightened and intelligent people of Edinburgh, nor of any one person in either House of Parliament, who heard the speeches of the Ministers.

"Were they not to stand or fall by the Bill? Did they not ostentatiously put it forth as the offspring of their united and unanimous wisdom? When many of the monstrous absurdities, inconsistencies, and partialities, both in its principle and details, were pointed out by various Members in the House of Commons, did they admit any one of them, or rather did they not defend every one of them to the very last? except that, at the very last, they did admit, in the case of one or two boroughs, that they had fallen into a mistake, owing to the returns of population in some burghs, including the parish to landward, and in others, not. But, in every other respect, they stuck by the Bill, to the very last, in all its details.

"But now, says the learned Lord, Ministers are disposed to free it from many (mark this) of the peculiarities that were held to be objectionable. Peculiarities!! elegant and gentle word! Peculiarities, that is, whereby a thing may be considered as peculiar, which is a very good word! Now, it certainly is peculiar, that this bill, which leaped out of Lord Durham's head, all perfect, like Minerva out of the head of Jupiter, in full panoply of wisdom, is now discovered to have not a few, but many peculiarities! I love to repeat the word. I hope when the learned Lord draws an indictment against some of his 120,000 enlightened and intelligent friends in Edinburgh, who may have committed a crime, that he will not forget to designate it as one of the many peculiarities to which his enlightened friends are sometimes addicted.

"Then, as to Scotland, the Learned Lord says, 'As to the details there might be alterations. The right of voting might be varied—it might be L.10 or L.20—but certainly it would not be raised to the extent of L.100.'

"In short, the plain English of this is, that, instead of the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, we are to have a 'spick and span' new Bill, to use a vulgar but significant expression, and that, as far as Scotland is concerned, the Learned Lord has not yet made up his Right Honourable mind as to what the Bill is to be; Minerva is not yet come to full growth in his majestic head.

"Having done for the present with the Lord Advocate, I have a word or two to say to his master, Earl Grey, and I will convict him of folly and rashness—I had almost said madness, by the example and conduct of Lord Chancellor Brougham in similar circumstances.

"You will remember, sir, that some months ago, the Lord Chancellor introduced into Parliament a Bill for establishing Local Courts of Justice, and Provincial Judges in England, very much on the model of the Sheriff Courts in Scotland.

"Now, how did he act on this occasion? The establishment of these Courts in every county of England and Wales, on the scale of expenses contemplated by him, would have required an allowance to the Judges, Registrars, Clerks, &c., of not less than L.200,000 a-year; therefore it would have been rash to have established all these Courts at once, without any experience whether they really would prove useful or not—and yet, sir, if Lord Brougham had so done, the incurring of unnenecessary expense would have been all the evil; for, if those courts were either found to do harm, or at least to do no good, Parliament, after a few years' experience, could have repealed the act, abolished the courts and the law, and the country would have fallen back exactly into the state it was in before it was passed, under its old jurisdictions of Circuit Courts and Quarter Sessions.

"Lord Brougham, however, did not proceed in this wholesale way—but, with the most statesmanlike caution and prudence, (greater, perhaps, than was to have been expected from his ardent and sanguine mind,) Lord Brougham in his bill, proposed at first to establish these courts only in two counties—Kent, at one end of the island, and Northumberland at the other. By this means the experiment would be fairly tried on a small scale, and, if the experiment succeeded, and those local courts were found to act beneficially in the administration of justice, then they could, by a subsequent act, be extended to the whole kingdom. On the other hand, if the experiment did not succeed, the evil is only local and partial, the expense trifling, and the act could be and would be, of course, repealed."

"Not so proceeds my Lord Grey. He does not cautiously feel his way—he does not apply the principle or the details of his bill, or any one point, on a small scale at first, in such a manner, that, if the measure was found either not to produce the good he predicted, or positively to lead to some or all of the evils predicted by others, it could be amended or repealed."

"No—but with true epic frenzy, he dashes into the midst of things at once—extends his experiment over the whole system—and this, although he must be conscious, that, if he is mistaken in his hopes and expectations, if the experiment fails, and either produces no good, or positive evil, it can never be altered, amended, or recalled. You may withhold a privilege from the people, if you believe that it would prove harmful even to themselves; but once give them a privilege, and nothing but military force can ever deprive them of it. On the contrary, they will use what they have got to acquire greater power in the first instance, blind to the ultimate evils which it may bring on themselves."

"Could not Lord Grey, imitating the prudence of Lord Brougham, have granted members to some great towns—on any principle of elective franchise he pleased, even universal suffrage and vote by ballot? The advantages or disadvantages of such a mode of election could thus have been tried upon a small scale, which, if beneficial or harmless, might have been extended, but which, if found to be hurtful, Parliament would have had, not only the will, but the power to repeal, and vest the right of election in those towns in some other body of voters."

"In the same way, he might have selected one or two counties, and in them have given the right of voting to copyholders, tenants, ten pound gentlemen, or any others he thought best, and have tried for some years how this system worked, and then have extended or repealed it, according to the experience of its effects."

"This is the manner in which any man with common pretensions to be a statesman would have acted. This is the manner in which Lord Brougham set him the example of acting. This is the manner in which even the most rigid anti-reformer would have given him credit for acting, and probably would never have opposed him—for an anti-reformer, sincere in his opinions, would have been glad of a safe opportunity of seeing the evils he predicted verified in practice."

"What should we say of a farmer, who, hearing of a new species of grain, of which he had no experience, should sow at once his whole disposable ground with it, at the risk of losing all, instead of trying it at first on one or two acres? Or what should we say of a physician, who, hearing of a new medicine, of which he had no experience, as a cure for fever, should at once give it to the whole fever patients in an hospital, instead of cautiously trying it on one or two?"

"Yet this is just what Earl Grey has done. He has entered on a path where there is no receding—vestigia nulla retrorsum—facilis descensus Averno—and revocare gradus, hic labor, hic opus est. It is easy for a great country to fall into a democracy; but the rise from it is only to military despotism, which was, and would have continued to be, the fate of France, but for the madness of the despot.—Yours, &c.

Were there a few more new papers in Scotland like the excellent one from which we have quoted these excellent letters, (and which we strenuously recommend to the patronage of all true men,) maintaining the same principles with the same talent and temper—and out of Edinburgh there unfortunately are now none such to our knowledge, except the Glasgow Herald and the Glasgow Courier—both admirable—and the Dumfries Journal, and, may we hope, the Paisley Advertiser—the minds of the lower and middle orders would have an antidote provided against the poison of false notions, and, if we may use an expression which, we believe, is in Junius, false facts, which the ignorant, always credulous, and especially in times of such political excitement, unsuspectingly and greedily swallow from the hands of designing, and dangerous, and wicked men, who, they suppose, are their friends and physicians, but who are the worst of quacks and enemies.

And now, in good earnest, we are about to conclude, and, as we began—and hope likewise continued—in good-humour, at least with ourselves, and about one half of the world. We do not mean that better half which is called the fair sex—but the Tory Segment of the Circle, which is in itself, we firmly believe, were it visible through mist and cloud, at least a semicircle, and yet destined—for we behold it crescent—in clear autumnal nights to expand into the most beautiful of all figures, and, like the full harvest moon, hang like a silver lamp in Heaven.

In bidding farewell—perhaps for ever and a day—perhaps but for a few months—to the Edinburgh Election, allow us to say that the popular candidate may not always be such a man as Mr Jeffrey. When the hustings have been erected at the Cross, the day may come when the mob shall, in preference even to the Lord Advocate, elect some worthless demagogue. Their favour is no secure possession; and rarely has it been long enjoyed by genius and virtue. What measures may be popular with an Edinburgh mob, and what men their idols, after a few sittings of a Reformed Parliament, it is not for Tories like us to prophesy; but this we know, that some of the measures will be such as his Lordship, if faithful to the principles of his past political life, will spurn at with indignation, and some of the men, such as he, a gentleman, would be loath to admit into his society or friendship. Democrats must have their demagogue; but “the Advocate” has few of the good, and none of the bad qualities that might fit a man for that office. For he wants the vulgar nerve and commonplac. decision which may be numbered among the good—and of recklessness, insolence, hypocrisy, and ferocity, which are a few of the bad, and among the most essential, he is as destitute as a child or a gentleman.

The democratic spirit, whether widely extended or not over Scotland, we, who know something of the population, shall not pretend to declare; but certainly it has, within these few weeks, shown itself more undisguisedly, and spoken more violently, than we had ever feared to see or hear among our rural dwellers. The disgraceful conduct of the mob in Lanark, at the county election, kept the Edinburgh mob in countenance, and shewed that the town had stained the country; while gentlemen of birth and education, while pretending to be shocked, or perhaps really so, with the scene in the church, and averse to the murdering of the Tory candidate with broken bottles, held such language in the inn as was admirably calculated to foster the savage spirit that gave rise to such an outrage. But

“The blood of Douglas will protect itself.”

And with that sentiment—which is of general application to all good men—Farewell!

DR PARR AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

No. IV.

ABOUT the year 1789, Dr Parr was involved in two literary broils—the one purely offensive, the other nearly so—though, as usual, the doctor coloured them to his own mind, as measures of just retaliation. The first was his republication of a forgotten pamphlet, written by Bishop Warburton, and afterwards anxiously suppressed by his orders; and to this he united another, “by a Warburtonian,” viz. Bishop Hurd; prefixing to the whole a preface, and a most rhetorical dedication, from his own pen, in which he labours to characterise both the bishops, but especially the living one, in terms that, whilst wearing some shew of justice, should also be as sarcastic and as injurious as possible. The mere act of reviving what the authors themselves had been zealous to suppress, is already sufficiently offensive, and expressive of a spiteful mind, had the preface even been spared. What are we to consider the provocation to a piece of mischief so puerile, and apparently so wanton? Listen to the doctor, and you will suppose that no motive but the purest and most philanthropic had governed him: Leland had been “most petulantly insulted, and Jortin most inhumanly vilified.” Well—and what then? Better men than ever stood upon their pins have been insulted and vilified, nay, hustled, flogged, smashed, and robbed of gold watches and seals. Besides, hard words break no bones. And why could not the two dissenters have settled their own quarrels with the two bishops? In effect, they had done so. Why must Dr Parr intrude his person into the row, long after it was extinct, and when three out of four parties interested were in their graves? Oh, but, says Dr Parr, the example was the thing: neither of the offenders had been punished; and their impunity, if tolerated, would encourage future bishops to the same species of offence. He was resolved to deter others from supposing “that what has been repeatedly and deliberately done in secret, will not, sooner or later, be punished openly.” Finally, coming nearer to the true purpose of the whole, he avows that “it was intended to lessen the number of those who speak too well of Bishop Hurd.”

Vain and tortuous disguises of malice self-betrayed! Now, let us hear the true lurking motives to this almost unprincipled attack, which Dr Parr so studiously masked under pretexts of public purposes. One writer tells us, that Parr, on a visit to Hartlebury, (the Bishop of Worcester’s residence,) had been dismissed with little ceremony, and with hospitable attentions either none at all, or so chilling as to pique his pride. This anecdote, however, we have reason to think, refers to a period subsequent to the original offence. Perhaps this might first arise, as a mutual offence, in a case where the bishop drew upon himself the ferocious resentment of Parr, by his hesitation in passing one of Parr’s friends, then a candidate for holy orders. Even this resentment, however, was possibly no more than the first expression of Parr’s secret mortification at the bishop’s private opinion of his sermon on education. Nothing travels faster in this world than the ill-natured critiques of literary men upon each other; and Parr probably heard from a thousand quarters that Hurd had expressed his dislike to the style, or the preposterous length of this “vernacular sermon.” That this anecdote is true, nobody doubts who remembers the pointed manner in which Parr himself alludes, in his dedication, to Bishop Hurd’s “rooted antipathy to long vernacular sermons from Dr Parr.”

Such are often the true motives even of good men, when their personal feelings are roused. The whole pretence of Parr was a fiction. Jortin and Leland were already avenged: both had retaliated upon Hurd, and, as Parr fancied, with success: the one, he said, had “chastised” Hurd with “wit”—the other had “baffled” him with “argument.” So many outtellings for one crime were out of all rule. “These two excellent men," says Parr, "were not to be annoyed again and again by the poisonous arrows of slander." Neither was this excellent bishop to be "again and again" pulled up to the public bar, and annoyed for having annoyed them. "Tit for tat" all the world over; and if a man, "being sap," as Pistol observes, and also too lively with young blood, will "try conclusions," and perhaps "assault and batter" a leash of worthy men, he must pay. But having paid—(as, suppose, five pounds)—then, at Bow-street or anywhere else, he is held entitled to his five pounds worth of battery. He has bought it, settled the bill, and got a stamped receipt. For them to claim further payment—entitles him to further battery.

But one argument shall put down Dr Parr's pretences. Were Jortin and Leland the only parties to whom Hurd or Warburton had furnished actionable matter? Not by a hundred. They had run a muck at all the men who lay in their path. To go no farther than one of Parr's friends: Bishop Lowth and Hume had been assaulted with more injustice than either of those for whom Parr stood forward. Hurd had called Hume "a puny dialectician." Now this was insolence. Hume, even as a litterator, was every way superior to the bishop; but, as a dialectician, Hume to Hurd was a Titan to a pigmy. The Essay on Necessary Connexion, which was the seed that has since germinated into the mighty forest of German philosophy, was hardly in one sentence within Hurd's comprehension. As to Lowth, we would not quarrel with those who should fasten a quarrel upon him.

But, if that is our way of thinking, it was not Parr's. He was incensed at Hurd for his depreciation of Lowth. He was incensed with him, and justly, for his affected contempt of Hume. He was incensed with another worthy bishop for insidiously calling Lardner "industrious," as though, in raising such a pile as the Credibility of Gospel History, (a work which, to our knowledge, once broke a man's spinal bone, so many and so stout are its volumes!) he had no other merit than that of supporting his "wife and family." Why, then, my Sam, did you not visit for these offences? This question, so far as it regards Hume, Sam answers himself. "Leland and Jortin," says he, "had a right to expect from their clerical opponent a milder and more respectful treatment than that given to a sceptic who scoffed at all the principles of religion." * By no means, doctor; we beg your pardon. Leland and Jortin had a right to fair play; and to so much, every man, Tros Tyrinnere, has the same right. But, once for all, let us hear an answer to this: If Leland and Jortin had a privileged case by comparison with Hume, and a claim upon Hurd's forbearance, much more had Lowth a privileged case as regarded Parr, and a claim, if any man could have, upon his vindictive friendship. For Lowth had been Parr's earliest patron. How comes it, then, that he left Lowth to the protection of Providence? Lowth, it will be said, redressed his own wrongs. True. He did so; but so did all of them—Hume, Jortin, Leland, and the "tottle of the whole." Supposing, therefore, Dr Parr sought a case for his Quixotism, in which he might avenge a man that was past avenging himself, why did he not swing his patron, Lowth, for taking liberties with Richard Bentley? This case was a very bad one; the "petulance" of Hurd could not be worse than the petulance of Lowth; and what a difference in the objects of their attack!

* Dr Parr adds—"and who had endeavoured to loosen the strongest obligations of morality." These words are likely to be overlooked, as though they were thrown in merely to round the rhythmus of the sentence; or (if really significant) importing no more than that relaxation of morals which naturally accompanies the shaking of religious sanctions. But more is meant than this; and there is a mystery in the matter which we cannot fathom. For elsewhere (vol. iii. p. 378), he speaks of the destructive consequences of Hume's Essays "to the moral interests of morality:"—and still more pointedly in another place (on Politics, Jurisprudence, &c. vol. iii. p. 284), he speaks of Hume as having "taught the inconsiderate and the innocent to think with diminished horror not of adultery only, but of other impurities too flagitious to be named." What does he mean?

Finally, let us remember this: Milner, the papist of Winchester, had the audacity publicly to denounce Porteous, bishop of London, as a bigot and a falsifier of facts; Bishop Hoadly and Bishop Shipley, as Socinians; Hallifax, bishop of Durham, as a papist, (thus literally applying to Dr Hallifax the very identical aspersion which he had himself wiped off from Bishop Butler, in his edition of that prelate's works); Dr Rennell as a knave; and the Bishops Barrington, Watson, Benson, and Sparke, as insincere believers in the Protestant faith. This Russian, for such he really was, Dr Parr addressed in a long letter meant for the press. But he never printed his letter; and, now that it is printed, what do we find? An expostulation running over with courtesy, forbearance, and unreasonable concessions; no sneering; no threats. So mild was Dr Parr in defending outraged truth—so furious in avenging his wounded self-love!

Such was the famous attack on Hurd, in its moving impulse. As to its literary merit, doubtless that is very considerable. Perhaps the author of the Pursuits of Literature, went too far in styling it "astonishing and splendid." Assuredly it is in bad taste—not so much for its excess of antithesis, simply considered; that is rightly defended by Mr Field, as a legitimate engine of rhetorical effects; but for the effort and visible straining which are often too palpably put forth, in finding matter suitable for loading the opposite scales of the antithetic balance. However, it is a jeu d'esprit of great ability, and may give to an English reader some notion of the Bellenden Preface.*

The other feud of this period forms a singular chapter in the secret history of books. Dr White, the Oxford Professor of Arabic, had preached and published the Bampton lectures. They were much admired.† All at once a discovery was made, that a part of these lectures had been written by a Mr Badcock, a dissenting minister, recently dead, who latterly conformed to the Church of England. This discovery was made through a bond for £500 given by Dr White to Mr Badcock, which his sister endeavoured to recover, and which the Professor was weak enough to resist. The ground which he took was plausible—that the bond had been given, not for work done, but for work to be done. At the very time when this affair broke out, Dr Parr happened to arrive at Oxford. White was his intimate friend. But it is difficult to imagine a sort of conduct less reconcilable with the obligations of friendship, than that which he adopted. Without delay, or consultation with Professor White, he avowed his peremptory disbelief in Badcock's claim, on the ground that he was himself the contributor of a very considerable share to these lectures. Never did man do a more critical injury to a friend; and were it not that the irritations of jealous vanity, with constitutional incontinency of secrets, seem to have overpowered and surprised his better resolutions, we should be compelled to pronounce it perfidy. Whatever help of this nature one literary man gives to another, carries with it an implied obligation to secrecy; otherwise, what else results than that, under the mask of giving a partial assistance to a friend's literary fame, the writer has, in fact, been furnishing himself with the means of crushing it entirely. He has given a trifle that he might take away the whole; for, after such an exposure,

* It is usually taken for granted, that Hurd had nothing to say for himself in this case, and was on that account discreetly silent. But this is a mistake. He had enough to allege against Jortin and Leland, to have turned the tables on their champion; but his motive for silence was perhaps this: Parr threatened that, if answered, he would come back "again and again" upon the same ground; and, if treated with success, he protested that he would give "no quarter." Now, in such a war, Hurd would have had his hands tied by the restraints of his episcopal dignity.

† Gibbon, in his fifty-second chapter, had spoken of White in high terms: "He sustains," says he, "the part of a lively and eloquent advocate; and sometimes rises to the merit of an historian and philosopher."

a man has credit for nothing as his own. And this injury was, as we have said, critical: coming at the moment of Mr Badcock's claim, about which much doubt prevailed, and was likely to prevail, from the death of the only person who could effectually meet the denial of White, Dr Parr's claim at one and the same time authenticated itself and Badcock's.

Meantime Parr's claim was a true one. Mr Kett (so well known in Oxford by the name of Horse Kett, from his equine physiognomy) thus states the amount of Parr's contributions, and their value: "Whether I consider the solidity of the argument, the comprehension of thought, or the splendour of style, I think them, upon the whole, the most able and elegant parts of the lectures. In point of quantity they are considerable, as they are more than a fifth of the whole, without reckoning the corrected passages. But their intrinsic excellence is such, that any person, with such materials, might not only have obtained a great deal of present applause, but lasting fame. They are in the highest style of composition, as they are of a philosophical and refined cast, and make many of the other parts of the lecture with which they are connected appear nothing more than loose and florid declamation."

Laborious investigations, conferences, and explanations followed; in which, it appears to us, that Dr Parr behaved with little generosity, and White with much duplicity. One incident is remarkable: Dr Parsons of Balliol College, one of the arbitrators or referees, at length withdrew himself from the service he had undertaken, in so pointed a manner as to convince us that he also had very considerable rights of property in these lectures, which his honour or his kindness had obliged him to dissemble; and that, in some one of Parr's reclamations, in making which he relied confessedly on a very vague recollection, or a still vaguer discrimination of styles, he had unintentionally been trespassing on ground which Parsons knew to be his own. This is our private opinion. To the parties interested never was any literary broil so full of vexation.* Cabals were fermenting in Oxford in the interest of White on the one hand, or of Dr Gabriel of Bath on the other: the public journals took up the affair, with their usual imperfect information: private characters suffered: old friendships were dissolved for ever: and, finally, no party reaped either profit or honour from this contest for the proportions of property in a book, which has long since been consigned to oblivion by the world.

But, after all, the worst scandal of this transaction settled not upon any individual so much as upon the professional body of divines in general. That part of the correspondence which got abroad, admitted the public painfully behind the curtain, and exhibited the writers concerting their parts, and arranging their coups-de-théâtre, in a manner but little creditable to their sincerity. They had the air at one time of attorneys, scheming to obtain a verdict for Christianity; at another, of martinetts, arranging the draperies of their costume, or of figurantes, attitudinizing for effect. We must be particularly brilliant, says White, in that part where we attack Gibbon. Alas! for the ancient faith—the primitive devotion—that burned in the evangelists, martyrs, and reformers, in Hilarion or Paul, in Wycliffe or Luther! How little room did that allow for any thoughts about themselves! Dr Parr, however, was no party to this huckatering traffic of devotional feeling, or this manufacture of spiritual thunder. Hypocrisy

* Mr Kett, whose position in Oxford enabled him to overlook the whole game, came to the same conclusion; for in disavowing Dr Parr from coming forward as an active participator in the dispute, he says, "I cannot help considering the whole affair as containing something necessarily injurious to the reputation of all who engage in it." He also admonished the Doctor, "that the unconditional manner in which he gave his assistance, ought to induce him to be silent." What Mr Kett meant by silence, was abstinence from the press; but the same reasons applied to oral communications; and in that sense it was no longer possible for Dr Parr to be silent.

was not his failing: whatever were his religious opinions, his feelings of devotion were thoroughly sincere. But he suffered from the connexion in which his name appeared; and, as regarded the duties of a friend, his character has suffered in this transaction permanently, from his own indiscretions, and the infirmity of his too ungenerous vanity.

To sum up Dr Parr's pretensions as a man of letters, we have already sufficiently acknowledged that his talents were splendid, and fitted, under suitable guidance, to have produced a more brilliant impression on his own age than they really did, and a more lasting one on the next age than they ever will. In his lifetime, it is true, that the applauses of his many pupils, and his great political friends, to a certain extent, made up for all deficiencies on his own part; but now, when these vicarious props are withdrawn, the disproportion is enormous, and hereafter will appear to be more so, between the talents that he possessed and the effects that he accomplished. This result is imputable, in part, to his own want of exertion, and the indulgence with which he shrank from undertaking any labour of great compass or research, the very best of his performances being mere velitations, skirmishes, or academic exercises; and in part, also, it is imputable to a cause less open to moral reproach, viz. the comparative poverty of his philosophic understanding, between which and his talents there was no equilibrium. He gave a bright, and gaudy colouring to truths which were too often trite, mean, or self-evident. And the impression was ineradicable in a keen observer's mind, of a perpetual swell, glitter, and false inflation, beyond the occasion, and without a corresponding activity or power of thought. His architecture was barbaresque—rich in decoration, colossal in proportions, but unsymmetrical, and reposing on no massy foundations. It is very possible, and not uncommon, to have a poor understanding combined with fine talents. We do not say that Dr Parr's understanding was a poor one; but it was not emphatically a fine one, not habitually profound, not philosophically subtle. Unquestionably it was mismatched, in point of natural vigour, with his talents—that is, his powers of giving effect to his thoughts, and realizing his conceptions. The splendours of Burke, yoked, as they were, with the very finest—subtlest—and most combining intellect, that ever yet has been applied to political philosophy, awoke no sense of disparity or false balance in his powers. But in the case of Parr, we feel that, having once tasted the luxury of his periodic sentences, with their ample volume of sound and self-revolving rhythmus—having enjoyed his artful antithesis, and solemn antilibration of cadences—we have had the cream of his peculiar excellencies, and may exclaim with Juvenal, Venimus ad summum fortune, or with Romeo, that it is time to be gone, because “the sport is at the best.”

As to that other cause, which co-operated to the effect we have been stating, Parr's indolence, or unpersevering industry—his excuse was the less, that his stomach was as strong as the shield of Telamonian Ajax, and his spirits, even under attacks of illness, were indomitable, and (as he himself styles them) “lion spirits.” Heavens! what an advantage in that temperament above the general condition of literary men! Coleridge, for example, struggling with the ravages of opium for the last 30 years, and with the res angusta domi, in a degree never known to Parr, has contrived to print a dozen 8vo volumes. And were all his contributions to the Morning Post and Courier collected, and his letters, many and long, together with his innumerable notes on the fly-leaves and margins of books, he would appear to have been a most voluminous author, instead of meriting the reproach which too often we have been fated to hear, of shameful indolence and waste of stupendous powers. Of Dr Parr's very criminal indolence, there was but one palliation: Much of his life had passed in the labours of the school-room; and his leisure from those was excusably turned to purposes of relaxation. Still he had latterly a long period of immunity from toils of every kind; he had a library of above ten thousand volumes; he had increasing wealth; and, for years, he toiled not, neither did he spin. As to his execrable hand-writing, that is rather an explanation than a justification of his sterility. Pretty often he had the aid of volunteer amanuenses: and was he at any time too poor to have paid a secretary? Beginning with some advantages for literary research so much beyond those of Gibbon, in his far greater familiarity with the languages of ancient books, why should Dr Parr, the apologist of universities against Gibbon, not have left behind him a monument of learned industry as elaborate and as useful as his? On the whole, we fear that Dr Parr, as an author, must always be classed with those who have spent their vigour upon ludicra, certamina, and sciomachie, mock fights, mimic rehearsals, and combats, with the momentary exhalations of party madness, rather than upon the "good fight" of a scholar and a Christian, in that eternal war which exists between ignorance and truth, between the world and pure religion; that his knowledge and the sweat of his brow have been laid out upon palaces of ice, incapable of surviving the immediate atmosphere under which they arose, and dissolving with the first revolution of the seasons, rather than upon the massy Roman masonry that might have sustained his influence to a distant posterity. This may seem his misfortune, but then it was a misfortune to have been foreseen. And, for the more intrinsic qualities of his works, it will be ascertained in their very fate that, if their execution was sometimes such as to challenge a permanent interest, their matter was unable to support so great a distinction; and that perhaps, of all known works, they are best fitted to illustrate the critical objection of materiam superabat opus; and finally, with regard to their author, that hardly any writer of age so mature, of education so regular, and of pursuits so solemn and professional, had derived his subjects from occasions so ephemeral, or his excitement from motives so personal.

It remains that we should speak of Dr Parr as a politician and as a divine: and fortunately the transcendent character of the facts will bring those inquiries within the range of a short trial and a self-evident verdict.

First, as a politician. The French Revolution found Dr Parr a Jacobin; found, we say, not made. Of this there is abundant presumption. To give his vote for Wilkes, he faced a situation of considerable risk; he was unwigged, and probably saved his life by escaping through a back window to his horse. Considering that he was then the Reverend Samuel Parr, this argued no trivial sympathy with the seditious agitator. It is true that a constitutional question was at issue in the case of Wilkes's expulsion; but it does not appear that Parr gave his countenance to Wilkes the purist of the constitution, so much as Wilkes the demagogue; and loved him upon the principle laid down by Junius, viz. "so long as he was a thorn in the king's side." Besides, right or wrong in politics, ought an impure scoffer like Wilkes, notoriously the author of a most scandalous and obscene parody, to have commanded the volunteer and ardent support of a clergyman? Was this decent? Such however, were Parr's earliest attachments, and such the lionine ardour with which he displayed them. In a better cause we should have admired his courage; for he seems to have been resolved to go to Brentford, though there had been "as many devils there as tiles upon the roof."

Well, in the fulness of time came the French Revolution. The first persons to sing public parans of congratulation in this country were the dissenters of Birmingham—moving under the domineering influence of Dr Priestley. What followed is known to all whose recollections stretch back to those tumultuous days. Dr Priestley's house was stormed and sacked by the Birmingham mob; his philosophical apparatus (as a private one, matchless) destroyed; his papers, letters, philosophical MSS. scattered to the four winds; and the angry philosopher himself, by a fierce levanter of indignation, driven westwards to America. These scenes passed in too close neighbourhood to Dr Parr, for a temper so combustible as his to escape kindling at the flame of party fury. We may be sure also, that he took the side of Priestley: to the extent of pity for his misfortunes, all good men did so; but as an approver of the conduct which provoked these misfortunes, we may almost venture to say that, amongst the fifteen thousand clergymen of the Church of England, Dr Parr stood altogether alone. Every man of sober mind, whilst he commiserated Dr Priestley as an unfortunate man, and esteemed him as a very ingenious one, could view him in no other light than as the victim of his own folly and misguided passions. Political frenzy had prompted him to acts of defiance against a mob as fanatical in one direction as himself in another; with this difference, however, that their fanaticism pointed to a very much more reasonable policy than the fanaticism of the celebrated experimentalist. The mob had retorted as an insulted and irritated mob are likely to retort. They, who play at bowls, must expect rubbers. And Dr Parr, by mixing in the game, wantonly drew upon himself a participation in the danger—or at least a participation in the terror; for, after all, he seems to have been more frightened than seriously hurt. Grent was his panic; schooled by Dr Priestley's losses, he sent off his books hastily to Oxford. They suffered from the hasty removal; and at Oxford, where they were indifferently sheltered, they suffered still more. This lesson might have done him good service, had his temper allowed him to profit by it. But neither fear nor interest could ever check his fanaticism. With such a temper we may suppose that he was blinded to all sense of his own errors by the dazzling light with which his anger invested the errors of the opposite party. At an after period, the Doctor's cries ascended to heaven in print against the mob and their criminal politics. Yet such is the temper of this world—that, if a grave philosopher, by shaking his fist, and other acts of bravado, should happen to provoke a company of unlucky boys to reply with a shower of stones, people in general suffer their resentment to settle upon the philosopher for his wanton provocation, rather than on the boys for that lapidary style of retort in which their skill naturally expresses itself.

This affair, taken singly, being mixed up with considerations of person and neighbourhood, might, after all, but indifferently represent the condition of Dr Parr's politics. Other ebullitions of his feelings about the same period were less equivocal. On

Mr Burke, for the crime of writing his memorable book on the French Revolution, he inflicted the whimsical punishment of inverting his portrait—that is, suspending it with the head downwards. The insolent tyranny of this act is remarkable. Mr Burke had held up his “protesting hand” against the Revolution; and he, if ever any man upon any question, had explained the philosophic grounds of his protest. It seemed, therefore, that with or without reasons, no dissent was tolerated from Dr Parr's views. For, as to Mr Burke's vehemence, it was no more than the natural warmth of sincerity. Precisely the same sentence of degradation, we believe, was executed upon Mr Windham, and for the same offence. This was intelligible, and equity, if not justice. Equal acts merited equal treatment. But in a third case the same degradation, by greatly extending the construction of guilt, warranted much larger inferences against Dr Parr's motives. This third criminal was Paley; on his portrait, also, sentence of inversion was passed and executed, and for years it hung at Hutton in that position. What then had been Paley's crime? Andi facinus majoris abolla; he had literally been guilty of writing Reasons for Contentment. The title explains its object. At a crisis of universal political irritation, when Paine's works and the French Revolution had diffused a spirit of change, and the indefeasible evils of poverty were made handles of disaffection—being charged upon the institutions of the land, Dr Paley had exerted himself to dissipate all delusions, to rouse the ignorant to a sense of the awful blessings which they enjoyed under equal laws administered by a popular government, and thus to save them as well from secret discontent as from publicly lending themselves to the purposes of designing incendiaries. This was the service which he did, or attempted; and for this only, neither more nor less, he incurred the wrath of Parr; we may add that he was never forgiven. The following record of his feelings, in regard to Paley, he left behind him for publication:—“I never thought Paley an honest man; he had great sagacity, wit, and science; some good humour; but he was vain, inconsistent-one," [odd objections to come from Samuel Parr:] "he was also, it appears * * * [i. e. something too bad for Parr's executors to print,] "and selfish."

No one fact can better illustrate the furious disaffection of Dr Parr. Simply because a man applied his great talents to a purpose of the highest charity, which could no otherwise serve the existing ministers even remotely and mediately, than by first of all serving many thousands of his humble countrymen directly and essentially, he became with Dr Parr a marked man. After this it will not be surprising that even the Whiggish correspondents of Parr found occasion to remind him that England was not the country in sober sadness which it suited their party tactics to represent; that he was interpreting too literally the violences of their public polemics; and that England did in fact continue to be, what she had so long been esteemed by all the world, except her eternal enemies, the ark to which were confided the dearest interests of man.

In 1794, war had begun to rage; the revolutionary frenzy had produced its bloodiest excesses; the gloom had terrifically deepened; and the French reign of terror, by a very natural re-action on all the rest of Europe, produced a corresponding system of vigilance and coercion in all regular governments, which must now be admitted to have been too harsh and despotic, if viewed apart from the extremities of the occasion. Upon questions, which depend for their adjudication upon the particular estimate which is taken of the impending dangers, there is room for great latitude of opinion amongst honest men. Constitutionally, and from mere differences of bodily temperament, men of the sanest judgments take radically different views of the very broadest cases that can arise; and starting as he did from Whiggish principles, Dr Parr is entitled to a large indulgence in his construction and valuation of Mr Pitt's policy. We can allow, therefore, most readily for the fervour of interest which he took; not merely as a private friend to some of the parties concerned, but also as a politician, in the state trials which occurred at that period. For poor Gerrald, as a splendid pupil of his own, as an unfortunate man betrayed into calamity by generous enthusiasm, and as a martyr of most disinterested indignations, he was entitled to feel the very warmest concern. We ourselves, of principles so adverse to Dr Parr's, are of opinion that Gerrald was most harshly, nay, unconstitutionally, treated. He was tried under a superannuated law of Scotland, which had arisen out of another condition of things, and was never meant for our times; it was a mere accident that such a law should be unrepealed; and a verdict was obtained against him that the rest of the empire could not have countenanced. This was a case beyond any other to merit a pardon, even in the view of those who thought Mr Gerrald a turbulent democrat, since undoubtedly the verdict was in some measure obtained surreptitiously. Conduct that, on one side the Border, was punishable with transportation; on the other, was confessedly, at the very utmost, a misdemeanour. Under these circumstances, to have enforced the sentence, and to have thrown a man of genius and a scholar into the society of ruffians, and the very refuse of jails—was doubtless a harsh course. Warmth, therefore, and earnestness might be expected from Dr Parr, in behalf of his unhappy friend. But nothing short of childish defect of self-government, could have allowed Dr Parr to insult the very person to whom he looked for a mitigation of the sentence. Yet this he did. Writing to Mr Windham, as Secretary of State, for the exertion of his influence with Mr Pitt, he told him with a bullying air that Mr Gerrald was as able a man as Mr Pitt, and a great deal more learned. What followed? Mr Windham had been acquainted with the Doctor, and was the very man to have felt for the peculiar hardship of Mr Gerrald's case. But of an application in this spirit he could not allow himself to take any favourable notice; a formal official answer was returned; and Mr Gerrald's sentence was permitted to take its course. From this we infer, that Dr Parr's political enthusiasm had then risen to the height of fanaticism, which set at nought all ordinary discretion.

However, the truth must be told: the first anti-Gallican war, though supported (as we shall always maintain) by the élite of British society, by the property and education of the land, did not unite all hearts in its cause. There was still room left for honest recusants; though it is undoubtedly true, that most of those who did actually stand forward conspicuously in that character, were so upon any but laudable motives. Unless where they happened to be betrayed by natural defects of discretion, and original incapacity for calculating consequences—a case which we believe to be that of Dr Parr—nearly all the sturdy recusants to Mr Pitt's policy moved upon the very worst impulses of anti-national feeling. Pitifully blind they were in some rare instances; but in more, desperately unpatriotic. Still we repeat that room was left for honest dissent up to a certain point; and there are not a few, even now, amongst those whose patriotism was never tainted, and who gave to Mr Pitt the fullest benefit of their accession as regarded principles, that yet question the policy of a military league against the infant republic of France—as that which in effect, by furnishing the occasion for resistance, finally developed her yet unconscious strength.

But a few short years sufficed to place all this upon new foundations. If ever, in this world, a nation had one heart and one soul, it was the British nation in the spring of 1803. A poet, who had deeply protested against the first French war, at this crisis exclaimed, addressing the men of Kent—

"We all are with you now from shore to shore!"

No need of sagacity at this time: blind instinct was sufficient to develop the views of the Consular government, and to appreciate the one sole policy which circumstances commanded. And here it was the Whigs (we mean the Whigs in Parliament) lost themselves, and riveted that national distrust which had first commenced with the schism in the Whig Club. They would not change their tone; they would not open their eyes to the new state of things; but continued to palliate the worst atrocities of the enemy, and to prophesy a long heritage of shame and defeat for ourselves. At that period it was many times remarked, that the long habit of expressing sympathy with the national foes, insensibly moulded the feelings of the Opposition to a tone of bitterness against a nation that spurned their abject counsels, and of too evident mortification at the spectacle of our military triumphs. To prophesy evil is an unwise course for any man; it gives his vanity, and perhaps his personal enmities, an interest in the national disasters, and at all events disturbs the strength of his patriotic sympathies. Strange as it may sound, there have been Englishmen to whom it was thought necessary by their families cautiously to break the shock of the great news of Waterloo, so violent was the grief anticipated at the final prostration of their idol. We could mention one man, well-known in his day as a miscellaneous author, and not an unamiable man (though a coxcomb) in his character of literary patron, who, being accidentally at a dinner party on the day when that mighty catastrophe reached Norfolk, was kept in ignorance of the news by an arrangement concerted separately with each of the guests as he arrived; it was understood that this precaution was requisite to ensure his attendance at dinner.

No such case ever has occurred in France. The martial successes of France in the days of Louis XIV., when the unhappy Palatinate was given up to desolation, obtained the cordial sympathy of the whole people, no less than the still more atrocious acts of Napoleon. No excess of profligacy and injustice has ever damped the unity of patriotic joy amongst the French: no sanctity of defensive warfare was ever availed to ensure it amongst the English. And, generally, this may express no more than that freedom of thought amongst ourselves, which presents all public topics under every variety of phasis. But as there are cases in morals upon which good feeling precludes all variety of judgment, so in politics there are rare crises upon which the good and evil of posterity are essentially depend, and, above all, which touch national honour in so capital a point, that any diversity of feeling is irreconcilable with just moral feeling. Absolute conformity is required to the national policy, and no toleration exists for dissenters of any class.

Such a case existed from 1803 to 1815, and more eminently than ever before in the history of mankind. What was Dr Parr's behaviour? We shall not go into it at length: to see a good man wandering so grievously from the path of his clear duty, is afflicting; and a few instances will tell in what channel his feelings ran. In the spring of 1814, when all Christendom was exulting in the approaching destruction of the destroyer, Dr Parr writes thus to Mr Coke:—"My indignation at the English government, as the real and implacable disturbers of the peace of Europe, increases daily and hourly; and from that malignant spirit which began to act in 1793, and is now reinforced by the accession of such an auxiliary as the Prince Regent, I forbode the most disastrous consequences. My fear is, that the allies will be overruled by the earnestness, or cajoled by the bribes, of the Prince Regent and his minions."—"So then, upon this view of things, Jena, Austerlitz, Borodino,—the outrages upon Spain, Portugal, Germany, Russia, were not French, but British acts. But patience!

In what way it was that Dr Parr received the Waterloo news, we learn from no express record; but indirectly, we can easily collect it. About two months before that battle, he anticipated such an event as what was most to be abominated. The horizon already reddened with the dawn of that coming retribution—already it was believed that to England, in reward of her matchless perseverance, would be assigned the exterminating sword, and Dr Parr—sharing the belief, but abjuring the moral hopes of the time—sickens at the prospect. Worse than this we cannot say of any man. We may add, however, that his condition of feeling on these subjects continued pretty uniform. He ~~was~~ violently against assassination, and the exception often urged in favour of tyrannicide. But how exclusively the benefit of even this doctrine was applied to our enemy, may be judged by this:—Mr Percival was murdered by a man whom he did not know by sight; Dr Parr's attention is attracted by no one consideration but the excuses which might be offered for the assassin. The Duc de Berri is murdered without even the shadow of a provocation; Dr Parr assures his correspondent that he (not the murderer, as one would naturally wish to understand the passage, but the murdered prince) was a "vulgar ruffian." Again, as another illustration of his fanatic violence, Mr Hone publishes parodies on the Scriptures; as a politician after his own heart, though in a conscious opposition to the decurms of his sacred profession, and to his own sincere reverence for religion, Dr Parr encourages and sanctions him by a money subscription. And we find the Duke of Bedford, who forfeited the distinction of representing his sovereign in his own county, solely by a participation in the same expression of approbation, directly justifying his conduct (upon which in some views he felt a doubt), by Dr Parr's example. We might accumulate many more examples, but enough is here cited to shew, that, as a politician, Dr Parr stood aloof from his country in the hour of her most memorable trials, and dishonoured his grey hairs by absolute fanaticism, that lost sight finally even of his religious principles.

This leads us to the view of Dr Parr as a divine, in which it had been our intention to shew that in every part of his life he allowed the principles of his theology to be biased by his political prejudices. Dissenters of all classes were welcome to him, whether their dissent began originally upon religious or political views, because in any case it terminated in hostility to the State. Upon examining Dr Parr's sermons, we find too little of a regular chain or system of religious principles to sustain the review which we meditated: and of the correspondence yet published, too small a part turns upon religious questions to do much in supplying this defect. We shall content ourselves for the present, therefore, with observing, that, whilst he dwelt with ludicrous self-congratulation upon the support he gave to orthodoxy in the purest trifles, he really betrayed the interests of his church in its two capital interests, as against the Roman Catholics on the one hand, and the Socinians on the other. Long and laboured were his pleadings for the Roman Catholics, and for the relaxation of the penal laws against them, in his notes upon Mr Fox's History; and on the other hand he attacked the Archbishop of Dublin, otherwise a friend and admirer, in a rancorous tone, for denying the title of Christianity (in which denial he is countenanced by many a score of learned and pious men) to Socinianism. Finally, he left for posthumous publication, a printed record of his dissatisfaction with Anti-Socinian and Anti-Arian arguments: and he has left repeated evidence, apart from his known leaning to Socinian views, that he had not in any stage of his life adopted any system at all which could properly class him with the believers in the Trinity.

Dr Parr in one point shewed himself superior to a popular error: even Archbishop Laud, but more memorably another Primate (Wake) of the following century, had fallen into the weakness of supposing that the English church and the Gallican could terminate their differences as if by a compact of mutual concession. But no treaty of politics could restore the real "Catholic unity;" no remedy could in that way be applied to the evils of schism in the Christian church. Towns and territory may be the subject of cession, but not truth. And of this Dr Parr was fully sensible. Yet in other aspects of the same weak passion for a hollow name of peace, Dr Parr was often as blind as others. Pity that he had not more uniformly remembered the spirit of a maxim which he sometimes quoted from Grotius—that he so loved peace, as not to sacrifice the truth. He persuaded himself often that the differences of men in religious matters were in a large proportion verbal; a common, a very common, but a very shallow maxim. On the contrary, from our earliest days we have remarked, that for one verbal dispute which passes for a real one, there are ten disputes turning upon things which are generally dismissed as verbal. "Tu sis," says Boileau,

"Tu sis dans une guerre si triste et si longue, Périr tant de Chrétiens—martyrs d'une diphthongue."

Martyrs of a diphthong! Yes. But Boileau, as much as any body, maintained that this single diphthong was the occasion that the church "sentit—trembler la verité Chretienne:" the whole peculiar truth of Christianity reposed upon that one diphthong—for it made the whole difference between the Catholic quæres and the Arian quæres: so mighty are the differences which may be caused, not by a word only, but even by a syllable; and so truly did Boileau, therefore, characterise even that as "une syllabe impie." (Sate xii.)

We have questioned the systematic perfection—the orbicularity (so to speak) of Dr Parr's classical knowledge. Much more certainly might we question the coherency, as a whole, of his divinity. What he adopted in this department was taken up casually and independently: his theology was not the fruit of laborious investigation at the fountain-heads. They were gleaned here and there, separately, by fragments, from chance authors, and not finally fused or harmonized.

Finally, and as the sum of our appreciation, we should say, that, speaking of him as a moral being, Dr Parr was a good and conscientious man, but (in a degree, which sometimes made him not a good man) the mere football of passion. As an amiable man, we must add that, by the testimony of his best friend, he was a domestic nuisance; he also, as well as his father, says Dr Johnstone, was "the tyrant of the fireside." As a scholar, he was brilliant; but he consumed his power in agonistic displays, and has left no adequate monument of his powers. As a politician, he sank his patriotism in the spirit of a partisan; and forgot to be an Englishman, in his fanaticism for the ultra-Whigs. And, last of all, as a divine, for the sake of those sectaries whom charity enjoined him to tolerate, he betrayed that church which it was his holiest duty to defend.

NOTE.

The errors of the press, and the errors of the redacteur himself, are very serious in Dr Johnstone's large and costly work. Let us take the liberty of counselling him, if from Torlea he will accept counsel, to change the whole form of his labours—in German phrase to reproduce them in an umbearbeitung, or thorough recast on the following plan, as soon as ever the sale of the present arrangement shall have been sufficient to warrant him in doing so. Complying with this or some similar proposal, he will at once consult Dr Parr's interests as a man of letters, and will do that service to scholars which they have almost a right to demand of him. First of all, let the sermons be dismissed; they load the edition, and hang heavily upon its circulation, with no apparent benefit of any kind; none of them have ever been popular, or in the eye of the public, except the Spital Sermons; and those of course have a special privilege of reprieve. The sermons are liable to the continual suspicion of being in part only of Dr Parr's composition, from his known practice (which he even avowed) of interweaving auxiliary passages from divines who happened to meet his own views, or, in some instances, of deriving his whole groundwork from others, and simply running variations of his own, many or few, upon his adopted theme. It is possible (but the public are not aware in what degree) that the sermons selected for publication may be free from this particular objection; but at all events, as a body, the readers of sermons are too devout a class to find their own peculiar taste gratified in a collection breathing the Parrian spirit of religion:—par exemple, one sermon undertakes the defence of hunting, and might very properly have come from one of the brilliant brothers of the Melton Mowbray establishment. This having been preached in the morning, we see no reason why the evening service should not have brought us an apology for steeple-chases—which seem even to have the advantage in this point—that such matches never lose sight of the church. Certain it is, that the sermons, whether otherwise of merit or not, are in this respect faulty, that they do not contemplate any determinate audience; professedly, indeed, they are parish discourses; and yet they deal with topics foreign to the needs and sympathies of a plain rural congregation, sometimes even inaccessible to their understandings. Doubtless all farmers would understand the hunting sermon; but how many would enter in any sense into the question of Christ's descent into Hades? However, we need not discuss the value of the sermons more particularly; good or bad, they are now printed for those who want them; and they are certainly not wanted by the vast majority of scholars—none of whom, in any country, but would put some value on the philological speculations of Dr Parr—and, according to their feeling and taste, all connoisseurs in Latin composition would be glad to possess so brilliant an éminence in rhetoric as the Bellenden Preface. Thus, therefore, let the new edition stand; reprint all Dr Parr's critical tracts, essays, or fragments, and of course, not omitting (as Dr Johnstone has done, with no intelligible explanation, vol. i. p. 548), the long investigation of the word sublime (already much abridged by Dugald Stewart), nor the various reviews of classical works contributed to literary journals by Dr P.—when they happen to be of any value.* Even the letters, when they discuss critical questions, should be detached from the main body of miscellaneous correspondence, and united by way of appendix to the rest of the critical matter. Points of criticism, it is true, in the letters, are rarely insulated from other matter, which would become irrelevant in its new situation; but this objection might be met by confining the extracts strictly to those passages which are critical, and printing them as so many separate notices or memoranda—under the title of Adversaria. This would be accumulated in one large volume, which, by means of a separate titlepage, might be sold as a distinct work; and, by means of a general one, might also take its place as one section of Dr Parr's general works. These would perhaps compose two more volumes, each offering the same recommendation to separate purchasers—one being made up of the very élite of his essays on political or moral subjects, the other of his rhetorical bravuras.

* We say this, because the review of Combe's Horace, which Dr Johnstone has published, is chiefly occupied with trifling typographical minutiae; the obscure diligence of the corrections is quite unworthy of a scholar's pen, and unprofitable to any class of readers.

HYMN OF THE MOUNTAIN CHRISTIAN.

BY MRS HEMANS.

"Thanks be to God for the Mountains."—Howitt's Book of the Seasons.

For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!
 Thou hast made thy children mighty,
 By the touch of the mountain sod.
 Thou hast fix'd our ark of refuge
 Where the spoiler's foot ne'er trod;
 For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!

We are watchers of a beacon
 Whose lights must never die;
 We are guardians of an altar
 Midst the silence of the sky;
 The rocks yield founts of courage
 Struck forth as by thy rod—
 For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!

For the dark, resounding heavens,
 Where thy still small voice is heard,
 For the strong pines of the forests,
 That by thy breath are stirr'd;
 For the storms on whose free pinions
 Thy spirit walks abroad—
 For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!

The royal eagle darteth
 On his quarry from the heights,
 And the stag that knows no master,
 Seeks there his wild delights;
 But we for thy communion
 Have sought the mountain sod—
 For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!

The banners of the chieftain
 Far, far below us waves;
 The war-horse of the spearman
 Cannot reach our lofty caves;
 Thy dark clouds wrap the threshold
 Of freedom's last abode;
 For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!

For the shadow of thy presence
 Round our camp of rock outspread;
 For the stern defiles of battle,
 Bearing record of our dead;
 For the snows, and for the torrents,
 For the free heart's burial sod,
 For the strength of the hills we bless thee,
 Our God, our fathers' God!

THE HIGHLANDER'S RETURN.

BY BRITA.

YOUNG Donald Bane, the gallant Celt, unto the wars had gone,
 And left within her Highland home his plighted love alone;
 Yet though the waves between them roll'd, on eastern Egypt's shore,
 As he thought of Mhairi MacIntyre, his love grew more and more.

It was a sullen morning when he breathed his last adieu,
 And down the glen, above his men, the chieftain's banner flew;
 When bonnets waved aloft in air, and war-pipes scream'd aloud,
 And the startled eagle left the cliff for shelter in the cloud.

Brave Donald Bane, at duty's call, hath sought a foreign strand,
 And Donald Bane amid the slain hath stood with crimson brand;
 And when the Alexandrian beach with Gallie blood was dyed, Stream'd the tartan plaid of Donald Bane at Abercromby's side.

And he had seen the Pyramids, Grand Cairo, and the bay
 Of Aboukir, whereon the fleet of gallant Nelson lay;
 And he had seen the Turkish hosts in their barbarian pride,
 And listen'd as from burial fields the midnight chacal cried.

Yes, many a sight had Donald seen in Syrian deserts lone,
 To many a shore had Donald been, but none that match'd his own;
 Amid the dates and pomegranates, the temples and the towers,
 He thought of Albyn's clifly huts, begirt with heather flowers.

So joyous beat the soldier's heart again from deck to see,
 Rising from out the German wave, the island of the free;
 And stately was his step when crowds, with plaudits from the main,
 Welcom'd once more to Britain's shore its heroes back again!

Hush'd was the war-din that in wrath from coast to coast had roar'd,
 And stay'd were slaughter's beagle fangs, and sheath'd the patriot sword,
 When—'twas the pleasant summer time—arose in green again,
 His own dear Highland mountains on the sight of Donald Bane.

Four years had lapsed in absence, wherein his steps had ranged
 'Mid many a far and foreign scene, but his heart was unstranged;
 And when he saw Argyle's red-deer once more from thicket flee,
 And again he trod Glen-Euve's sod, a mountainer was he!

There stood the shieling of his love, beneath the sheltering trees,
 Sweet sang the lark, the summer air was musical with bees;
 And when he reach'd the wicket porch, old Stumach sawning fain,
 First nosed him round, then licked his hand—'twas bliss to Donald Bane.

His heart throbb'd as he entered—no sound was stirring there,—
 And in he went, and on he went, when behold his Mhairi fair!
 Before her stood the household wheel unwhisperous, and the thread
 Still in her fingers lay, as when its tenuous twine she led.

He stood and gazed, a man half crazed—before him she reclined
 In half unkerchief'd loveliness—the idol of his mind;
 Bliss was the sleep of innocence, as to her dreams were given Elysian walks with him she loved, amid the bowers of Heaven!

He gazed her beauties o'er and o'er—her shining auburn hair,
Her ivory brow, her rosebud mouth, her cheek carnation'd fair;
Her round white arms, her bosom's charms, that, with her breathing low,
Like swan-plumes on a ripply lake heaved softly to and fro.

He could no more—but, stooping down, he clasp'd her to his soul,
And from the honey of her lips a rapturous kiss he stole :—
As hill-deer bound from bugle sound, swerved Mhairi from her rest,
It could not be—oh, yes, 'tis he!—and she sank on Donald's breast.

What boots to tell what them befell—or how, in bridal mirth,
Blithe feet did bound to music's sound, beside the mountain hearth,
Or how the festal cup was drain'd on hill side and on plain,
To the healths of lovely Mhairi, and her faithful Donald Bane.

THE MISER'S GRAVE.

BY THE FITTRICK SHEPHERD.

SCENE—A churchyard—A deep grave—GABRIEL the Sexton, and his Assistant TEDDY, resting beside it.

GABRIEL.

Go, bring the pullies, Teddy. We must dip
Full five feet deeper. Bargain's bargain, boy,
And mine's a good one. Bring the pullies, Ted.

TEDDY.

Tuts! 'tis deep enough already. Wherefore sink
The old man to the centre of the earth?
He'll ne'er get up again.

GABRIEL.

Fool as thou art,
And greater I met never; thou hast hit
The Miser's estimate, else I mistake.
He wants to be pass'd over—quite forgot,
And never missed amid the motley throng
At the great day of final retribution.
He deems the angel of the resurrection
Will only dig to such a certain depth—
No farther.

TEDDY.

'That's most odd! Perhaps he's right.

GABRIEL.

There you're yourself again! Dolt! gaping fool!
Fall on and work. Thought lies beyond thy grasp.

TEDDY.

Nay, tell me all about it. I like well
To hear about such odd and foolish people
That have no sense. Tuts! what could the man mean
To be a Miser? Where's the sense in that?

GABRIEL.

O most wise youth! Most sapient! Most profound!—
"A Daniel come to judgment!" Come, sit down,
And I will draw thee such a portraiture
Of human nature, as the like, perhaps,
Was never modelled by his Maker's image.

TEDDY.

Tuts, man ! I know not that. Pray, wasn't the Devil
Formed by his Maker's image ?—There I have you.

[Laughs and rubs his hands.

GABRIEL.

A Daniel, as I live ! A Solomon !
But list to me, dear Teddy. I would drive
Something into your head that may avail you.

TEDDY.

It shall. I'll write a Poem on't, or Play—
Yes, it shall be a Play—THE MISER'S GRAVE !
That's grand.

[Rubbing his hands, and chuckling.

The title will secure a ready market
Into the Annuals. Pringle has applied.
I don't like Pringle, he's too finical,
And so pragmatical about his slaves.
I'll try the German Shovel-board. He pays.
Or Hall—But then his wife's the devil there !
And Watts is ruin'd by false self-conceit.
THE MISER'S GRAVE ! 'Tis grand !

[Reaching himself.

A lucky hit.

Nay, after all, I think I shall reduce it
Into a Paraphrase. I like religion best.

GABRIEL.

Quite right, profound logician ! Stay thy plans
Of literary glory for a space ;
And here's a lesson for the earth-born worm,
So deep engraven on the meagre platen
Of human frailty, so debased in hue,
That he who dares peruse it needs must blush
For his own nature. The poor shrivell'd wretch,
For whose lean carcass yawns this hideous pit,
Had nought that he desired in earth or Heaven—
No God, no Saviour, but that sordid pelf,
O'er which he starved and gloated. I have seen him
On the exchange, or in the market-place,
When money was in plenteous circulation,
Gaze after it with such Satanic looks
Of eagerness, that I have wonder'd oft
How he from theft and murder could refrain.
'Twas cowardice alone withheld his hands,
For they would grasp and grapple at the air.
When his grey eye had fixed on heaps of gold,
While his clench'd teeth, and grinning, yearning face,
Were dreadful to behold. The merchants oft
Would mark his eye, then start and look again,
As at the eye of basilisk or snake.
His eye of greyish green ne'er shed one ray
Of kind benignity or holy light
On aught beneath the sun. Childhood, youth, beauty,
To it had all one hue. Its rays reverted
Right inward, back upon the greedy heart
On which the gnawing worm of avarice
Preyed without ceasing, straining every sense
To that excruciable and yearning core.

Some thirteen days ago, he comes to me,
And after many sore and mean remarks
On men's rapacity and sordid greed,
He says, "Gabriel, thou art an honest man,
As the world goes. How much, then, will you charge

And make a grave for me, fifteen feet deep?"—

"We'll talk of that when you require it, sir."—

"No, no. I want it made, and paid for too; I'll have it settled, else I know there will be some unconscionable overcharge.

On my poor friends—a ruinous overcharge."—

"But, sir, were it made now, it would fill up each winter to the brims, and be to make twenty or thirty times, if you live long."—

"There! There it is! Nothing but imposition! Even Time must rear his stern, unyielding front, And holding out his shrivell'd skeleton hand, Demands my money. Nought but money! money! Were I coin'd into money I could not half satisfy that craving greed of money.

Well, how much do you charge? I'll pay you now,

And take a bond from you that it be made

When it is needed. Come, calculate with reason—

Work's very cheap; and two good men will make

That grave at two days' work; and I can have Men at a shilling each—without the meat—

That's a great matter! Let them but to meat,

'Tis utter ruin. I'll give none their meat—

That I'll beware of. Men now-a-days are cheap,

Cheap, dogcheap, and beggarly fond of work.

One shilling each a-day, without the meat.

Mind that, and ask in reason; for I wish

To have that matter settled to my mind."—

"Sir, there's no man alive will do't so cheap

As I shall do it for the ready cash,"

Says I, to put him from it with a joke.

"I'll charge you, then, one-fourth part of a farthing

For every cubic foot of work I do,

Doubling the charge each foot that I descend."—

"Doubling as you descend! Why, that of course.

A quarter of a farthing each square foot—

No meat, remember! Not an inch of meat,

Nor drink, nor dram. You're not to trust to these.

Will stand that bargain, Gabriel?"—"I accept."

He struck it, quite o'erjoy'd. We sought the clerk,

Sign'd—seal'd. He drew his purse. The clerk went on Figuring and figuring. "What a fuss you make!

'Tis plain," said he, "the sum is eighteenpence."—

"'Tis somewhat more, sir," said the civil clerk—

And held out the account. "Two hundred round,

And gallant payment over." The Miser's face

Assumed the cast of death's worst lineaments.

His skinny jaws fell down upon his breast;

He tried to speak, but his dried tongue refused

Its utterance, and cluck'd upon the gum.

His heart-pipes whistled with a crannell'd sound;

His knell-knees platted, and his every bone

Seem'd out of joint. He raved—he cursed—he wept—

But payment he refused. I have my bond,

Not yet a fortnight old, and shall be paid.

It broke the Miser's heart. He ate no more,

Nor drank, nor spake, but groan'd until he died;

This grave kill'd him, and now yearns for his bones.

TEDDY.

Then you have murder'd him. That's flat, I tell you.

I know the law! If one man kills another

By word of mouth, that's murder pat!

I know the law, and say you've murder'd him.
How I should like to see you hung for it!

[Rubs his hands and laughs.]

GABRIEL.

But worse than all. 'Tis twenty years and more
Since he brought home his coffin. On that chest
His eye turn'd over and anon. It minded him,
He said, of death. And as he sat, by night
Beside his beamless hearth, with blanket round
His shivering frame, if burst of winter wind
Made the door jangle, or the chimney moan,
Or crannied window whistle, he would start,
And turn his meagre looks upon that chest;
Then sit upon't, and watch till break of day.

Old wives thought him religious—a good man!
A great repentant sinner, who would leave
His countless riches to sustain the poor.
But mark the issue. Yesterday, at noon,
Two men could scarcely move that ponderous chest
To the bedside to lay the body in.
They broke it sundry, and they found it framed
With double bottom! All his worshipp'd gold Hoarded between the boards! O such a worm
Sure never writhed beneath the dunghill's base!
Fifteen feet under ground! and all his store
Saug in beneath him. Such a heaven was his.

Now, honest Teddy, think of such a wretch,
And learn to shun his vices, one and all.
Though richer than a Jew, he was more poor
Than is the meanest beggar. At the cost
Of other men a glutton. At his own,
A starveling. A mere scrub. And such a coward,
A cozenier and liar—but a coward,
And would have been a thief—But was a coward!

TEDDY.

Tuts! who would be a coward? He that fears
Aught under heaven, I count him not a man.
I wonder what could make the wretch a coward?
There was no sense in it! I hate a coward!

GABRIEL.

And I despise him. Prithee, Ted, go down
Into that pit; let me remain above.

TEDDY.

Why, man, think you I'm mad? If that there grave
Should burst in over me, and bury me
Alive beneath a mountain, I know naught
Could be more curstly disagreeable.

GABRIEL.

And yet you hate a coward odiously?

TEDDY.

Tuts, man! I but said a man should not Fear aught beneath the heavens; I did not say
Beneath the earth. Step down, and take your chance;
You're well paid for it.—If that there pit should burst
Above him now, it would be excellent sport!

[Exit laughing, and rubbing his hands.]

ON PARLIAMENTARY REFORM AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

No. VI.

It was said by Lord Liverpool, and it has been repeated by the Duke of Wellington, "that there was no part of the world so well-conditioned as Scotland;" none in which wealth has made, within the last half century, such rapid progress, industry so generally prevailed, and the condition of the lower orders has been so generally comfortable. Political discontent did not exist—the fumes of Radicalism had been dissipated—and the labouring classes, comfortable and prosperous, had ceased to disquiet themselves for the elevation of their Whig superiors. The increasing wealth of the country was manifested by the prodigious augmentation of the revenue—the tolls of the county of Mid-Lothian produced a larger annual revenue than the whole land-tax of Scotland at the Union; and the clear revenue yielded to the Treasury of Great Britain, from this northern and sterile region, was just as much as was abstracted from the exchequer of the empire, by the fertile, populous, and untaxed kingdom of Ireland.* While the peace of the latter country could not be preserved by a garrison of 17,000 men; hardly 1200 soldiers were stationed in Scotland, whose services were never required but for parade and reviews; and notwithstanding the immense increase of its manufacturing industry, the whole poor's rates of the kingdom did not amount to L.100,000 a-year. Blessed with an admirable and stable system of paper currency, which her people had the firmness to rescue from the grasp of theoretical politicians—the industry and cultivation of the country had steadily and rapidly increased, even during the years of depression which followed the war; and the tempest which shook the country to its centre, passed almost innocuous over the green mountains and fertile valleys of Scotland.

No one in Scotland was thinking of Reform, except the Jacobins, in whose breasts it had fermented ever since 1793, and the leaders of the Whigs, who clung to it as a lever, whereby, in periods of excitement, to rouse the spirit on which they hoped to rise into power. There is no man in the country who is not perfectly aware of that fact. No petitions on Reform were presented to Parliament—no public meetings on the subject were held in the country. Even the democratic press but seldom reverted to the hopeless topic. The Whig leaders in Parliament, where nine-tenths of the assembly are perfectly ignorant of the state of public feeling in this country, have indeed, for party purposes, asserted the reverse, and the popular orators have re-echoed the cry; but there is no man who will support the proposition in private and rational conversation on this side of the Tweed.

Such was the state of this kingdom when the Reformers took it in hand. Blessed with the most perfect health, it stood in no need of the prescriptions of the physician—it is now threatened with convulsions from the arts of the empiric.

The Reformers, if they have done nothing more, have at least succeeded in rousing the lower orders in Scotland against the higher. The ruinous distinction of Patrician and Plebeian, almost extinct since the year 1793, has been revived with redoubled force, by the violence and intemperance of the latter party—civil discord, hitherto unknown, has broke forth since the passions of the people were roused by the prospect of political power; and the happy appearance of an united people is exchanged for the melancholy spectacle of one-half of the citizens armed against the other.

First, in obedience to the mandate of the Political Union Society, the po-

* The land-tax of Scotland was L.47,000. The tolls of Mid-Lothian are now L.46,000. The clear annual revenue remitted from Scotland is L.4,200,000. The charges of Ireland, including the interest of its debts, are L.4,300,000, over and above the whole trifling revenue raised in that island.

palace of the metropolis resolved to have an illumination in honour of the second reading of the Reform Bill. Not a single dragoon was at Piershill barracks. The idea of military force being required at Edinburgh, had never occurred till the country had been agitated by the reformers. The magistrates, destitute of any force, either to stem the torrent or preserve the public peace, were compelled to yield. Concessions and conciliation were tried to their fullest extent to the Sovereign multitude; not a soldier was on the streets of Edinburgh that night; the yeomanry even were not called out; the boasted civic virtues of the Scotch workmen were allowed a fair theatre for their display. The consequence was that a lawless rabble, consisting of many thousand persons, traversed all the principal streets of the city for several hours, demolishing the windows of every person who did not choose to light up in honour of the destruction of the constitution: seven hundred of the best houses in Edinburgh were assailed by the mob, and damage to an immense amount inflicted. The result was a stronger demonstration against Reform than the most numerous signed petition could have been: the windows of every house of respectability in the metropolis, not connected with administration, were destroyed. Even those of the heads of the Scotch and English Church, totally unconnected with party, and known only to the people by their extensive benefactions, were demolished; and on the following day, the proprietors of the few houses which were spared, shrank from the wondering gaze of their fellow-citizens, under the feeling so well expressed by Mr Windham,—“What have I done to deserve the approbation of these wretches.”

Next came the election of a member for the city. The inhabitants, duly warned, by dear-bought experience, of the consequences of concession to the populace, now resolved to defend themselves against the rabble. Most of the gentlemen enrolled themselves as special constables, and the magistrates, with the most praiseworthy activity, made dispositions for the public defence. The ~~reformers~~ despairing of success, ~~which by means of intimidation~~ and violence, issued placards, calling on the special constables not to act under the magisterial authority; and though some of them were weak enough to obey the mandate, their place was more than supplied by hundreds of resolute young men who determined to preserve the city from insult. No efforts were spared to sway the electors; but, to their eternal honour, they remained true to their country. Their fellow-citizens will not easily forget the intrepidity and patriotism of this independent body, whom neither the “Civium ardor prava jubentium,” nor the “Vultus instantis Tyranni,” could swerve from their duty; and who, in a moment of unexampled excitation, rescued the electors of Edinburgh from the reproach of being either accessible to ministerial influence, or intimidated by popular fury.

Enraged at being thus disappointed, the populace vented their animosity upon every one who had discharged his duty among the electors. The Lord Advocate, proceeding, doubtless, on the well-known facility with which the leaders of the people can always moderate their passions, and of which the French Revolution had given such signal proof, desired the mob to be peaceable and go home, and publicly declared that he had, from confidence in their moderation, countermanded the dragoons, whom their menacing appearance had induced the magistrates to summon to their aid. The mob assailed the Lord Provost, after beating down his attendants, as he was walking home, on the North Bridge, from the election; and, with loud cries of “Burke him, Burke him,” tried to lift him upon the parapet, to throw him over a height of ninety feet. With the utmost difficulty, and by the exertion of no small physical strength, as well as courage, he succeeded in securing himself from his perilous situation; and the efforts of some gentlemen who witnessed the outrage got him placed in a shop, where he remained for several hours, assailed by a furious rabble, who could not be overcome till the military were called forth. The whole remainder of the night was a scene of such disgraceful contests as have not been witnessed in Edinburgh since the Portico Mob. In every street the constabulary force, of whom above 1000 were in readiness, were all engaged with the rabble for hours together, and with the utmost difficulty, with the aid of the military and yeomanry, preserved the city from becoming a prey to devastation. The commander of the police was beat down, and nearly killed. Upwards of a third of the constables and yeomanry were wounded; and but for their resolute conduct, the metropolis would have been entirely in the possession of an infuriated multitude.

No apology is needed for these local details. These scenes of riot and disorder were not the result of any peculiar cause. They were the "First Fruits of Reform," and as such, interest every community threatened with the excitation of the same passions. The scenes elsewhere in Scotland were of the same description. At Dundee, the magistrates were overpowered, the constables defeated, the Police jail broken open, and all the prisoners liberated. With a sagacity which could hardly have been expected in such a moment of exultation, the reformers burnt the police-books, thereby destroying all record of previous convictions for theft. At Glasgow, and all the towns in the vicinity, the tri-coloured flag was openly paraded, and this emblem of blood and crime waved above no less than sixty of the crowds who traversed the streets of the western metropolis.

Such is the state to which, in the space of six months, the prospect even of Reform has reduced this once happy and united country.

The late Lord Advocate, Sir W. Rae, said, in the House of Commons, that the Scotch, in the great towns, were not capable of bearing political excitation, and that riot and bloodshed would inevitably ensue. Never was a declaration which excited more indignation among the populace, upon the principle, it is probable, of "the greater the truth the greater the libel." They held meetings to "repel the foul aspersion;" made loud speeches in favour of themselves and each other; vaunted their moderation and peaceable demeanour; and on the very first occasion broke out into the very excesses which had been foretold by those who knew them best.

The state of the representation in Scotland has been, perhaps, more the subject of ignorant and unfounded invective than any other topic connected with Reform. That it cannot be what is represented, is evident from the fact, that under it the country has made more rapid strides in wealth, comfort, and intelligence, than any nation in the world during the same period; certainly ten times greater than any of the states which have been visited with the triple curse of innovation, revolution, and experimental constitution, during its steady and unbroken improvement.

The representation in the counties is entirely in the hands of the landed proprietors. Every person who has land to the amount of £400 a-year of valued rent, holding of the crown, or 40s. of old extent, (an old valuation,) has a vote. The practical result of this is, that the majority in number and value of the holders of the soil return the member.

It is the grossest fallacy to assert, that the representation of the counties is, in great part, in the hands of parchment voters, who have no real interest in the land. The reverse is well-known to every man in Scotland; and such an assertion would never have been hazarded, but before an assembly unacquainted, from distance, with the real state of affairs. The persons who influence the returns are the great landed proprietors, who split the superiorities of their estates, as it is called; that is to say, constitute voters for every £400 of valued rent on their estates, while they themselves hold, under them, the real property of the lands. In some instances these votes are put up to sale, and purchased by the highest bidder; but, in the great majority of cases, they are retained for the relations or connexions of the family, on account of the value which is attached to political influence. Thus the great landholder takes the field with his parchment voters, just as the English proprietor appears at the poll at the head of his tenantry; and the return, in reality, in both countries, depends upon the same interests. The body of the people have as little to say in the one case as the other; the only difference is, that Lord Fitzwilliam appears at the head of one thousand tenants, and the Duke of Buccleuch with fifty voters on his estates.

In boroughs, the misrepresentation put forth is at least as great. They are usually held forth as exclusively and entirely in the hands of a particular interest, by the corporation electing their successors. This is a total mistake. A part only are elected by their predecessors, and the remainder, who constitute a large proportion, are elected annually by the universal suffrage of the trades to which they belong. Thus in Edinburgh, the Town Council, or the electors, consists of thirty-three individuals, of whom fourteen are elected annually by the votes of the whole members of the incorporated trade to which they respectively belong—so that that part of the representation is in the strictest sense popular. And that the part elected by their predecessors is not inaccessible to popular opinion, is demonstrated by the fact, that several of the boroughs in Scotland—as, for example, the districts of Ayr, Lanark, Anstruther, &c.—have actually returned reforming members, though they are well aware that the effect of the Reform Bill will be to annihilate their political power.

Thus the boroughs of Scotland are divided between the aristocratic and democratic interests in the proportion, generally, of sixteen or seventeen to fourteen. And is not that the case with every assembly of representatives, from the House of Commons downward, in the kingdom? The Reformists exclaim against the boroughs, because they are not exclusively in the hands of the Radical faction,—because their whole members are not revolutionary in their tendency, upon exactly the same principle on which they inveigh against the House of Commons, because a majority of it has refused to sacrifice the constitution.

Much is said about the corruption of the Scotch boroughs; but what would be the effect of an extension of the elective franchise to large numbers of corruptible electors? Are the English contested elections in open places so very pure? Are Liverpool, East Retford, or Grampound, models of the disinterested exercise of the rights of freemen? In the former of these towns, there was more bribery during the last election, than in all the boroughs of Scotland in half a century. The reason is obvious, and, being founded on the principles of human nature, must for ever remain the same. Where the elective franchise is conferred on a set of men who, from their station in life, are accessible to bribes, as all the populace of great cities are, the more you extend the right of voting, the more you augment the evils of corruption. Liverpool was disgraced by an hundred times as much bribery as the worst Scotch borough, because it contained two hundred times as many corruptible voters.

We do not say that the system of Scotch borough election is perfect; we do not deny that it would admit of improvement. But what we contend for is, an improvement very different from what the Reformers propose. If any change is introduced, it should be, not to lower, but to raise, the qualification of the voters; and instead of vesting the return exclusively in the magistrates and delegates of trades, to confer it upon the real proprietors of houses of a high value. If every proprietor of a house of the value of £100 a-year, yearly rental, were vested with a vote, the intelligence and property of the boroughs would be fairly represented. We should not have the slightest fear of the results of an election founded on such a basis. With such interests to suffer from reckless innovation, or be swept away in revolution, the rejection of the Reform candidate would be certain in every borough in Scotland.

The reformers place their whole hopes upon the degradation of the franchise. They are perfectly aware, that, if the property and intelligence of the country is allowed to preponderate, the rejection of the Reform Bill, in Scotland at least, would be certain. What has occurred here, since it was first broached, has demonstrated this to the most incredulous. Almost all the counties have, in spite of the utmost efforts of Ministers, petitioned against the bill, by a majority, at an average, of two to one. In the Faculty of Advocates, the most intelligent professional class in the country, the Reformers, after exhausting the whole influence of Ministers, thought it prudent not to try their strength. In the Writers to the Signet, a most numerous, opulent, and spirited body, they experienced a signal defeat; the anti-reformers having outvoted them, upon a meeting called by themselves, by a majority of twenty-seven. The anti-reform petition sent up from Edinburgh, contained the names of all the wealth and intelligence of the metropolis, whose fortunes were not bound up with the reform administration. The petition got up on the other side, from a few great towns, embraced the mere rabble; the great majority of whom were even below the L.10 voter: in fact, mere paupers and day-labourers. One fact will sufficiently demonstrate this. The L.10 votes would, in Edinburgh, bring up 8000 electors to the poll, and the reform petition was signed by 30,000. We have not the least doubt, that, if Ministers had brought in a bill for the division of the landed estates in the country, the petition would have soon obtained 100,000 signatures.

Conscious that both the wealth and intelligence of the country is decidedly against them, the reformers rest entirely upon the rabble, whom it will bring up to the poll, well knowing that the great bulk of the lower orders, who have nothing to lose, will always support every advance towards an Agrarian law and abolition of taxes. They strenuously contend for a bill which will deliver over the country, bound hand and foot, to their violence. We do not say the authors of the bill intended this: we are confident they did not: but we do say, that it was framed by them in utter ignorance of its practical effects in this part of the island; and is now supported here by the radicals, in perfect knowledge of its consequences. It well becomes the Scotch members to weigh the consequences of its provisions; if the bill passes into a law, all the horrors of popular licentiousness may speedily be anticipated.

In the first place, it declares that every person shall be qualified to vote for counties, who "shall be the actual owner on a complete, permanent, and indefeasible title of land, or of a dwelling-house within such county, of the yearly value of ten pounds." This single clause at one blow annihilates the landed interest of the country.

The paramount importance of this clause to the landed interest of this country, can only be appreciated, when it is recollected that, in Scotland, during the last fifty years, there have sprung up a host of small proprietors, or feuars, as they are called, in all the thriving villages and small towns, all of whom will be brought in to vote for the county members. Thus, the Duke of Buccleuch, with his L.150,000 a-year, will have one vote, and two hundred feuars, at the gate of his palace, in the town of Dalkeith, will possess the same influence. The Duke of Hamilton, whose political weight in Lanarkshire has long been so considerable, will be extinguished by the house-proprietors within a mile of his palace-gate; and woe to the Whig influence in the west, the moment they strive to coerce the popular passions which they have awakened!

It was said in the House of Peers by Lord Haddington, that there are 35,000 inhabited houses in Scotland, of the value of L.10 and upwards. There never was a greater mistake; and if the Reform Bill was founded on such a basis, it only shows on what inaccurate information it was framed. Such estimates framed on the returns of the tax-office, are notoriously and universally defective in all the country districts, and, in fact, everywhere but in the metropolis. Of this we need not give a stronger proof, than that the household of Edinburgh is within a trifle as large as that of the whole remainder of Scotland. Such is the fortunate supineness of tax-gatherers at a distance from headquarters; and the happy ignorance of the power of taxation in remoter districts! We are perfectly confident that the inhabited houses, of the value of L.10 and upwards, will turn out to be at least 100,000, and this opinion is founded on the following grounds:

1. It has been ascertained by accurate calculation, that the number of inhabited houses worth L.10 and upwards a-year, in Edinburgh, is above 8000. Edinburgh contains, without Leith, about 130,000 souls; and Scotland probably 2,500,000

Supposing the proportion to be the same over the whole country, there would be above 150,000 houses in Scotland worth L.10 and upwards.

2. The same result is arrived at from a different process. There are, at an average, five persons to a family, therefore the population of 2,500,000 should, according to this rule, be lodged in 500,000 houses. Considering the rent which the poor pay for the most inconsiderable and wretched dwellings, we are confident that, out of 500,000 houses, at least 150,000 will turn out of the value of L.10 yearly and upwards. Every body knows that there is hardly a gentleman's servant in Edinburgh, possessing a house of his own, who does not inhabit a house of this value; and so well was this understood, that there was hardly one of that class who did not sign the Reform petition.

But suppose that one-fifth of the inhabited houses, or 100,000, only are worth L.10 a-year, what a prodigious mass of voters must this bring up to the poll in all the country districts! How are the landed interest to withstand this sudden influx of electors, over whom they have no sort of influence? It is perfectly notorious, and no one in Scotland disputes the fact, that the member for Edinburghshire will be returned by the feuars in Dalkeith, Gilmerton, and the suburbs of the metropolis; that of Lanark by the feuars of Airdrie, Hamilton, and the Barony parish of Glasgow; and all the other counties in the same manner.

Now the class in whom the county representation is thus vested, are not only those over whom the landlords have no influence, but they are those whose interests are adverse to those of the cultivators of the soil. This is a most important consideration. The feuars and shopkeepers, in the villages and small towns, have no sort of sympathy with the landlord district which surrounds them, it is with the great cities that they are connected; and accordingly they all have forwarded, on different occasions, petitions against the corn bill. Now what is to come of the landed interest, when they are thus delivered over to their enemies?—when the very representation intended to support their interests are returned by the preponderating multitude of their opponents?

But the supporters of the bill rest on the clause giving a right of voting to tenants, under a nineteen years' lease,—of farms to the value of L.50 a-year or upwards, as sufficient to counterbalance the extraordinary addition thus made to the weight of the manufacturers. To understand how completely fallacious this view is, it is necessary to refer to a fact perfectly notorious in Scotland, but not generally known to the south of the Tweed, that, in no part of the country are such farms as, under the act, would create a vote, now at all common. The reason is, that, in the remote and ill-cultivated districts, where the farmers have no capital, and agriculture is carried on by little farmers, or crofters, as they are called, the farms are chiefly under that sum; and that in the better quarters, the tenantry, panic-struck by the excessive variations of price and general depression which have prevailed for the last fifteen years, will not take a farm for a longer period than seven, or at most nine years. There is no practical agriculturist in Scotland who is not aware of that fact.

To illustrate the probable working of the bill, it is sufficient to observe, that an examination was recently made of the circumstances of twelve of the principal estates in Mid-Lothian, comprising, among others, those of the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Morton, Mr Ramsay of Barnston, and many others, with a view to discover what number of voters would be qualified on their properties. The valued rent of the whole taken together was L.47,000 a-year; and, as this was the rate fixed above a century ago, it may safely be inferred, that the real rent must be at least L.90,000 a-year at this time. The number of tenants qualified to vote on these great properties, taken together, was only 72; being the number of voters whom L.720 a-year of house property in the villages would produce. That is, L.90,000 a-year of landed property produces the same number of voters as L.720 a-year of house owners. Supposing that 18 voters are constituted among the proprietors of the land, to add to the 72 among their tenants, the sum total will be 90 votes for L.90,000 a-year landed, and 72 for L.720 a-year of house property. In other words, the weight given to the house is an hundred times as great as that awarded to the landed property, even after they have mustered their whole qualified tenantry to their support!

It is superfluous to say more on this point. Nothing can be clearer, than that the landed interest is, under these clauses, utterly merged in the preponderating influence of the house owners, and that henceforth they will lie entirely at the mercy of the populace, composing an adverse class in society.

In towns, the provisions of the bill are, if possible, still more alarming. The clause on this subject is as follows: "That every person shall be entitled to be registered, as herein directed, and thereafter to vote at elections for any of the boroughs or towns, or districts of boroughs, herein-before mentioned, who, when he claims to be registered, shall have been, for six months immediately preceding, and shall then be in the actual personal occupancy, either as proprietor or as tenant, upon a written title of possession, of a dwelling-house within the limits of the borough or town, of the annual value of ten pounds: Provided always that it shall be sufficient proof of the said value, that the house so possessed is actually rented at, and has truly paid that or a larger sum, or stands rated to the king's or to local taxes at not less than the said sum, and has truly paid all such rates and taxes." We do not hesitate to affirm, that this clause is only a step removed from universal suffrage.

The important points to be here observed are, 1. That the right of voting is given to the tenant as well as owner of a L.10 house. 2. That the value is to be taken by the rating in the King's books, or the rent actually paid for the subject. We do not know what class this clause may bring up to the polls in England; but in Scotland nothing is more certain, than that a large proportion of it will be the most profligate and venal set of men in existence. Take, for example, Glasgow, where the labours of the accurate and intelligent Mr Cleland have furnished a mass of statistical information unparalleled in any other part of the island.

It appears, from the tables collected by this indefatigable compiler, that every fourteenth house in Glasgow is a public-house; while, in London, the proportion is only one in fifty-six. This deplorable fact was publicly noticed by the Lord Justice-Clerk at his address to the Glasgow assize in autumn 1826, as the principal source of the prodigious increase of crime in its depraved population. But it bears now upon a more important matter even than the increase of human delinquency.

Supposing that the proportion formerly stated holds good, that one-fifth of the inhabited houses are of the value of L.10 a-year and upwards, and if one-fourteenth of the whole are public-houses, it follows that the proportion of houses creating a freehold qualification, which are public-houses, must be five-fourteenths, or nearly one-third of the whole. It may fairly be assumed that, in a great town like Glasgow, every public-house is rented at least at L.10 a-year; so that they will all confer a freehold qualification.

But this is not all. The brothels in Glasgow are, at least, half as numerous as the public-houses; there is no person practically acquainted with the condition of the lower orders, either from the punishment of crime, or the relief of sickness, who is not aware of that fact. In truth, where the lower classes of the houses are filled with whisky shops, the upper stories are generally tenanted by lodgers of this infamous description. And that they are generally above a rental of L.10 a-year is certain. Supposing, therefore, the brothels to be as numerous as public-houses, the electors of Glasgow will stand thus:

Inhabited houses,	-	40,000
One-fifth above L.10 yearly,		8000
Public-houses, 1-14th,		2850
Brothels, 1-28th,	-	1425

In other words, 4275 electors out of 8,000, will be ale and brothel-house keepers: in other words, the most dissolute and profligate of the community.

Such is the constituency into whose hands the Reform Bill will deliver the country.

In small boroughs, although the morals are not so depraved as in those of great sinks of corruption, the class of electors will be almost as dangerous. The L.10 householders in the small manufacturing towns, are in great part imbued with the most democratic spirit. Destitute of property; having nothing to lose by convulsion; paying their rent by means of rooms let to lodgers; feeding incessantly on the revolutionary press, many of them are precisely the class who, in all ages, have been the most dangerous in manufacturing states. Their habits in Airdrie, Kirkintilloch, Paisley, and Kilmarnock, on the west; in Montrose, Forfar, and Dundee, on the east, are such as to give no hope of a rational exercise of the elective franchise. Spending their surplus wages too frequently in debauchery; assembling in evening clubs, for the perusal of the radical newspapers; interrupting draughts of sedition, by potations of spirits; a large proportion of the manufacturing classes in the manufacturing boroughs of Scotland, have fallen as low in the scale of being as any class of men of whom history makes mention. There are doubtless many worthy and virtuous citizens among this body; but, in general measures, the character and habits of the majority must be considered. There is not in the world a more intelligent, prudent, and well-doing peasantry than the rural labourers over the whole country: there is not a more ignorant, profligate, self-sufficient class than a large proportion of its inferior shopkeepers, and manufacturing operatives.

There is no man practically acquainted with the condition of the urban population of Scotland, that will not corroborate these remarks. Most of all is it known to the supreme criminal and local Judges, and all whose professional duties have rendered them conversant with the progress of crime. It is high time that the common delusion on the subject should be dispelled, and that the real character of a great proportion of the electors, to whom it is proposed to deliver over the country, should be generally known. Their habits may be judged of by a single fact. From 10 to 20,000 persons in Glasgow get drunk every Saturday evening: they are drunk or drinking all Saturday night and Sunday, and the greater part of Monday, and they return to their work pale, aquilid, and exhausted, on Tuesday morning.

This is not matter of speculation. The experiment has been tried in all the principal towns of Scotland, of police commissioners chosen by the suffrage of all the L.10 householders; and it is well known both who constitute the immense majority at such elections, and what is the description of candidates who are returned. The elections are so completely overpowered by the low householders, that few respectable citizens think of using their suffrage; and the commissioners chosen in this manner, are of such a character, that, with the exception of a few patriotic individuals, who, for the public good, undertake the duty, it is a matter of extreme difficulty to get any gentleman to belong to the establishment. Ask any householder of Edinburgh or Glasgow, and he will give this account of the state of the police elections in these cities; and it is a matter of perfect horror to its respectable inhabitants, to have the elections of Parliament placed on the same footing.

Even in the small rural boroughs, such as Perth, Inverness, Elgin, Haddington, &c. the character of the lower orders, though incomparably higher than the manufacturing towns, is by no means such as to render their exercise of the elective franchise either safe or desirable. The ancient prudence and sagacity of the Scotch character, is there fast giving way to those two grand corrupters of humanity, the love of whisky and the love of power. Instead of assembling in the evening for family worship in separate families, or reading books of rational information, or religious instruction, their leisure hours and spare wages are chiefly devoted to the ale-house and the newspapers. Little clubs of three or four assemble nightly in every village, to read aloud the radical press. Their minds necessarily become tainted by the mass of infidelity, sedition, abuse, and ignorant assertion which it contains. That fatal measure, more calamitous to Scotland than all the burdens of the war, which Mr McCulloch and the Edinburgh Review persuaded the late administration to adopt, the reduction of the duties on whisky, has done more to corrupt them than centuries of civilisation. The radical publisher and the distiller thrive in the midst of the progressive ruin of public morals. The Bible is fast yielding to the daily press: Information has vanished before intoxication: allied to sedition on the one<sup>e</sup> hand, and infidelity on the other, education is rapidly undermining the once stable foundation of Scottish virtue.

The daily press, servilely fawning on the career of revolution, tells us none of these things. The radical journals are loud in the praise of their principal purchasers, the working classes. Their violence is excused or concealed; their wisdom, virtue, and patriotism, the theme of universal applause. How exactly do these violent acts, coupled with this servile adulation, remind us of the sinister commencement of the revolutionary servility of the French journals. These facts are so contrary to what once was the character of the Scotch urbane, and what still is the character of its rural population, that, however well known to all practically acquainted with the lower classes in the Scotch cities, it is not likely to obtain general credit with those in whose hands its destinies are now placed. It shall be our important duty, from time to time, to state such facts on this subject, as will convince the most incredulous, that our statements are not overcharged.

The 120 votes given to the tenantry are neither a boon nor a privilege to that class. Hitherto it has been the great advantage of that meritorious body, that it is withdrawn from all collision with the landlords; and that the interests of agriculture are not injured by electioneering operations on the part of the owners of the soil. It has been already mentioned, that, from the universal aversion to long leases in all the improved and improving districts, the number of votes falling to the agricultural class under this clause will be very inconsiderable. In the rich and highly cultivated district of East Lothian there will be hardly 160 votes. But it may easily be anticipated, that when the landlords find themselves beat down and outvoted at all the elections by the houseowners in the counties, they will be compelled, in their own defence, to multiply votes on their estates. The evil of nominal freehold qualifications, now so loudly complained of, will be renewed on a far greater scale, and with more pernicious effect. Ten-pound house-owners will be multiplied like the ten-pound freeholders in Ireland, to counterbalance the ruinous influence of the feuars and small shopkeepers. Little feus and houses will be increased for electioneering purposes, and the land ultimately overspread with an indigent beggarly population, as in that unhappy country.

Nor will the condition of the tenantry be less injured by their unhappy connexion with political contests. Whatever standard is ultimately fixed on for a freehold qualification, farms of that description will be augmented for the purpose of influence. How adverse soever to the increase of agriculture, how destructive soever to the independence of the farmer, they will be generally adopted. The landlords will find that it is the only means of averting destruction. In this way, the farmers, now exclusively occupied in their multifarious and important rural labours, will be involved in the tempestuous sea of politics. Leases will be shortened or lengthened, not according to the interest of the cultivator or the state of prices, but the subsisting law in regard to freehold qualifications; and the fatal contest will begin, now so fiercely raging in the sister island, between private interest and political passion. The popular demagogues, totally regardless as they generally are of the real interests of the people, will urge them to resist the hateful domination of the owners of the soil; the good understanding and kindly feeling, now so generally established between them, will be destroyed; reckless ambition will triumph as in Ireland by the sacrifice of private happiness; and a contested election, preceded by disgraceful bribery, will be followed by the melancholy spectacle of ejected tenants, weeping families, and destitute emigrants.

The tenantry of Scotland, distinguished above almost every other class by their good sense and sagacity, and uninfected as yet by the fatal contagion of great cities, have clearly perceived these truths. Notwithstanding all the efforts of administration and of the radical press, they have hardly anywhere responded to the call for petitions. The agricultural class, it may with confidence be affirmed, are adverse to the conferring of the elective franchise on themselves. They know well what it has done for Ireland; they see in the multitude of Irish poor by whom they are overwhelmed, the dismal consequences of the extension of political agitation to the rural districts.

Nothing can be conceived more disastrous than the effects of shaking, by political convulsion, the rural tenantry. Who formed the protection of the state during the radical times in 1820, when the standard of revolt was displayed in Bridgeton, and 100,000 weavers in the west were ready to rise in open revolt? The yeomanry of the agricultural counties, who turned out with an alacrity in defence of their country, which could not have been exceeded by regular troops trained to assemble daily at their trumpet call. If this class, too, are to be involved in political agitation, what bulwark remains to protect the cause of order from the increasing ambition of the manufacturing classes? Let it not be supposed, that by their remote situation, secluded life, and tranquil labours, the cultivators of the soil are necessarily withdrawn from the fever of democratic passion. The example of Ireland proves the reverse. What is the situation of the remote and agricultural county of Clare? An insurgent peasantry, landlords driven into the cities to save their lives, the soil turned up and destroyed by rebels; twelve cold-blooded murders perpetrated in open day within a few weeks by wretches still at large among their kindred peasantry; jury-men who cannot venture to meet at the assizes; witnesses not daring to come forward from the terror of death. What has produced this deplorable, this unexampled state of things? The subdivision of farms, and increase of paupers, consequent upon the freeholds of the tenantry; the agitation of politics; the election of O'Connell.

Let it not be supposed that the Scottish character, if exposed to the influence of the same causes, is any proof against similar desolating political frenzy. The agitation and fanaticism of the Covenant proves the reverse. If we would seek for a parallel to the distracted state of the Irish tenantry, we must recur to the ruinous divisions of this country, after the great rebellion had stirred up the passions of the rural population. Slow to immerse in political contests, the Scottish peasantry, when once roused, either by political or religious fanaticism, are the last in the world to lay it down. The old leaven of the covenant—the memory of Bothwell Wig—the preachings at Ayr Moss, still work in the bosoms of the western peasantry. If their plunge into the sea of politics once fairly rouses and exasperates the tenantry of Scotland, the fatal poison will not, in all probability, be expelled for two centuries.

"The Americans," it has been observed by a most competent observer, "will never rival England, either in agriculture or manufactures. The never-ending agitation of politics—the incessant turmoil of elections, fills the heads of the people from one year's end to another. Instead of attending to their business, they are constantly going to the corners of streets to put pebbles into ballot-boxes." Such is the result of democratic institutions upon a great scale. The consequences of this ruinous distraction of thought, are not as yet felt in that great continent, from the boundless field for industry and facility of obtaining subsistence which prevails. But they may be anticipated, when employments begin to be filled up, and the pressure for food begins. But what would they be in an old country such as Scotland, with all employments filled up, with the pressure of domestic taxation, and the rivalry of foreign competition? They may easily be anticipated—they are the same which, in all ages, have followed the uncalled-for extension of political power to the people—diminished employment—increasing distress—the destruction of the first class of innovators by the multitude whom they have deluded—the establishment of democratic tyranny, from the general suffering which has roused every labouring man into action.

The evils of bribery, hitherto comparatively unseen in this part of the island, will, under the new constitution, spread with unheard of velocity. Struggling for existence with a numerous and audacious democratic faction, Wealth and Property will be compelled to enter the field. Bribery, as at Liverpool, must be conducted on the largest scale. It will emerge from the precincts of the Town Council, to stalk through every street and alley of Scotland. The passion for power among the populace must be combated by their thirst for gold—the rival corrupters of human nature must be arrayed in hostility against each other, but with condemned injury to the deluded multitude. And the people will be demoralized equally by their supporters and their seducers. While the democratic press fans the flame of popular ambition, commercial wealth will poison the fountain of public virtue; and the Constitution, hitherto securely based on the property and intelligence of the country, will vibrate between the influence of selfish corruption, and the fury of plebeian ambition.

Nor is the actual violence to which these contested elections will give rise, the least formidable consideration in the new constitution, with which we are threatened. England hitherto has only known Scotland as a quiet unobtrusive province of the empire, which took nothing from the national strength, and largely poured the fruits of its industry into the national exchequer. We shall see how long this state of things will continue—how long a garrison of 1200 men will suffice for the reformed kingdom. The riots and devastation have already been mentioned which preceded and followed the contest in Edinburgh, and the other parts of the kingdom have exhibited similar disgraceful scenes of intimidation and violence. At Lauder, one of the electors was forcibly carried off, in defiance of the whole civil force of Berwickshire, at the door of the court-house, the sheriff and Lord

Maitland knocked down, and the election, which ran to within one vote, carried by open violence. At Forfar, on the last election, the reforming candidate, the Lord Advocate, was so alarmed at the threatening aspect of the multitude arrayed against himself, that he sent, in the middle of the night, to Perth for dragoons, a distance of thirty miles; although the same learned functionary, on the appearance of the Edinburgh riots against his adversaries, thought fit to order them to leave the town. The radicals of Glasgow, Falkirk, and all the manufacturing districts of the country, were assembled, by printed placards, at Stirling on the day of election, to intimidate the freeholders from voting for the anti-reform candidate; and the admirable firmness and dispositions of the sheriff only preserved the freedom of election. If such is the state of matters even where the lower orders have, comparatively speaking, so little influence, and where no interest of theirs is at issue, what may be expected when the elective franchise is so immensely extended, and when bands of the rural tenantry march into the towns to meet the manufacturers in a contest for the abolition of the Corn laws, or other subjects intimately connected with the pecuniary interests of every elector? They know little of the fervidum Scotorum ingenium who can anticipate any thing but bloodshed and civil dissension from such a collision. It is no answer to this to say, Scotland must learn to exercise the rights of freemen. We may be reduced to the condition of the county of Clare in the course of the apprenticeship. If a man in perfect health is compelled to swallow a dangerous medicine, it is little consolation to him to be informed, that, after years of suffering and misery, he may regain the healthful state which he had lost.

The confiscation of property consequent on the passing of the Reform Bill in Scotland is another most serious consideration, which has never met with the attention it deserves. There are thirty counties in the kingdom, and their united freeholders amount to about 2500 persons. Supposing each vote to be worth L.800, which, on an average, it certainly is, since in Lanarkshire and Mid-Lothian they have been sold for L.1500 and L.2000 each, the amount of property vested in these freeholds is L.2,000,000. The whole of this property is threatened with destruction; for it is needless to say, that from the day that the L.10 voters are admitted, no freehold will be worth any thing. Here, then, is an equalizing measure, which, deliberately and without compensation, takes L.2,000,000 sterling from the higher orders, to divide it among the lower. It is not surprising that, with such a glittering boon before their eyes, there were numerous signatures from the working classes to the Reform petitions.

It is no answer to the palpable injustice of such a proceeding to say, that individual interest must frequently give way to the public good. So it undoubtedly must. But when this is the case, it uniformly hitherto has been the practice to make a proper compensation to the suffering party. Thus, when it was deemed expedient, from their obvious bad consequences, to abolish the heritable jurisdiction of particular families, in 1745, due compensation was made by Government to the parties who formerly possessed them. Even after the heats and animosities of the rebellion, the doctrine was not then acted upon, that private rights are to be invaded on considerations of public utility, without compensation to the suffering party. In all bills for canals, roads, harbours, or other public works, when private property is invaded or deteriorated, compensation is uniformly provided. It was reserved for the fanatical supporters of immediate abolition of slavery to promulgate, for a reforming administration to act upon, such a principle.

The mode of obviating this injustice is obvious. Let those who acquire a privilege which they did not before possess, pay for it. Let the 100,000 voters, to whom a privilege is to be extended for the first time, compensate those who lose it, or whose property is so much deteriorated as to be of no value. If the reformers really are anxious for political power, and do not make it a pretence for putting their hands in their neighbours' pockets, let them submit to this sacrifice. Men who are clear for depriving their opponents of L.800 each, can make no reasonable objection to being called on themselves to pay L.20.

This consideration points out the utter inconsistency of those who stigmatize as interested all the anti-reform petitions, because they spring from persons threatened with loss, and hold up as disinterested all those which emanate from classes promised a gain—that is, the victims of spoliation are grossly interested, because they strive to save themselves from loss; the supporters of it perfectly pure, because they strive to possess themselves of their neighbour's property. Henceforth, the highwayman will be deemed wholly disinterested—the robbed traveller the selfish party.

If this great measure of spoliation, under pretence of the public good, is once admitted, what limits can be assigned to the extension of the principle? If titles of honour are assailed, how are they to be maintained after the grand precedent in the case of the elective franchise? If the church is made the next victim, the principle now admitted is of irresistible application. If the fundholder is threatened on the principle of an "equitable adjustment," that is, the confiscation, as in revolutionary France, of half his property, what link can be drawn between his case and that of the sacrificed freeholder? If the estates of the nobility are selected, they will seek in vain for a distinction between their case and that of the original voters. C'est le premier pas qui coute in politics, as well as in morals; every subsequent step is easy, after the original injustice of sacrificing individuals to the public is admitted. There will never be wanting multitudes who call themselves the public, and who are willing to vindicate the robbery of their neighbours under the specious title of the general good.

Another point deserving of especial consideration in the Scotch bill, is the new and alarming preponderance given to the manufacturing over the landed interest, not only in the composition of the freeholders, but the actual number of the represented places. At present there are 30 county and 15 borough members. By the bill, there are to be 28 county and 22 borough members. On what principle is this alarming disproportion between the representation of the two classes vindicated? Is it said that the manufactures and wealth of the cities have enormously increased? so they have; but the increase of the agriculture and the landed rent has been at least as great. Such an increase may be a ground for increasing the representation of both interests in Parliament; it can be none for enlarging the one at the expense of the other. The real reason may probably be found in a different cause: the experienced tendency of the boroughs to the innovating, of the counties to the conservative side.

In truth, there is but one part of the Reform Bill which we approve, and that is the clause giving five additional representatives to Scotland; and the only objection we have to it is, that it does not go nearly far enough. It is clear, that, both with reference to its population and wealth, Scotland is extremely under-represented. The population of Scotland is now 2,500,000; that of England and Wales probably 15,000,000. In proportion to the numbers of the people, therefore, there should be one-sixth of the members returned for the one country as the other; whereas the members of Scotland are 45, and those of England 500; in other words, above eleven times as great. The clear revenue yielded by Scotland to the treasury of the empire in 1814, was £4,500,000, independent of the Scottish duties paid in London, which brought it to £5,000,000; that of England, £36,000,000. In this proportion, therefore, the Scottish representatives, instead of 45, should be 72. If innovations are to be practised on the Constitution, here is a change founded in justice, injurious to no interest, threatening to no class of society. Nor need the precedent be dreaded as applied to Ireland. When that island yields as large a surplus revenue to the empire as Scotland, let her prefer her claims for an extended representation; but not till then.

In the proposed disfranchisement of the counties of Dumbarton and Bute, Peebles and Selkirk, it is not to be overlooked, that the sitting members are on the anti-Reform side. Dumbarton returns Lord W. Graham, and has petitioned against Reform; Bute, Sir William Rae, and has done the same; Selkirk, Mr Pringle of Whybank, the tried friend of the Constitution; Peebles, Sir George Montgomery, also an anti-Reform member. In this disfranchisement, it is not difficult to see the blow aimed at the political influence of the Duke of Montrose, the Marquis of Bute, and the Duke of Buccleuch. On the other hand, these members are to be given to Dundee, the enthusiastic supporter of the Lord Advocate on the last election, and to Leith, of old established radical celebrity.

It is in vain to attempt to vindicate the disfranchisement of these rural districts by the scantiness of their population. By the last returns the population of the threatened counties stands as follows:—

Dumbartonshire, . . .	27,000
Peebles, . . . . .	10,000

while the county of Rutland, which, under the new bill, is to have four members between the county and the borough, has only a population of 18,000 souls.

In estimating also the consequence of this great change, the alarming increase of litigation concerning the small votes is not to be overlooked. Every man practically acquainted with the habits of the lower orders of Scotland, is aware of their extraordinary predilection for forensic dispute, and that the chief duty of every honest legal practitioner is to moderate the litigious propensities of his clients. The astounding facts that there are annually determined in the Sheriff Courts of Scotland no less than 20,000 causes, being almost three times as much as in the whole Courts of Record over all England; and that in the Small Debt Court of Edinburgh and Glasgow there are determined besides, from 6000 to 8000 annually, may convey some idea of the vehemence with which the ferocious Scotorum ingenium has flowed into these new and bloodless . . . If 100,000 votes are to be . . . ed to Scotland, with the keenness of contested elections, it is difficult to estimate the consequences of such an extraordinary stimulus to the litigious passions of the lower orders. Of no value to their superiors, these votes will be of prodigious consequence to them; and the hard earnings of many years will be squandered in lawsuits in which they have no practical interest, but into which they have been plunged by the ambitious designs of their demagogues.

It may be added that, in deciding on these votes, a new and most formidable power is placed in the hands of the Sheriff of the county, an officer in the appointment of the Crown. It is enacted "That the judgment of the Sheriff shall, as long as it stands, be conclusive of the claimant's right to be registered and vote; provided always that it shall be competent for any claimant who is rejected to submit his claim to the re-consideration of the Sheriff, and to require, if so advised, the verdict of a jury on any disputed facts: provided that the judgment of the Sheriff may be brought under review by summary petition to the Court of Session: but provided also, "that no alteration of the Sheriff's judgment shall affect the merits of any election actually completed and carried through before the date of such alteration, except in so far as effect may be given to such alteration by any Committee of the House of Commons." The result of this is, 1. That the judgment of the Sheriff is final unless the costs of a lawsuit in the Court of Session are incurred, which may be on an average £60 in each case. 2. That if the Sheriff's judgment is not reversed before the election is completed, the vote, how bad soever, must stand for the successful candidate, unless an expenditure of £2000 is incurred in petitioning the House of Commons. In either view it is evident that a most formidable power is vested in the hands of the Sheriff, who, though generally a legal practitioner of respectability, is certainly appointed by Ministers, and as certainly looks to them for ulterior promotion.

"If I wished," said Frederick the Great, "to reduce the most flourishing province of my dominions to utter sterility, I could not take so effectual a course as by putting it for a few years into the hands of philosophers." "It is an empire," said Napoleon, "made of adamant, it would be pounded to dust by the political economists." The experience of what we have suffered, and are likely to suffer, from the speculative men of our own country, gives no reason to hope that Great Britain forms any exception to the rule.

The political economists in the Edinburgh Review, incessantly urged the reduction of the duties on whisky; and, in an evil hour, the late administration yielded to the clamour. The "Giant Smuggler," it was said, would thus be demolished: Spirits, from being so common, would cease to be so much prized, and public morality be improved by the change. The consequence was, that the consumption of spirits annually in Scotland rose, at once, from 2,400,000 to 5,600,000 gallons; crime in every quarter was doubled; habits of intoxication spread to a degree almost incredible. Five thousand men were saved from demoralization on the Highland frontier, and 500,000 were plunged into it in the manufacturing districts, and a blow given to the habits of the people more serious than it has received since the foundation of the monarchy.

Incessant were the clamours, numerous the arguments, great the exertions, directed from the same journal, against the banking system of Scotland. During the panic following the great bankruptcy of 1825, these principles were embraced by Administration. A system, convicted of no weakness, bringing on no disaster; which, without risk, quadrupled the capital of the country; under which the invaluable habits of saving and frugality had spread to an unparalleled extent among the poor, was threatened with destruction. Here, fortunately, the good sense of the Scottish nation averted the misfortune: the people rose as one man against the threatened change, and a calamity, greater than ever was inflicted by philosophy on mankind, was kept at a distance by those whom its professors affected to despise.

It is from the same quarter, and in pursuance of the same principles, that we are now threatened with a subversion of the constitution. The adoption of such a system by men of tried ability, known eloquence, and acknowledged taste, is a striking proof how different a thing it is to censure others and to act ourselves; how perilous are the experiments of speculative men on human institutions, and how wide is the distinction between elegant critique or ferocious effusions, and a profound acquaintance with the springs of public felicity.

The election of Cambridge has demonstrated the opinion on reform of the men of the highest acquirement in England of Whig, that of Oxford, of the same class, of Tory principles. The vote on the Timber question demonstrated the feelings of the well-informed of the commercial class: the scene in the House of Lords, on the dissolution of Parliament, of the landed aristocracy, on the same changes. The great majority of the education, intelligence, and wealth of the country, is firmly united against the bill. Nevertheless, the open elections have almost everywhere, in England, gone in its favour. This is not surprising. The proposed change has roused the lower orders in a body against the higher; the sway of learning, the respect to character, the weight of thought, the influence of property, is no longer felt. Dazzled by the prospect of political power, the multitude have everywhere revolted against those who have hitherto swayed their opinions. The county freeholders conceived that, in voting for a reform candidate, they were voting for the abolition of tithes and taxes; the boroughs, for a free trade in corn, a large share of political power, and a total abolition of the national debt. The prospect of these boons was immediate; the King, they were told, favoured the changes; and, within three months of a reformed Parliament meeting, all would be accomplished. Under the combined influence of these feelings, a majority will certainly be returned in Parliament for the proposed changes. We are not in the least surprised at this; it is what we always foresaw would follow the prospect of success to popular ambition.

"Il existe," says Chateaubriand, "deux sortes de révolutionnaires: les uns desirant la révolution avec la liberté; c'est le très-petit nombre: les autres veulent la révolution avec le pouvoir; c'est l'immense majorité." In these words of one well versed in the history of public convulsions, is to be found the secret of the success of the reforming party in England in the recent elections. It is not the love of liberty which is roused; that is already fully enjoyed: it is the passion for power,—and that, like every other passion, is insatiable, and goes on increasing, till, by excess of enjoyment, it destroys itself.

While such has been the fate of the elections wherever popular ambition or intimidation could be exerted in England, very different has been the spectacle presented in Scotland. In some places, no doubt, by the force of violence, carrying off electors, or other unworthy engines, the choice has fallen on reforming members; but, generally speaking, the preponderance of the conservative party, against all the weight of administration, has been most remarkable. Scotland will shew a majority of three to two in the next Parliament against Reform.

The difference between the result of the appeal in the two countries is very remarkable, and corroborates, in the most signal manner, an observation made in the last Number of this series—viz. that electors have no disposition to resist an extension of their franchise to a more numerous class below themselves, unless it is confined to those who really are possessed of property and education, and who will lose something by such an extension. Accordingly, the Scotch electors, men of education, and capable of discerning consequences, and of property, and capable of losing something, are as decidedly adverse to the extension of the suffrage to the lower classes, as the English are favourable to such a change.

The reason is obvious, and, being founded in the interests of the different classes of society, must remain the same in all ages and countries. Substantial interest is, in the end, the governing principle of all men. The wealthy elector, therefore, who has much to lose, naturally resists; the poor elector, who has every thing to gain, as naturally supports the extension of the suffrage. He finds, by experience, that he gains no immediate or visible advantage by siding with the conservative, while he is promised the substantial fruits of popopular sovereignty by inclining to the other party. By resisting the extension of the franchise, the humble elector is not immediately benefited; whereas his popular coadjutors assure him, that, by joining their ranks, and admitting them to his privileges, the great boon of liberation from taxes and tithes, and all the sweets of popular sovereignty, will be gained to the people. The result of the elections in the two countries clearly demonstrates the truth of these principles.

Now, observe what an overwhelming argument this furnishes against the whole Reform Bill. The evils of universal suffrage are universally admitted; but the reformers assert that this Bill will raise up an effectual barrier against its dangers, because it will cause all the voters, a million strong, to range themselves on the side of order against any farther extension of the suffrage. But how is such a consequence to be reconciled with the present result of the English elections? Why do not the 40s. freeholders resist as sturdily any intrusion of strangers into their ranks as the L.400 Scotch electors? The reason evidently is, that they make common cause with the democracy, throw overboard the influence of their landlords, and propose to recruit their ranks from the unrepresented classes, because by so doing, they will get the whole power of sovereignty into their own hands; and in the abolition of tithes and taxes, and the division of church property, secure the substantial fruits of popular victory.

In a similar crisis, the new voters will do the same. Finding that they have gained nothing by all the changes, till taxes and tithes are abolished, they will all join the L.5 householders, and the universal suffrage men, in order to accomplish their object. Government will then find that the new voters, instead of being true to the cause of order, are a clear addition to the forces of revolution and anarchy.

"The power of dissolving Parliament," says Lord Advocate Jeffrey in his younger days, "is a power essential to the existence of the constitution and the safety of the crown; but it is one extremely liable to abuse. By threatening a dissolution for the purpose of intimidating the House of Commons, the executive can obtain the votes of many who are placed beyond the sphere of its ordinary influence; and by appealing to the people at the moment of some violent outcry, Ministers can avail themselves of a popular delusion spread by themselves.*—"All plans of reform hitherto exhibited, are liable to the insurmountable objection of beginning by pulling down the constitution as it at present stands, and then proposing to build another fabric entirely new, and on a plan wholly different, and of the convenience or beauty of which no man can possibly judge from experience. Why should we not go gradually to work in this as in all other parts of legislation, cautious in proportion to the greatness of the concern, and the danger of committing a mistake."†—"It is not by mere popular clamour, or the shouts or hisses of an ignorant and disorderly mob, but the deep, the slow, and the collected voice of the intelligent and enlightened part of the community, that the councils of a free nation should be ultimately guided."—"No man can deny that it would be highly impolitic to throw open all the boroughs in which the right of voting at present belongs, to certain parts of the population. No man of common sense would wish to see that worst description of boroughs multiplied, in which from two hundred to five hundred inhabitants have votes; boroughs which are too large to be in the quiet possession of a single great family, but not too large to be contested by men of ready-money influence; boroughs which are, for this very reason, the very sinks of every species of corruption. It would be a very violent proceeding to disfranchise places of this sort, where corporations elect and transfer their rights to certain large towns not now represented. We object, as much as any man, to all rash projects, all wholesale reforms, all theoretical system-mongers, who will have everything or nothing, and care not how much they put in jeopardy, so as they bring out something rounded and finished at the first heat."*

Recollecting these the early and far-famed opinions of the celebrated men who then conducted that Journal, and contrasting them with the bill which they have since brought forward in their maturer years, we are filled with astonishment at the magnitude of human inconsistency; and with the most melancholy presages of the future, when the same passions and temptations which have seduced men of their character, shall have seized on baser minds, infirm intellects, and equal ambition. But as the melancholy progress is now so far advanced, it should prove a warning to all the supporters of real freedom, of the consequence of placing themselves at the head of popular agitation, and serve as a beacon to all the friends of the constitution, that it is by steady resistance to innovations even in the last stages of its progress, that England can alone be saved from ruin.

To conclude—the result of the English elections furnishes, if there did not exist before, a decisive and unanswerable argument against the concession of any farther power to the people. It demonstrates that the "moral influence of property," as it is called, which alone is to be left to the landed proprietors, is utterly nugatory in periods of excitement. The Duke of Northumberland trusted to the moral influence—and never was a nobleman more worthy, from his character, of exercising it; and the consequence was, that his power was overturned in his own country.

The Reformers urged the ascendancy of the borough-holders as a conclusive argument in favour of a change. Of this argument they are now deprived; without any reform, a Parliament has been returned as popular as the warmest friend of freedom could desire. The necessity, the expedience, of an extension of the franchise, cannot now be pleaded; the Reformers themselves have demonstrated its futility. Without Reform, we are on the verge of a republic; with it, where shall we be?

AN AGONY OF THIRTY-EIGHT HOURS.

BY JOURGNIAC SAINT MEARD.—PARIS, 1797.

Of the numerous accounts which appeared in Paris in the bloody reign of anarchy in 1792, but few are undeformed by the creative fancy of those authors, whose object was to feed the greedy and excited apprehension of the time with tales of horror; or by the vehemence of party, which sought to give, if possible, a more flagitious hue to the proceedings of the sanguinary terrorists. By far the most authentic picture—for such it is—of that appalling and momentous crisis, is the brief, but forcible and highly graphic narrative of M. Jourgniac St Méard. The unadorned simplicity of his account, which merely embodies in succession the events of twelve days of savage massacre, of secret accusation, of public credulity and popular atrocity, presents us with a true and striking image of the me-thodized barbarity of that extraordinary period. It more adequately develops, than any other summary of facts, the flagitious excitation of the people, the agonizing scenes of suffering, the odious and unprofitable murders, sanctioned by the national insanity; and the desolating rage of merciless destruction, which smote alike the innocent and guilty. Every item of his vivid and minute relation, is a faithful index of a constituent portion of the system, by which the ascendant of murderous authority—indiscriminately levelled at the people—was devised to gratify, to awe, and to subvert them. His details present, at once, the levity, the crime, the ceremonious form and turbulent disorder of those distempered times; nor do they fail to shew, among a mass of cruelty, abandonment, and gross depravity, some splendid instances of generous devotion, pious resignation, and exalted friendship, which, despising all the terrors of dominant iniquity, exemplified the duties of humanity and virtue in aid of innocence and unmerited misfortune.

Fourteen Hours in the Committee of Surveillance de la Commune.

I was arrested by order of this committee on the 22d of August, and taken to the Mairie, at nine in the morning, where I remained until eleven at night. Two gentlemen, members no doubt of the committee, desired me to walk into a chamber; where one of them, overwhelmed with fatigue, fell fast asleep. The other asked me if I was M. Jourgniac Saint Meard.

I answered, "Yes."

M. Be seated, sir. We are all equal. Do you know the cause of your arrest?

Ans. I was told, by one of those who brought me here, that I am suspected to be the editor of an anti-constitutional journal.

M. Suspected is not the word; for I know that Gautier, who is given out as the editor of the Journal de la Cour et de la Ville, is a mere nominal being.

Ans. Your credulity, sir, has been imposed on; for his existence is quite as susceptible of proof, as the circumstance of his being the editor of the journal in question.

M. I am to believe—

Ans. Nothing but the truth; since justice is the object of a judge; and I can give you my word of honour—

M. Ah! sir, we are not now dealing with words of honour—

Ans. So much the worse, sir, for mine is unimpeachable.

M. You are accused of having been on the frontiers these last ten or eleven months; and of having there levied recruits, whom you placed at the service of the emigrants; on your return you were arrested, but escaped from prison.

Ans. If I could bring myself to think this accusation serious, I should require but one hour to prove that, for the last twenty-three months, I have not been out of Paris; and if—

M. Oh! I am well aware, sir, of your ability; and I also know that you possess the cunning (astuce.)

Ans. Permit me to observe, that that expression is uncalled for; the immediate object of our enquiry is a mere absurdity, since we are only speaking of the denunciations which have been made against me.

M. Do you know M. Durosot, the editor of the Gazette of Paris?

Ans. By reputation I know him well, but in no other manner; indeed, I never saw him.

M. I am surprised at that, as letters written by you to him have been found among his papers.

Ans. One only could have been found, as I never wrote to him but once; on which occasion I sent him my address to the chasseurs of my company, on the insurrection of the garrison of Nancy. This address he published in the Gazette de Paris. This is the whole and sole of my correspondence with him.

M. You speak truly; and I must also tell you, that you are not compromised by the letter in question.

Ans. No letter, no writings, no actions of mine, can possibly have had the effect or tendency to compromise me.

M. I have seen you at the house of Madame Vautoury, and also at the house of M. Peltier, the editor of the Acts of the Apostles.

Ans. That may be, as I frequently visit that lady, and am in the habit of walking with M. Peltier.

M. Are you not a Chevalier of St Louis?

Ans. I am, sir.

M. Why do you not wear the cross of the order?

Ans. There it is; I have worn it for these last six years.

M. That is sufficient for to-day. I shall inform the Committee that you are here.

Ans. You will do me the favour to inform the Committee, that if I find justice at its hands, I shall be dismissed with my freedom; for I am neither an editor, a recruiter, conspirator, or denunciator.

A moment afterwards, three soldiers beckoned me to follow them. When we reached the court-yard, they requested me to enter a fiacre, (hackney coach,) in which I was conducted, by order of the Committee, to the Hotel du Faubourg Saint-Germain.

Ten Days in the Abbaye.

HAVING reached the hotel, which turned out to be the prison of the Abbaye, I was given, with my commitment, into custody of the keeper, who, after the usual civility of "let us hope that your detention will not last long," ordered me to a large room, which served as a chapel for the prisoners of the ancien regime. I counted nineteen individuals lying on beds of coarse canvass; that which was assigned to me, had been occupied by M. Dagremout, who had been guillotined two days previously.

On the same day, when we were about to seat ourselves at table, M. Chanterami, a colonel in the Maison Constitutionnelle of the King, stabbed himself thrice with a knife, saying—"We are all destined to be massacred! My God, I go to you!" In ten minutes he was no more!

August 23d.—I drew up a memorandum, in which I exposed the malice of my denunciators; and sent copies of it to the Minister of Justice, to my own section, to the Committee of Surveillance, and to every one who was concerned for the injustice of my case. Towards five o'clock in the afternoon, M. Durosot, the editor of the Gazette of Paris, became a partner of our misfortunes. He no sooner heard my name, than he said, after the usual forms of salutation; "Ah! sir, happy am I to meet you! You have long possessed my affection, though I have known you merely from the affair at Nanci; permit an unhappy man, whose latest hour is near, to pour out his heart into yours." I embraced him. He then gave me a letter, which he had just received—it was from a female friend, and to the following effect:

"My friend, prepare for death—you are condemned; and to-morrow—My heart is broken—but you know what I have promised you. Adieu!"

While I was reading this brief letter, the tears flowed down his cheeks. He kissed the letter repeatedly, and I heard him say in a suppressed and almost suffocated voice,

"Alas! She will suffer more than I shall."

He lay down on my bed, and when we were wearied with talking of our accusation and arrest, we fell asleep. At daybreak he composed a memorandum in his justification, which, though penned with energy, and replete with circumstantial exculpation, proved of no avail; he was decapitated on the following day!

August 25th.—The commissaries of the prison at length permitted us to receive the Evening Journal. A prisoner, newly committed, brought us in several others, in one of which, the Courier Français, I read the following article: "Messieurs Saint Meard and Beaumarchais are arrested; the former was the author of a scandalous journal, called Le Journal de la Cour et de la Ville. He was a captain in the King's regiment; and it is to be remarked, that he is the owner of the estate near Bordeaux, which formerly belonged to the celebrated Moutaigne. M. St Meard enjoys an income of more than 40,000 livres." The estate alluded to is the property of M. Segur, and as to my fortune, it never exceeded 20,000 livres, prior even to the Revolution.

August 26th.—Midnight. A municipal officer entered the room, to take our names and the dates of our respective commitments. He gave us hopes that the municipality would authorize commissaries, on the following day, to discharge all parties who had been arrested on vague denunciations. This expectation enabled me to enjoy a night of sound repose; however, it was not fulfilled; on the contrary, the number of prisoners evidently increased.

August 27th.—The report of a pistol was heard in the interior of the prison; it was followed by hurry and confusion, on the stairs and in the passages. We heard the noise of various locks and bolts. Our room was entered by several persons; among them was the turnkey of our ward; he counted us; and said, "Tranquillize yourselves—the danger is over!" This was the only information, on the subject of the disturbance, afforded us by this brusque and uncommunicative personage.

August 28th and 29th.—We were agitated and disturbed by the incessant arrival of carriages conveying prisoners, whom we were enabled to see from the windows of a tower which communicated with our room. In the sequel, our curiosity was painfully punished by the scenes we witnessed on the Place, in the Rue St Marguerite, and above all, immediately opposite the wicket of our prison.

August 30th. Eleven at night.—A man of eighty years of age was conducted to his bed, in our room; the next day we learned that he was the Sieur Cazotte, the author of a poem called Olivier, of the Diable Amoureux, &c. The extravagant gaiety and Oriental style of speech of this old man, afforded us a temporary diversion. In the midst of our misery, he endeavoured seriously to persuade us, by the History of Cain and Abel, that we were much happier than those in the enjoyment of liberty, and was sensibly offended at our incredulity. Our discussion was terminated by the arrival of two gendarmes, who conducted him to the criminal tribunal.

I lost not an instant in procuring such attestations as supported the truths advanced in my memorandum. I was assisted by a friend, the like of whom the world does not contain; who, while the companions of my misfortune were utterly abandoned by theirs, laboured night and day incessantly, in my behalf. He forgot that at such a crisis of excitement and general mistrust, he ran the risk of implications like my own, by evincing such lively interest in the condition of a suspected man. His noble spirit was above all these considerations; no danger daunted him; and well did he exemplify the proverb, that "adversity is the touchstone of friendship." To his zealous energy am I, in a great degree, indebted for existence; and I owe it to the public, to myself, and to truth, to declare the name of this generous and incomparable friend, M. Feysler, Rue Croix des Petits-Champs.

The last days of August brought back to my remembrance the affair of Nanci, and I compared the dangers of that past epoch with those which immediately surrounded me.

September 1st.—Some of our comrades were released; as were other occupants of the adjacent rooms. Among the latter was M. de Jaucourt, a member of the legislative assembly, who, shortly before his arrest, had vacated his seat as a deputy.

My Thirty-eight Hours' Agony.

September 2d. Sunday.—The turnkey served our dinner earlier than usual. His wild look and haggard eyes seemed to announce some disastrous tidings. He returned to us at two o'clock; we surrounded him, in breathless anxiety and expectation, but he was deaf or dumb to every question; and, with unusual precaution, he collected the knives, which we were accustomed to fold up in our napkins.

At half past two o'clock, the turbulent noise of the mob was dreadfully augmented by the drums beating "the general;" by shots of alarm from the cannon; and by the tocsin, which resounded on all sides. During this terrible tumult we saw three carriages pass, surrounded by a countless crowd of infuriated men and women, crying "A la Force, A la Force!"* The occupants of these coaches were conveyed to the cloister of the Abbaye, which had been set apart as a prison exclusively for the priests. An instant had hardly elapsed, when we heard that a general massacre had taken place of the bishops and other ecclesiastics, who, to use the vulgar expression of the time, had been parqués (penned up) in this receptacle.

Nearly four o'clock. We were attracted to the window by the piercing cries of a man, whom they were hacking to pieces with sabres. We beheld from the tower adjoining our apartment, a mangled body on the pavement; in an instant the slaughter of another wretched being succeeded—it is impossible to describe the horror of the profound and sombre silence which prevailed during these ferocious executions. The only perceptible sounds were the agonized shrieks of the massacred victims, and the clash of the sabres, as they struck their heads. They were no sooner extended lifeless on the ground, than the cries of "Vive la Nation!" arose. In the short intervals between the executions, we heard beneath our windows, "Not a single individual must escape; they must all die, particularly those in the chapel, who are all conspirators." Every species of distraction conspired to rouse us from reflection on our melancholy state; if silence prevailed in the streets, a tumultuous noise arose in the prison.

* We were not aware, at the moment, that this was the cry in vogue, when the victims of popular ferocity were led to death.

Five o'clock. Several voices pronounced the name aloud of M. Cazotte. A moment afterwards the stairs were descended by a crowd of people talking loudly. The clattering of arms was mingled with the cries of women and men. They were leading the venerable old man to death. He was followed by his daughter. When he passed to the exterior of the wicket to receive his doom, that courageous girl threw herself round the neck of her father. The emotion of the people at this touching sight, obtained the old man's pardon.

About seven o'clock. Two men entered, their hands bloody, and armed with sabres; a turnkey holding a torch conducted them, and pointed out the bed of the unfortunate Reding, who was a captain of the Swiss guard on the 10th of August, on which day his arm had been broken by a shot. He had also four sabre wounds on his head. At this horrible moment, I was pressing his hand and endeavouring to cheer him. One of the men began to remove him, but the wretched creature stopped him, saying, in a dying voice, "Ah! sir, I have suffered enough already. I am not afraid of death; but, in mercy, let me meet it here." He was rendered motionless by this appeal; but his comrade saying, "Allons donc," decided him; he was carried out on their shoulders, and conveyed into the street, where he was instantly dispatched—My eyes are so full of tears, that I cannot see what I write.—

We looked at one another without uttering a word. We wrung our hands in agony; we embraced in despair. We were motionless—there was a dead silence—and our eyes were fixed on the pavement of the prison, on which the moonlight fell through the triple columns of our windows. But soon our agitation was revived by the shrieks of fresh victims. We then thought on the words of the unfortunate M. Chanterami, who said, on plunging a knife into his heart, "We are all destined to be massacred."

Midnight. Ten men, sword-in-hand, preceded by two turnkeys bearing torches, entered our room, and ordered each of us to appear at the foot of his respective bed. When they had counted us, they said, we were responsible for one another, and swore, that if one single individual escaped, we should all be massacred without a hearing from the President. These last words conveyed a gleam of hope; for we were not confident of any thing like trial previously to our destruction.

Monday, 3d September, Two in the morning. One of the doors of the prison was broken open by reiterated blows. We thought, at first, it was the wicket, and that the populace were rushing to destroy us in our chamber. Our apprehensions were partly tranquillized, on hearing some one say on the stairs, that it was a dungeon door which had been barricaded by some prisoners. We shortly learned, that every human being in it was dispatched.

Ten o'clock. The Abbé L'Enfant, confessor to the king, and the Abbé Chapt-Rastignac, appeared in the tribune of the chapel where we were confined. They announced to us the approach of our last moments—and begged us to assemble to receive their benediction. By an electric impulse, we were on our knees, and our hands joined and raised to receive it. This moment, though consoling, was one of the most! —! we had yet experienced. On the eve of appearing before the Supreme Being, kneeling before two of his ministers, we presented an indescribable spectacle. The posture of these two venerable priests leaning over us—death hovering over our heads, and surrounding us on all sides—every circumstance imparted an awful solemnity to our condition. The moment seemed to approximate us to the Deity. It gave us courage—reason and reflection were suspended, and the awful ceremony was equally impressive on the cold and incredulous, on the ardent and confiding. In half an hour, we heard the cries of these two massacred ecclesiastics!

The thought which now occupied our chief attention, was the posture by which, on the reception of our fate, we should be exposed to the least torture, on our entering the place of massacre. Some of our comrades went, from time to time, to the window of the turret; that, by witnessing the suffering of the various victims, they might form an inference of the least agonizing means of meeting their destruction. They reported that those who extended their hands were the most considerable sufferers, as such a posture intercepted the sabre strokes, which fell, in consequence, with a diminished power upon the head; that some lost their hands and arms; but that they who placed them behind their backs were most readily and least painfully dispatched. We resolved on this ready method of escaping from the ferocity of our executioners.

Towards mid-day. Overwhelmed, almost annihilated, by supernatural agitation, and absorbed in thoughts too horrible to be expressed, I threw myself on a bed, and slept profoundly. To this sleep I believe myself indebted for the preservation of my life. I dreamed that I was before the terrible tribunal appointed for my trial; that, in spite of the hideous clamour of the tocsin and surrounding cries, I was heard attentively. My case was concluded, and I was set at liberty. This dream produced a beneficent impression on my mind, dissipated my agitation; and I awoke with a presentiment of my salvation. I related it to the partners in my misfortune, who were surprised at the confidence with which it inspired me, from the moment until my appearance before my judges.

Two o'clock. A proclamation was made, which the populace received with disapprobation; a moment afterwards, some people, who were either curious to see us, or perhaps disposed to point out to us the means of safety, placed a ladder against the window of our room; but all ascent was prevented by the cry of "A bas, a bas, c'est pour leur porter des armes."

In addition to our mental agonies, we endured the torture of a burning thirst: At length our turnkey, Bertrand, made his appearance alone, and we prevailed on him to grant us a jug of water. We had passed six-and-twenty hours without one solitary drop. When we represented this negligence to a federe, who came with other persons to inspect the prison, he was so indignant at the circumstance, that he demanded the name of the turnkey, that he might be exterminated on the instant; but our united and strenuous supplications averted the fate that but for them, inevitably awaited him.

We were soon afterwards disturbed by plaintive cries, which we found proceeded from a young officer who had wounded himself in several places. As the blade of his knife was rounded at the end, he had not succeeded in giving himself a mortal stroke; but the attempt accelerated his execution!

At Eight o'clock—The agitation of the mob subsided, and several voices cried, "Grace, grace, pour ceux qui restent." These words were feebly applauded. They, however, gave us a gleam of hope; and some among us were so convinced of their immediate deliverance, that they already had placed their bundles under their arms; the hope was delusive. The shrieks of death replunged us into the depth of our fears and agonies.

At eleven o'clock—Ten men, armed with sabres and pistols, ordered us to form a rank, and conducted us to a ward next the apartment in which was sitting the tribunal appointed for our trial. I cautiously approached one of the sentinels placed over us, and succeeded in entering into conversation with him. He told me in a patois, from which I discovered that he was either of Provence or Languedoc, that he had served eight years in the regiment of Lyonnais. I spoke patois to him; this appeared to please him, and my interested situation at the moment inspired me with such Gascon and persuasive eloquence, that I succeeded in drawing from him these words, the effect of which, at such crisis, I should in vain attempt to state: "Ne te cougneichi pas, mé pèrtant né peinsi qué siusque un trèste; au contrairi, te crèsi un boun goyat;" implying, "I do not know you; however, I believe you are not a traitor; on the contrary, I take you to be a good fellow."

I endeavoured, by all imaginable means, to confirm him in this favourable opinion, and so far succeeded, as to prevail on him to let me enter the awful presence in which the trial of a prisoner was proceeding. I witnessed the process against a surveyor to the king, who, being accused of the conspiracy of the 19th, was condemned and executed; another, who was sobbing and uttering words inarticulate from his anguish, was already undressed, and on the point of being delivered to his fate, when a workman of Paris recognised him, and protested that he was mistaken for another person. He was accordingly remanded; and on a subsequent hearing, proclaimed innocent and set at liberty.

From what I had just seen, I distinctly saw the turn it was advisable to give to my defence. I returned into the adjoining ward, where I saw some prisoners who had been just brought in. I begged my Provençal friend to procure me a glass of wine. As he was going to get it, he was desired to reconduct me to the chapel, which I accordingly re-entered, quite at a loss to discover for what purpose we had been taken down; I found that ten new prisoners had replaced five who had been tried. I lost no time in making the needful alterations in my defence, and was busily employed on it, convinced that firmness and frankness alone could save me, when my Provençal acquaintance entered, and said to the turnkey, "Bacle la porte, à la tour-nante sculemènt, et attens mé en défore."—"Shut the door, with the key only, and wait for me outside." He drew near me and said, seizing my hand, "Béni pér tu—Baqui lou bin qué mas demandat:—ben."—"I come for you—There's the wine you asked me for—drink." I had drank more than half of it, when he put his hand on the bottle and said, "Sacriedi, moun amic, coumé ybas; n'en boll pèryou; à tasantat."—"Sacré, my friend, how you drink—I want some myself—here's to your health"—and he drank the remainder. He then continued—"Né poudi pas damoura dans tu loun tén; mé rapelé-té de cé qué té disi. Si ses un caloutin ou bé un conspirateur d' au castél de monser Bétot, sias flambat; mé si né sias pas un trèste, nage pas po; te respoundi dé ta bête."

"Eh! moun amic, suis bien surt dé n'esta pas accusat dé tout acco; mé passi per esta un tantinel aristoucrate—"

"Coy re caco; los juges sabent bé qui a d'honestés gens pér tout. Lou president es un hounéste homme, qué n'est pas un sot."

"Fasei mé lou plasei de préga los juges de m'escouta; né damandi caco—"

"Lou siras, t'en respoundi. Arça, adissias, amic; d' au couragé; m'en ban à mon poste;—taquerci dé fa bene toun tour lou plu leu que sira poussible. Embrasse mé; meui à tu de boun co—" which dialogue interpreted is this:—"I cannot remain with you long, but remember what I tell you: If you are a priest or a conspirator of the château of M. Veto, you are undone; but if you are no traitor, entertain no fear; I answer for your life."

I replied—"Ah! my good friend, I don't fear being accused of all that, though I am supposed to be somewhat of an aristocrat."

He said—"That is nothing; the judges know that there are honest men of all parties. The president is an upright man, and no fool."

I requested him—"Do me the favour to beg the judges to hear me; I ask but that."—"You shall be heard, this I promise you. So now, my friend, adieu. Courage!—I am off to my post.—I will endeavour to bring your turn on as soon as possible. Embrace me; I am yours, with all my heart."

We embraced, and he departed, No one but a prisoner in the Abbaye on the 3d of September 1792, can appreciate the consoling influence of the brief conversation I have recorded.

Towards midnight, the frightful and unnatural tumult which had raged for thirty-six hours, began to abate:

and we imagined that the judges, and their executive authority,* being overwhelmed with fatigue, would require repose before they entered on our trial. We were making our beds, when we heard a proclamation, which was loudly hooted. In a moment, a man asked the populace what it wanted; and we heard him distinctly answer, "The priests and conspirators who remain, and who are in the prison, (ont graissé la patte des juges,) have greased the judges' hands—and that is the reason of their not being tried." It appeared to us, that he had no sooner spoken, than he was dispatched. The noise and agitation of the mob rose into fearful exasperation. The tumult increased momentarily, and when the disturbance was at its height—the officers of the committee came for M. Defon—one of the old garde de corps—whose cries, in the agony of death, shortly succeeded. In a few moments, two of our comrades were carried off—and then, I began to think that my fatal hour approached.

At length, on Tuesday, at one in the morning, after enduring, for thirty-seven hours, an agony more terrible than death itself—after having drunk a thousand and a thousand times the cup of bitterness—the floor of my prison was thrown open—my name was pronounced—I followed. Three men seized me, and placed me before my terrible judges.

The last Crisis of my Agony.

By the flaring light of two torches, I beheld the tribunal which was to give me life or death. The President, dressed in a grey coat, and wearing a sabre, was leaning on a table, covered with papers, an escrutin, pipes, and bottles. The table was surrounded by ten persons, some standing, some seated, two of whom were in waistcoats only, and wore aprons; others were extended on the benches, fast asleep. The door was kept by two men, sword in hand, in shirts stained with blood; an elderly turnkey kept his hand incessantly on the bolts. Three persons, in front of the President, held a prisoner about sixty years of age. I was seated in a corner; my guards placed their sabres across my breast, and warned me, that if I made the slightest attempt to stir, they would poniard me immediately. I looked on all sides for my Provencal. I saw two national guards present a reclamation from the section of the Croix Rouge, in favour of the accused before the President. He replied—"these solicitations are useless in behalf of traitors."—The prisoner cried,—"it is horrible—your judgment is a mere assassination." The President said, "My hands are washed of it,—lead out M. Maillé—" He was pushed into the street, where I saw him massacred, while the door was yet open.

The President sat down, apparently to register the name of the unfortunate man just dispatched. I heard the order given: "a un autre!"

I was immediately placed before the expeditious and bloody tribunal. Two of my guards held each a hand—the third seized the collar of my coat.

The President, (addressing me.) Your name and profession?

One of the Judges.—The slightest lie will be fatal to you.

Ans.—My name is Jourgniac St Méard; I have served 25 years as an officer; and I appear before you with the assurance naturally belonging to a man, who has nothing with which to reproach himself, and who consequently will not resort to falsehood.

The President.—That we shall see. A moment — (he then inspected the commitment and accusation, which he passed round to the other judges.) Do you know the cause of your arrest?

Ans. Yes, Monsieur le President,† and I can readily believe, after the glaring falsity of the accusations made against me, that the Committee of Surveillance would not have sanctioned my imprisonment, were it not for the precautions imposed

* This was the designation given to the butchers of the condemned.

† I was considerably annoyed at the frequency with which the President's attention was engrossed; as well as that of the other Judges. People were constantly whispering to them, and bringing them letters.

on it by the safety of the people (le salut du peuple). I am accused of being the editor of an anti-feuillant journal, called the Journal de la Cour et de la Ville. I tell the naked truth, when I assert that imputation to be false. The editor of that publication is a man named Gautier, whose description is so strikingly at variance with mine, that nothing but iniquitous malignity could have made a mistake in our persons—and if I am able to search my pockets—

I here endeavoured in vain to extract my pocketbook from my coat; one of the judges perceiving my predicament, desired the men who held me to let go their hold. I then laid on the table the attestations of several clerks, factors, merchants, and proprietors of houses in which he had lodged, proving Gautier to be the editor and sole proprietor of the Journal in question.

One of the Judges.—Nevertheless, there is no smoke without fire: how comes this accusation to fall on you? tell us that.

Ans.—That, sir, is what I was about to do. You are aware, gentlemen, that the journal of which we are speaking was the receptacle of all the Calendourgs, the quolibets, the epigrams and pleasantries, whether good or bad, which emanated from Paris, or the eighty-three departments. I might aver that I never was the author of one of these trifles, seeing that no manuscript of mine is produced in proof of it; but candour, which has hitherto befriended me, must serve me now; and I will confess, that the gaiety of my disposition often inspired me with harmless sallies, which I did send to the Sieur Gautier. There, gentlemen, is the whole and sole foundation of my impeachment, which equals in absurdity the monstrous accusation I have next to deal with. I have been denounced for having recruited on the frontiers, of having conducted such levies to the emigrants—(a general murmur arose, which, however, I did not permit to disconcert me; I continued, having raised my voice)—Gentlemen, gentlemen, I am speaking; and I implore you, Monsieur le President, to maintain the attention of my judges—never was it more essential to me than at the present moment.

Nearly all the Judges said, laughing, "Right! right!—silence!"

I proceeded—My accuser is a monster—this I shall prove to you, Judges, whom the people would not have chosen, had they not known them to possess the power of discriminating between guilt and innocence. There, gentlemen, are certificates proving that I have not been out of Paris for three-and-twenty months; and there are the declarations of the three landlords, with whom I have lodged during that period, which corroborate the other attestations.

They were examining these papers, when we were interrupted by the arrival of a prisoner, who was instantly placed before the President. The men who held him said he was another priest, whom they had just taken from his nest (deniché) in the chapel. After a brief interrogation, he was sent to his fate. (A la Force.) He cast his breviary on the table—was dragged out at the wicket, and slaughtered. This done, I resumed my place before the tribunal.

One of the Judges.—I do not say that these certificates are false; but who can prove the truth of them?

Ans.—Your observation, sir, is just; and, to afford the utmost knowledge on that subject, confine me in a dungeon, if you please, until commissaries, named by Monsieur le President, have verified them. If they prove false, I deserve to die.

One of the Judges.—(Who, during my interrogation, appeared interested in my behalf, said, in a low voice.) A guilty person would not speak with this decided confidence.

Another Judge.—Of what section are you?

Ans.—Of the Halle aubé.

A National Guard.—(Not of the number of the Judges).—Ah! ah! I belong to that section. At whose house do you reside?

Ans.—At the house of M. Teyssier, rue Croix des Petits Champs.

The National Guard.—I know him, for we have had transactions together; and I can tell if this be his certificate: (he looked at it and said,) Gentlemen, I can state that this is decidedly the signature of the citizen Teyssier!

I exclaimed, in a manner which attracted general attention, Ah! gentlemen, after the testimony of that worthy man, which utterly disproves the accusation which was aimed at my existence, what can—what must you think of the man who has denounced me?

The judge (who had already manifested a favourable feeling towards me)—C'est un gueux—and if he were here, justice should take its course on him. Do you know the man?

Ans. No, sir; but he must of necessity be one of the Committee of Surveillance de la Commune; and I confess, that, if I did know him, I should think I rendered a service to the public, in warning it by placards to beware of such a—

One of the Judges.—It is clearly established that you are not the editor of a journal, and that you were not employed in the levy of recruits. But what have you to say regarding your aristocratic conversations at the houses of certain booksellers in the Palais Royal?

Ans. I am ready to reply. If I have not hesitated to avow what I have written, still less do I fear to confess what I have said, and even thought. I have invariably advised obedience to the laws, and have strengthened my precept by the force of my example. At the same time, I acknowledge that I have used the freedom given me by the constitution, in saying that I regarded it as an imperfect one, perceiving that it established us in an erroneous position. If that was criminal, then the constitution itself extended a trap to me; and the permission, which it expressly gives to expose its imperfections, is a mere snare to those who confide in the validity of its professions. I have said, too, that the nobles of the assemblée constituante, who evinced such patriotic zeal, were actuated more by personal ambition and selfish interest than by the love of country; and when the whole of Paris was infatuated with their show of patriotism, I said, “ils vous trompent.” I appeal to you, gentlemen, if events have justified my opinion. I have frequently reproved the base and awkward manoeuvres of certain personages, whose device was, “The constitution, the whole constitution, and nothing but the ‘constitution.’”

I long foresaw a great catastrophe, the inevitable result of this same constitution, revised by egotists, who, like those of whom I have just spoken, were toiling for their own exclusive ends. Dissimulation, rapacity, and cowardice, were the attributes of those charlatans. The characteristics of their opponents were fanaticism, intrepidity, and frankness. It required no great strength of perception to foresee which party would eventually triumph. Gentlemen, no man was more solicitous of the reform of abuses than myself. Here are pamphlets of my production during the sitting of the States-General; they prove what I now advance. I always thought that we were going too far for a constitution, and that we fell short of a republic. I am neither a Jacobin nor a Failliant. I never approved the principles of the former party, though they were more consistent and ingenious than those professed by the latter; which I always shall detest, until it is proved to me that it was not the source of the deep calamities we have endured.

A Judge (impatiently).—You are incessantly telling us, you are not this, and you are not that. What are you then?

Ans. I was an open royalist.—(A murmur arose, which was appeased by the judge, who on one or two previous occasions, had evinced an interest in my behalf.)—He said word for word, “We are not here to try opinions; we are here to try results.”

I continued—Yes, gentlemen, I was an open royalist; though I was never paid for my opinions. I was a royalist, because I thought a monarchy adapted to my country, because I loved the king individually and sincerely. This was the sentiment of my heart till the 10th of August.—(Another murmur arose, apparently more favourable than the last.)—I never heard of plots or conspiracies, but through the expression of public indignation. When occasion has required it, I have extended my succour to any man, without enquiring his principles. There are journals—patriotic journals*—which attest the truth of the remarks I have the honour of addressing to you. I was beloved by the peasantry of my estate; for when the châteaux of my neighbours were in flames, my tenants flocked to me in crowds to testify their affection, and planted, as an emblem of their attachment, a maypole in my court. To you, gentlemen, these details will wear the semblance of minuteness; but, were you in my place, you would feel the inducement which prevails with me, to indulge in facts of such a beneficial tendency. I can assert that no soldier in the king's regiment of infantry, in which I served for five-and-twenty years, has had cause to complain of me.*

* I here showed the commission certain popular journals, in which I was favourably mentioned, especially in the Courrier des 83 départements.

One of the Judges.—I shall soon see if you served in the Régiment du Roi. Did you know M. Moreau in it?

Ans. Yes, sir; I knew two of that name. One was a tall, stout, and rational character, the other was small, extremely thin, and very—(I here intimated by a gesture that he was somewhat flighty.)

The same Judge.—The same: I see you know him.

At this moment, the wicket leading to the stairs was opened, and M. Marqué entered under an escort of three men. He had been formerly my comrade in the King's regiment, and was one of my fellow-prisoners in the Abbaye. He was placed in the corner I had occupied before my trial, and was apparently the next in succession to take his own.

I resumed my address: After the unfortunate affair at Nanci, I came to Paris, where I have since remained. I was arrested at my apartments twelve days since; an event which I so little expected, that I invariably appeared in public as usual. The public seals have not been applied to my residence, as nothing in my chambers offered grounds of the slightest suspicion. I was never borne on the civil list—I have signed no petitions—I have maintained no reprehensible correspondence—I have not quitted France since the epoch of the Revolution.

During my sojourn in the capital I have lived in perfect tranquillity—I have indulged the gaiety of my disposition, and followed the bent of my principles, which have invariably withheld me from any curious interference in the public concerns; and to no man, of whatever party, have I committed myself by injury or unkindness. This, gentlemen, is all I have to say of my conduct and my principles. The sincerity of my confessions will convince you that I am not a dangerous character, and under the explanations I have offered, I may presume to entertain the hope that you will restore me to liberty, to which I am naturally attached, and which it will become my duty and endeavour to maintain.

The President (after taking off his hat.)—I see no ground of suspicion in the conduct of this gentleman; I grant him his liberty.—Gentlemen, do you agree with me?

All the Judges.—Yes, yes—C'est juste!

On the utterance of these words, I was embraced by those around me. I heard a shout of bravo! behind me, which proceeded from a number of heads closely grouped together at the air-hole of the wicket.

The President deputed three persons† to announce the judgment to the people. When they had done so, they returned, desired me to put my hat on, and accompany them. I was led to the exterior of the Abbaye. As soon as I was fairly in the street, one of them cried out, "Chapeaux bas!—Citoyens, voilà celui pour lequel vos juges demandent aide et secours." These words were followed by shouts of "Vive la Nation!" I was placed in the centre of four torches, and conducted by the executive authority; an honour, which informed me that I was then under the safeguard of the people, who applauded clamorously as I passed along. The first impulse of my benevolent and friendly landlord, on my arrival at his house, was to offer to my escort the contents of his pocketbook, which they refused. "No, * Here one of the judges trode on my foot, to warn me that I was about to compromise myself. I felt a contrary assurance.

† Of these three deputies, one was a mason—the other, a native of Bourges, was a wig-maker's apprentice—the third, who wore the uniform of the National Guard, was a fédéré.

sir, we do not perform our duty for money. There is your friend; he promised us a glass of eau-de-vie; when we have drunk it, we must return to our post." They required an attestation of my safe arrival at my home; which having received, I accompanied them to the end of the street, and cordially embraced them at our parting. In the morning a commissary brought me the following certificate:—

"We, commissaries appointed by the people to do justice on the traitors detained in the prison of the Abbaye, caused to appear before us, on the 4th September, the citizen Jourgniac Saint-Méard, ancien officier décoré, who has disproved the accusations made against him, to the effect of his having conspired against the patriots; we caused his innocence to be proclaimed in presence of the people, who applauded his restoration to liberty. By virtue of which, we have given him the present certificate, at his request; and we hereby invite all citizens to grant him aid and succour.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATI PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. X.

A SLIGHT COLD—RICH AND POOR—GRAVE DOINGS

CONSIDER "a slight cold" to be in the nature of a chill, caught by a sudden contact with your grave: or, as occasioned by the damp finger of Death laid upon you, as it were to mark you for us, in passing to the more immediate object of his commission. Let this be called croaking, and laughed at as such, by those who are "awearied of the painful round of life," and are on the look-out for their dismissal from it; but be learnt off by heart, and remembered as having the force and truth of gospel, by all those who would "measure out their span upon the earth," and are conscious of any constitutional flaw or feebleness; who are distinguished by any such tendency death-ward, as long necks, narrow, chicken-chests—very fair complexions—requisite sympathy with atmospheric variations; or, in short, exhibit any symptoms of an asthmatic or consumptive character, if they choose to NEGLECT A SLIGHT COLD.

Let not those complain of being bitten by a reptile, which they have cherished to maturity in their very bosoms, when they might have crushed it in the egg! Now, if we call "a slight cold" the egg,* and pleurisy —inflammation of the lungs—asthma—CONSUMPTION, the venomous reptile—the matter will be no more than correctly figured. There are many ways in which this "egg" may be deposited and hatched. Going suddenly, slightly clad, from a heated into a cold atmosphere, especially if you can contrive to be in a state of perspiration; sitting or standing in a draught, however slight; it is the breath of Death, reader, and laden with the vapours of the grave! Lying in damp beds—for there his cold arms shall embrace you; continuing in wet clothing, and neglecting wet feet—these, and a hundred others, are some of the ways in which you may slowly, imperceptibly, but surely cherish the creature, that shall at last creep inextricably inwards, and lie coiled about your very vitals. Once more, again—again—again—I would say, ATTEND to this, all ye who think it a small matter to—NEGLECT A SLIGHT COLD!

So many painful—I may say dreadful illustrations of the truth of the above remarks, are strewn over the pages of my Diary, that I scarce know which of them to select. The following melancholy "instance" will, * Omnium prope quibus affligimur morborum origo et quasi semen, says an intelligent medical writer of the last century.

I hope, prove as impressive, as I think it interesting.

Captain C—— had served in the Peninsular campaigns with distinguished merit; and on the return of the British army, sold out, and determined to enjoy in private life an ample fortune bequeathed him by a distant relative. At the period I am speaking of, he was in his twenty-ninth or thirtieth year; and in person one of the very finest men I ever saw in my life. There was an air of ease and frankness about his demeanour, dashed with a little pensiveness, which captivated every body with whom he conversed—but the ladies especially. It seemed the natural effect produced on a bold but feeling heart, by frequent scenes of sorrow. Is not such an one formed to win over the heart of woman? Indeed it seemed so—for at the period I am speaking of, our English ladies were absolutely infatuated about the military; and a man who had otherwise but little chance, had only to appear in regimentals, to turn the scale in his favour. One would have thought the race of soldiery was about to become suddenly extinct; for in almost every third marriage that took place within two years of the magnificent event at Waterloo—whether rich or poor, high or low, a red coat was sure to be the “principal performer.” Let the reader then, being apprized of this influenza—for what else was it—set before his imagination the tall commanding figure of Captain C——, his frank and noble bearing—his excellent family—his fortune, upwards of four thousand a-year—and calculate the chances in his favour! I met him several times in private society, during his stay in town, and have his image vividly in my eye as he appeared in the last evening we met. He wore a blue coat, white waistcoat, and an ample black neck-kerchief. His hair was very light, and disposed with natural grace over a remarkably fine forehead, the left corner of which bore the mark of a slight sabre-cut. His eye, bright hazel—clear and full—which you would in your own mind instantly compare to that of most winning and soul-subduing tenderness. Much more might I say in his praise, and truly—but that I have a melancholy end in view. Suffice it to add, that wherever he moved, he seemed the sun of the social circle, gazed on by many a soft starlike eye, with trembling rapture—the envied object of

from all that was fair and beautiful!

He could not remain long disengaged. Intelligence soon found its way to town of his having formed an attachment to Miss Ellen ——, a wealthy and beautiful northern heiress, whose heart soon surrendered to its skilful assailant. Every body was pleased with the match, and pronounced it suitable in all respects. I had an opportunity of seeing Captain C—— and Miss —— together at an evening party in London; for the young lady’s family spent the season in town, and were, of course, attended by the Captain, who took up his quarters in —— Street. A handsome couple they looked!

This was nearly twelve months after their engagement; and most of the preliminaries had been settled on both sides, and the event was fixed to take place within a fortnight of Miss —— and family’s return to ——shire. The last day of their stay in town, they formed a large and gay water party, and proceeded up the river a little beyond Richmond, in a beautiful open boat belonging to Lord ——, a cousin of the Captain’s. It was rather late before their return; and long ere their arrival at Westminster stairs, the wind and rain combined against the party, and assailed them with a fury against which their awning formed but an insufficient protection. Captain C—— had taken an oar for the last few miles; and as they had to pull against a strong tide, his task was not a trifling one. When he resigned his oar, he was in a perfect bath of perspiration: but he drew on his coat, and resumed the seat he had formerly occupied beside Miss ——, at the back of the boat. The awning unfortunately got rent immediately behind where they sat; and what with the splashing of the water on his back, and the equally gusts of wind which incessantly

“Mars—to threaten and command,” was capable of an expression of the burst upon them, Captain C—— got thoroughly wet and chilled. Miss —— grew uneasy about him, but he laughed off her apprehensions, assuring her that they were groundless, and that he was "too old a soldier" to suffer from such a trifling thing as a little "wind and wet." On their leaving the boat, he insisted on accompanying them home to —— Square, and stayed there upwards of an hour, busily conversing with them about their departure on the morrow. While there he took a glass or two of wine, but did not change his clothes. On returning to his lodgings, he was too busily and pleasantly occupied with thoughts about his approaching nuptials, to advert to the necessity of using more precautions against cold, before retiring to bed. He sat down in his dressing-room, without ordering a fire to be lit, and wrote two or three letters; after which he got into bed. Now, how easy would it have been for Captain C—— to obviate any possible ill consequences, by simply ringing for warm water to put his feet in, and a basin of gruel, or posset? He did not do either of these, however; thinking it would be time enough to "cry out when he was hurt." In the morning he rose, and, though a little indisposed, immediately after breakfast drove to —— Square, to see off his lady and the family; for it had been arranged that he should remain behind a day or two, in order to complete a few purchases of jewellery, &c. &c., and then follow the party to ——shire. He rode on horseback beside their travelling carriage a few miles out of town; and then took his leave and returned. On his way home he called at my house, but finding me out, left his card, with a request that I would come and see him in the evening. About seven o'clock I was with him. I found him in his dressing-gown, in an easy-chair, drinking coffee. He looked rather dejected, and spoke in a desponding tone. He complained of the common symptoms of catarrh; and detailed to me the account which I have just laid before the reader. I remonstrated with him on his last night's imprudence.

"Ah Doctor ——, I wish to Heaven I had rowed on to Westminster, tired as I was!" said he—"Good God, what if I have caught my death of cold?—You cannot conceive how singular my sensations are!"

"That's generally the way with patients after the mischief's done," I replied with a smile—"But come! come! only take care of yourself, and matters are not at all desperate!"—"Heigh-ho!"—"Sighing like furnace," I continued gaily, on hearing him utter several sighs in succession—"You sons of Mars make bad hot work of it, both in love and war!"—again he sighed. "Why, what's the matter, Captain?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing," he replied languidly, "I suppose a cold generally depresses one's spirits—is it so? Is it a sign of a severe?"

"It is a sign that a certain person"

"Pho, Doctor, pho!"—said he, with an air of lassitude—"don't think me so childish!—I'll tell you candidly what has contributed to depress my spirits. For this last week or so, I've had a strange sort of conviction that"

"Nonsense—none of your nervous fancies!"

"Ah, but I have, Doctor," he continued, scarce noticing the interruption, "I've felt a sort of presentiment—a foreboding that—that—something or other would occur to prevent my marriage!"

"Oh, tush—tush!—every one has these low nervous fancies that is not accustomed to sickness."

"Well—it may be so—I hope it may be nothing more; but I seem to hear a voice whispering—or at least, to be under an influence to that effect, that the cup will be dashed brimful from my opened lips—a fearful slip!—It seems as if my Ellen were too great a happiness for the Fates to allow one!"

"Too great a fiddlestick, Captain!—so your schoolboy has a fearful apprehension that he cannot outlive the day of his final leaving school—too glorious and happy an era!"

"I know well what you allude to—but mine is a calm and rational apprehension!"

"Come, come, Captain C——, this is going too far. Raillery apart, however, I can fully enter into your feelings!"—I continued, perceiving his morbid excitement—"Tis but human nature—to feel trepidation and apprehension when approaching some great crisis of one's existence. One is apt to give unfavourable possibilities an undue preponderance over probabilities; and it is easily to be accounted for, on the known tendency we find within ourselves, on ordinary occasions, to shape events according to our wishes—and in our over-anxiety to guard against such!"

"Very metaphysical—very true, I dare say!"

"Well—to be matter-of-fact—I had all your feelings—perhaps greatly aggravated—at the time of my own marriage!"

"Eh?—indeed?—Had you really?" he enquired eagerly, laying his hand on mine—continuing with an air of anxious curiosity—"Did you ever feel a sort of conviction that some mysterious agency was awaiting your approach towards the critical point, and when just within reach of your object, would suddenly smite you down?"

"Ay, to be sure," said I, smiling, "a mere flutter of feeling—which you see others have besides yourself; but that you—trained to confront danger—change—casualties of all sorts—that you—you, with your frame of Herculean build!"

"Well—a truce to your banter!" he interrupted me somewhat impatiently; "I should'nt mind taking you ten to one that I don't live to be married, after all!"

"Come, this amounts to a symptom of your indisposition. You have got more fever on you than I thought—and you grow lightheaded!—you must really get to bed, and in the morning all these fantasies will be gone."

"Well—I hope in God they may! But they horribly oppress me! I own that latterly I've given in a little to fatalism."

"This won't do at all," thought I, taking my pen in hand, and beginning to write a prescription.

"Are you thirsty at all? any catching in the side when you breathe? Any cough?" &c. &c., said I, asking him the usual routine of questions. I feared from the symptoms he described, that he had caught a very severe, and possibly obstinate, cold—so I prescribed active medicines. Amongst others, I recollect ordering him one-fourth of a grain of tar-tarized antimony every four hours, for the purpose of encouraging the insensible perspiration, and thereby determining the flow outwards. I then left him, promising to call about noon the next day, expressing my expectations of finding him perfectly recovered from his indisposition. I found him the following morning in bed, thoroughly under the influence of the medicines I had prescribed, and, in fact, much better in every respect. The whole surface of his body was damp and clammy to the touch, and he had exactly the proper sensation of nausea—both occasioned by the antimony. I contented myself with prescribing a repetition of the medicines.

"Well, Captain, and what has become of your glorious forebodings of last night?" I enquired with a smile.

"Why—hem! I'm certainly not quite so depending as I was last night; but still, the goal—the goal's not reached yet! I'm not well yet—and even if I were, there's a good fortnight's space for contingencies!"

"* * I enjoined him to keep house for a day or two longer, and persevere with the medicines during that time, in order to his complete recovery, and he reluctantly acquiesced. He had written to inform Miss —, that owing to "a slight cold," and his jeweller's disappointing him about the trinkets he had promised, his stay in town would be prolonged two or three days. This circumstance had fretted and "worried" him a good deal.

One of the few enjoyments which my professional engagements permitted me, was the opera, where I might for a while forget the plodding realities of life, and wander amid the magnificent regions of music and imagination. Few people, indeed, are so disposed to "make the most" of their time at the opera as medical men, to whom it is a sort of stolen pleasure; they sit on thorns, liable to be summoned out immediately—to exchange the bright scenes of fairy-land for the dreary bedside of sickness and death. I may not, perhaps, speak the feelings of my more phlegmatic brethren; but the considerations above named always make me sit listening to what is going on in a state of painful suspense and nervousness, which is aggravated by the slightest noise at the box-door—by the mere trying of the handle.—On the evening of the day in question, a friend of my wife's had kindly allowed us the use of her box; and we were both sitting in our places at a musical banquet of unusual splendour, for it was Catalani's benefit. In looking round the house, during the interval between the opera and ballet, I happened to cast my eye towards the opposite box, at the moment it was entered by two gentlemen of very fashionable appearance. Fancying that the person of one of them was familiar to me, I raised my glass, my sight being rather short. I almost let it fall out of my hand with astonishment—for one of the gentlemen was—Captain C——! He whom I had that morning left ill in bed! Scarcely believing that I had seen aright, I re-directed my glass to the same spot, but there was no mistaking the stately and handsome person of my patient. There he stood, with the gay and even rather flustered air of one who has but recently adjourned thither from the wine-table! He seemed in very high spirits—his face flushed—chatting incessantly with his companion, and smiling and nodding frequently towards persons in various parts of the house. Concern and wonder at his rashness—his madness—in venturing out under such circumstances, kept me for some time breathless. Could I really be looking at my patient Captain C——? Him whom I had left in bed, under the influence of strong sudorifics? Who had faithfully promised that he would keep within doors for two or three days longer? What had induced him to transgress the order of his medical attendant—thus to put matters in a fair train for verifying his own gloomy apprehensions expressed but the evening before?—Thoughts like these made me so uneasy, that, after failing to attract his eye, I resolved to go round to his box and remonstrate with him. After tapping at the door several times without being heard, on account of the loud tones in which they were laughing and talking, the door was opened.

"Good God! Doctor ——" exclaimed Captain —, in amazement, rising and giving me his hand. "Why, what on earth is the matter? What has brought you here? Is any thing wrong? Heaven! Have you heard any thing about Miss —?" he continued, all in a breath, turning pale.

"Not a breath—not a word—but what has brought you here, Captain? Are you stark staring mad?" I replied, as I continued grasping his hand, which was even then damp and clammy.

"Why—why—nothing particular," he stammered, startled by my agitated manner. "What is there so very wonderful in my coming to the opera? Have I done wrong, eh?" after a pause.

"You have acted like a madman, Captain C——, in venturing even out of your bedroom, while under the influence of the medicines you were taking!"

"Oh, nonsense, my dear doctor—nonsense! What harm can there be? I felt infinitely better after you left me this morning;" and he proceeded to explain that his companion, to whom he introduced me, was Lieutenant —, the brother of his intended bride; that he had that morning arrived in town from Portsmouth, had called on the Captain, and, after drinking a glass or two of champagne, and forcing the Captain to join him, had prevailed on him to accompany him to dinner at his hotel. Lieutenant — overcame all his scruples—laughed at the idea of his "slight cold," and said it would be "unkind to refuse the brother of Ellen!"—So after dinner, they both adjourned to the opera. I nodded towards the door, and we both left the box for a moment or two. "Why, Doctor —, you don't mean to say that I'm running any real risk?" he enquired, with some trepidation. "What could I do, you know, when the Lieutenant there—only just returned from his cruise—Ellen's brother, you know?"

"Excuse me, Captain —. Did you take the medicines I ordered regularly, up to the time of your going out?" I enquired anxiously.

"To be sure I did—punctual as clockwork; and, egad! now, I think of it," he added eagerly, "I took a double dose of the powders, just before leaving my room, by way of making 'assurance doubly sure,' you know—ha, ha! Right, eh?"

"Have you perspired during the day, as usual?"

"Oh, profusely—profusely! Egad, I must have sweated all the fever out long ago, I think! I hadn't been in the open air half an hour, when my skin was as dry as yours—as dry as ever it was in my life. Nay, in fact, I felt rather chilled than otherwise."

"Allow me, Captain—did you drink much at dinner?"

"Why—I own—I think I'd my share; these tars, you know—such cursed soakers!"

"Let me feel your pulse," said I. It was full and thrilling, beating upwards of one hundred a minute. My looks, I suppose, alarmed him; for while I was feeling his pulse, he grew very pale, and leaned against the box-door, saying, in a fainter tone than before, "I'm afraid I've done wrong in coming out. Your looks alarm me."

"You have certainly acted very—very imprudently, but I hope the mischief is not irretrievable," said I, in as cheerful a tone as I could, for I saw that he was growing excessively agitated. "At all events, if you'll take my advice!"

"If!—there's no need of taunting one!"

"Well, then, you'll return home instantly, and muffle yourself up in your cloak as closely as possible."

"I will! By the way, do you remember the bet I offered you," said he, with a sickly smile, wiping the perspiration from his forehead. "I—I—I fear you may take it, and win! Good God! what evil star is over me? Would to Heaven this Lieutenant—— had never crossed my path!—I'll return home this instant, and do all you recommend; and, for God's sake, call early in the morning, whether I send for you or not!—By——! your looks and manner have nearly given me the brain-fever!"—I took my leave, promising to be with him early; and advising him to take a warm-bath the moment it could be procured—to persevere with the powders—and lie in bed till I called. But, alas, alas! alas, the mischief had been done!

"Dear me, what a remarkably fine-looking man that Captain C—— is," said my wife, as soon as I had re-seated myself beside her.

"He is a dead man, my love, if you like!" I replied, with a melancholy air. The little incident just recorded, made me too sad to sit out the ballet, so we left very early, and I do not think we interchanged more than a word or two in going home; and those were, "Poor Miss——!"—"Poor Captain C——!" I do not pretend to say that even the rash conduct of Captain C——, and its probable consequences, could in every instance warrant such gloomy fears; but in his case, I felt with himself a sort of superstitious apprehension, I knew not why.

I found him, on calling in the morning, exhibiting the incipient symptoms of inflammation of the lungs. He complained of increasing difficulty of breathing—a sense of painful oppression and constriction all over his chest, and a hard harassing cough, attended with excruciating pain. His pulse quivered and thrilled under the finger, like a tense harp-string after it has been twanged; the whole surface of his body was dry and heated; his face was flushed, and full of anxiety. A man of his robust constitution, and plethoric habit, was one of the very worst subjects of inflammation! I took from the arm, myself, a very large quantity of blood—which presented the usual appearance in such cases—and prescribed active lowering remedies. But neither these measures, nor the application of a large blister in the evening—when I again saw him—seemed to make any impression on the complaint, so I ordered him to be bled again. Poor Captain C——! From that morning he prepared himself for a fatal termination of his illness, and lamented, in the most passionate terms, that he had not acted up to my advice in time!

On returning home from my evening visit, I found an express, requiring my instant attendance on a lady of distinction in the country, an old patient of mine; and was obliged to hurry off, without having time to do more than commit the care of Captain C——, and another equally urgent, to the care of Dr D——, a friend of mine close by, imploring him to keep up the most active treatment with the Captain—and promising him that I should return during the next day.—I was detained in the country for two days, during which I scarcely left Lady ——'s bedroom an instant; and before I left for town she expired, under heart-rending circumstances.—On returning to town, I found several urgent cases requiring my instant attention, and first and foremost that of poor Captain C——. Dr D—— was out, so I hurried to my patient's bedside at once. It cannot injure any one at this distance of time, to state plainly, that the poor Captain's case had been most deplorably mismanaged during my absence. It was owing to no fault of my friend Dr D——, who had done his utmost, and had his own large practice to attend to. He was therefore under the necessity of committing the case to the more immediate superintendence of a young and inexperienced member of the profession, who, in his ignorance and timidity, threw aside the only chances for Captain C——'s life—repeated blood-letting. Only once did Mr —— bleed him; and then took away about four ounces! Under the judicious management of Dr D——, the inroads of the inflammation had been sensibly checked; but it rallied again, and made head against the languid resistance continued by the young apothecary; so that I arrived but in time to witness the closing scene.

He was absolutely withering under the fever; the difficulty with which he drew his breath amounted almost to suffocation. He had a dry hacking cough—the oppression of his chest was greater than ever; and what he expectorated was of a black colour! He was delirious, and did not know me. He fancied himself on the river, rowing—then endeavouring to protect Miss —— from the inclemency of the weather; and the expressions of moving tenderness which he coupled with her name, were heart-breaking. Then again he thought himself in —— shire, superintending the alterations of his house, which was getting ready for their reception on their marriage. He mentioned my name, and said, "What a gloomy man that Dr —— is, Ellen! he keeps one stewing in bed for a week, if one has but a common cold!"

Letters were dispatched into —— shire, to acquaint his family, and that of Miss ——, with the melancholy tidings of his dangerous illness. Several of his relations soon made their appearance; but as Miss ——'s party did not go direct home, but staid a day or two on the way, I presume the letters reached —— House long before their arrival, and were not seen by the family before poor Captain C—— had expired!

I called again on him in the evening. The first glance at his countenance sufficed to shew me that he could not survive the night. I found that the cough and spitting had ceased suddenly; he felt no pain; his feeble, varying pulse, indicated that the powers of nature were rapidly sinking. His lips had assumed a fearfully livid hue, and were occasionally retracted so as to shew all his teeth; and his whole countenance was fallen. He was quite sensible, and aware that he was dying. He bore the intelligence with noble fortitude, saying, it was but the fruit of his own imprudence and folly. He several times ejaculated, "Oh, Ellen—Ellen—Ellen!" and shook his head feebly, with a woful, despairing look upwards, but without shedding a tear. He was past all display of active emotion!

"Shouldn't you call me a murderer, Doctor ——?" said he, mournfully, on seeing me sitting beside him.

"Oh, assuredly not! Dismiss such thoughts, dear Captain, I beg! We are all in the hands of the Almighty, Captain. It is He who orders our ends," said I, gently grasping his hand, which lay passive on the counterpane. "Well, I suppose it is so! His will be done!" he exclaimed, looking reverently upwards, and closing his eyes. I rose, and walked to the table on which stood his medicine, to see how much of it he had taken. There lay an unopened letter from Miss ——! It had arrived by that morning's post, and bore the post-mark of the town at which they were making their halt by the way. Captain ——'s friends considered it better not to agitate him, by informing him of its arrival; for as Miss —— could not be apprised of his illness, it might be of a tenor to agitate and tantalize him. My heart ached to see it. I returned presently to my seat beside him.

"Doctor," he whispered, "will you be good enough to look for my white waistcoat—it is hanging in the dressing-room, and feel in the pocket for a little paper parcel?" I rose, did as he directed, and brought him what he asked for.

"Open it, and you'll see poor Ellen's wedding-ring and guard, which I purchased only a day or two ago. I wish to see them," said he, in a low but firm tone of voice. I removed the wool, and gazed at the glistening trinkets in silence, as did Captain C——.

"They will do to wed me to the woman," said he, extending towards me the little finger of his left hand. The tears nearly blinded me—I did as he wished, but could not get them past the first joint.

"Ah, Ellen has a little finger ——" said he. A tear fell from my eye upon his hand. He looked at me for an instant with apparent surprise. "Never mind, Doctor—that will do—I see they won't go farther. Now, let me die with them on; and when I am no more, let them be given to Ellen. I have wedded her in my heart—she is my wife!" He continued gazing fixedly at the finger on which the rings were.

"Of course, she cannot know of my illness?" looking at me. I shook my head.

"Good. 'Twill break her little heart, I'm afraid!" Those were the last words I ever heard him utter; for finding that my feelings were growing too excited, and that the Captain seemed disposed to sleep, I rose and left the room, followed by Lieutenant ——, who had been sitting at his friend's bedside all day long, and looked dreadfully pale and exhausted. "Doctor," said he, in a broken voice, as we stood together in the hall, "I have murdered my friend, and he thinks I have. He won't speak to me, nor look at me! He hasn't opened his lips to me once, though I've been at his bedside night and day. Yes," he continued, almost choking, "I've murdered him; and what is to become of my sister?" I made him no reply, for my heart was full.

In the morning I found Captain

C—— laid out; for he had died about midnight.

Few scenes are fraught with more solemnity and awe, none more chilling to the heart, than the chamber of the recent dead. It is like the cold porch of eternity! The sepulchral silence, the dim light, the fearful order and repose of all around—a sick-room, as it were, suddenly changed into a charnel-house—the central object in the gloomy picture, the bed—the yellow effigy of him that was, looking coldly out from the white unruffled sheets—the lips that must speak no more—the eyes that are shut for ever!

The features of Captain C—— were calm and composed; but to see that fine countenance surrounded with the close crimped cap, injuring its outline and proportions!—Here, reader, lay the victim of A SLIGHT COLD!

RICH AND POOR.

A REMARKABLE and affecting juxtaposition of the two poles, so to speak, of human condition—affluence and poverty—rank and degradation—came under my notice during the early part of the year 181—. The dispensations of Providence are fearful levellers of the factitious distinctions among men! Little boots it to our common foe, whether he pluck his prey from the downy satin-curtained couch, or the wretched pallet of a prison or a workhouse! The oppressive splendour of rank and riches, indeed!—what has it of solace or mitigation to him hidden to "turn his pale face to the wall"—to look his last on life, its toys and tinselries?

The Earl of ——'s old tormentor, the gout, had laid close siege to him during the early part of the winter of 181—, and inflicted on him agonies of unusual intensity and duration. It left him in a very low and poor state of health—his spirits utterly broken—and his temper soured and irritable, to an extent that was intolerable to those around him. The discussion of a political question, in the issue of which his interests were deeply involved, seduced him into an attendance at the House of Lords, long before he was in a fit state for removal, even from his bedchamber; and the consequences of such a shattered invalid's premature exposure to a bleak winter's wind may be easily anticipated. He was laid again on a bed of suffering; and having, through some sudden pique, dismissed his old family physician, his lordship was pleased to summon me to supply his place.

The Earl of — was celebrated for his enormous riches, and the more than Oriental scale of luxury and magnificence on which his establishment was conducted. The slanderous world further gave him credit for a disposition of the most exquisite selfishness, which, added to his capricious and choleric humour, made him a very unenviable companion, even in health. What, then, must such a man be in sickness? I trembled at the task that was before me!—It was a bitter December evening on which I paid him my first visit. Nearly the whole of the gloomy secluded street in which his mansion was situated, was covered with straw; and men were stationed about it to prevent noise in any shape. The ample knocker was muffled, and the bell unhung, lest the noise of either should startle the aristocratical invalid. The instant my carriage, with its muffled roll, drew up, the hall-door sprang open as if by magic; for the watchful porter had orders to anticipate all comers, on pain of instant dismissal. Thick matting was laid over the hall-floor—double carpeting covered the staircases and landings, from the top to the bottom of the house—and all the door-edges were lined with list! How could sickness or death presume to enter, in spite of such precautions?

A servant, in large list-slippers, asked me, in a whisper, my name; and, on learning it, said the Countess wished to have a few moments' interview with me before I was shewn up to his lordship. I was therefore led into a magnificent apartment, where her ladyship, with two grown-up daughters, and a young man in the Guards' uniform, sat sipping coffee—for they had but just left the dining-room. The Countess looked pale and dispirited. "Doctor —," said she, after a few words-of-course had been interchanged, "I'm afraid you'll have a trying task to manage his lordship! We are all worn out with attending on him, and yet, he says, we neglect him! Nothing can please or satisfy him!—What do you imagine was the reason of his dismissing Dr —? Because he persisted in attributing the present seizure to his imprudent visit to the House!"

"Well, your ladyship knows I can but attempt to do my duty." At that instant the door was opened, and a sleek servant, all pampered and powdered, in a sotto voce tone, informed the Countess that his lordship had been enquiring for me. "Oh, for God's sake, go—go immediately," said her ladyship, eagerly, "or we shall have no peace for a week to come!—I shall, perhaps, follow you in a few minutes!—But mind—please, not a breath about Dr —'s leaving!" I bowed, and left the room. I followed the servant up the noble staircase—vases and statues—with graceful lamps—at every landing—and was presently ushered into the "Blue-beard" chamber. Oh, the sumptuous—the splendid air of every thing within it! Flowered, festooned satin window draperies—flowered satin bed-curtains, gathered together at the top by a golden eagle—flowered satin counterpane! Beautiful Brussels muffled the tread of your feet, and delicately-carved chairs and couches solicited to repose!—The very chamber-lamps, glistening in soft radiance from a snowy-marble stand in the fiftier corners of the room, were tasteful and elegant in the extreme. In short, grandeur and elegance seemed to outvie one another, both in the materials and disposition of every thing around me. I never saw any thing like it before, nor have I since. I never in my life sat in such a yielding luxurious chair as the one I was beckoned to, beside the Earl. There was, in a word, every thing to cheat a man into a belief that he belonged to a higher "order" than that of "poor humanity."

But for the lord—the owner of all this—my patient. Ay, there he lay, embedded in down, amid snowy liven and figured satin—all that was visible of him being his little sallow wrinkled visage, worn with illness, age, and fretfulness, peering curiously at me from the depths of his pillow—and his left hand, lying outside the bedclothes, holding a white embroidered handkerchief, with which he occasionally wiped his clammy features.

"U—u—gh!—U—u—gh!" he groaned, or rather gasped, as a sudden twinge of pain twisted and corrugated his features almost out of all resemblance to humanity—till they looked more like those of a strangled ape, than the Right Honourable the Earl of ——. The paroxysm presently abated. "You've been—down stairs—more than—five minutes—I believe—Dr ——" he commenced in a petulant tone, pausing for breath between every two words—his features not yet recovered from their contortions. I bowed.

"I flatter myself—it was I—who sent—for you, Dr ——, and—not her ladyship,"—he continued. I bowed again, and was going to explain, when he resumed—

"Ah! I see! Heard—the whole story—of Dr ——'s dismissal—ugh—ugh—eh?—May I—beg the favour—of hearing—her ladyship's version—of the affair?"

"My lord, I heard nothing but the simple fact of Dr ——'s having ceased to attend your lordship"——

"Ah!—ceased to attend! Good!" he repeated, with a sneer.

"Will your lordship permit me to ask if you have much pain just now?" I enquired, anxious to terminate his splenetic display. I soon discovered that he was in the utmost peril; for there was every symptom of the gout's having been driven from its old quarter, the extremities, to the vital organs—the stomach and bowels. One of the most startling symptoms was the sensation he described as resembling that of a platter of ice laid upon the pit of his stomach; and he complained also of increasing nausea. Though not choosing to apprise him of the exact extent of his danger,

I strove so to shape my questions and comments that he might infer his being in dangerous circumstances. He either did not, however, or would not, comprehend me. I told him that the remedies I should recommend——

"Ah—by the way——" said he, turning abruptly towards me, "it mustn't be the execrable stuff that Dr —— half poisoned me with! Gad, sir—it had a most diabolical stench—garlic was a pine-apple to it—and here was I obliged to lie soaked in eau de Cologne, and half stifled with musk. He did it on purpose, he had a spite against me!" I begged to be shewn the medicines he complained of, and his valet brought me the half-emptied phial. I found my predecessor had been exhibiting assa-fatida and musk—and could no longer doubt the coincidence of his view of the case and mine.

"I'm afraid, my lord," said I, hesitatingly, "that I shall find myself compelled to continue the use of the medicines which Dr —— prescribed"——

"I'll be —— if you do, though—that's all——" replied the Earl, continuing to mutter indistinctly some insulting words about my "small acquaintance with the pharmacopœia." I took no notice of it.

"Would your lordship," said I, after a pause, "object to the use of camphor, or ammonia?"*

"I object to the use of every medicine but one, and that is, a taste of some potted boar's flesh, which my nephew, I understand, has this morning sent from abroad."

"My lord, it is utterly out of the question. Your lordship, it is my duty to inform you, is in extremely dangerous circumstances"——

"The d—! I am!" he exclaimed, with an incredulous smile. "Pho, pho! So Dr —— said. According to him, I ought to have resigned about a week ago! Agad—but—but—what symptom of danger is there now?" he enquired abruptly.

"Why, one—in fact, my lord, the worst is—the sensation of numbness

* His lordship, with whom, as possibly I should have earlier informed the reader, I had some little personal acquaintance before being called in professionally, had a tolerable knowledge of medicine; which will account for my mentioning what remedies I intended to exhibit. In fact he insisted on knowing.

at the pit of the stomach, which your lordship mentioned just now."

"Pho!—gone—gone—gone! A mere nervous sensation, I apprehend. I am freer from pain just now than I have been all along," his face changed a little. "Doctor—rather faint with talking—can I have a cordial? Pierre, get me some brandy!" he added, in a feeble voice. The valet looked at me—I nodded acquiescence, and he instantly brought the Earl a wine glassfull.

"Another—another—another—" gasped the Earl, his face suddenly bedewed with a cold perspiration. A strange expression flitted for an instant over the features; his eyelids drooped; there was a little twitching about the mouth—

"Pierre! Pierre! Pierre! call the Countess!" said I, hurriedly, loosing the Earl's shirt-neck, for I saw he was dying. Before the valet returned, however, while the muffled tramp of footsteps was heard on the stairs, approaching nearer—nearer—nearer—it was all over! the haughty Earl of — had gone where rank and riches availed him nothing—to be alone with God!

On arriving home that evening, my mind saddened with the scene I had left, I found my wife—Emily—sitting by the drawing-room fire, alone, and in tears. On enquiring the reason of it, she told me that a char-woman who had been that day engaged at our house, had been telling Jane—my wife's maid—who, of course, communicated it to her mistress, one of the most heart-rending tales of distress that she had ever listened to—that poverty and disease united could inflict on humanity. My sweet wife's voice, ever eloquent in the cause of benevolence, did not require much exertion to persuade me to resume my walking-trim, and go that very evening to the scene of wretchedness she described. The char-woman had gone half an hour ago, but left the name and address of the family she spoke of, and after learning them, I set off. The cold was so fearfully intense, that I was obliged to return and get a "comfortable" for my neck—and Emily took the opportunity to empty all the loose silver in her purse, into my hand, saying, "you know what to do with it, love!" Blessing her benevolent heart, I once more set out on my errand of mercy. With some difficulty I found out the neighbourhood, threading my doubtful way through a labyrinth of obscure back-streets, lanes, and alleys, till I came to "Peter's Place," where the objects of my visit resided. I began to be apprehensive for the safety of my person and property, when I discovered the sort of neighbourhood I had got into.

"Do you know where some people of the name of O'Hurdle live?" I enquired of the watchman, who was passing, bawling the hour.

"Yis, I knows two of that 'ere name hereabouts—which Hurdle is it, sir?" enquired the gruff guardian of the night.

"I really don't exactly know—the people I want are very, very poor."

"Oh! oh! oh! I'm thinking they're all much of a muchness for the matter of that, about here,"—he replied, setting down his lantern, and slapping his hands against his sides to keep himself warm.

"But the people I want are very ill—I'm a doctor."

"Oh, oh! you must be meaning 'em 'oose son was transported yesterday? His name was Tim O'Hurdle, sir—though some called him Jimmy—and I was the man that catch'd him, sir—I did! It was for a robbery in this here!"—

"Ay, ay—I dare say they are the people I want. Where is their house?" I enquired hastily, somewhat disturbed at the latter portion of his intelligence—a new and forbidding feature of the case.

"I'll shew 'ee the way, sir," said the watchman, walking before me, and holding his lantern close to the ground to light my path. He led me to the last house of the Place, and through a miserable dilapidated doorway; then up two pair of narrow, dirty, broken stairs, till we found ourselves at the top of the house. He knocked at the door with the end of his stick, and called out, "Holloa, missus! Hey! Within here! You're wanted here!" adding suddenly, in a lower tone, touching his hat, "It's a bitter night, sir—a trifle, sir, to keep one's self warm—drink your health, sir." I gave him a trifle, motioned him away, and took his place at the door.

"Thank your honour! Mind your watch and pockets, sir—that's all," he muttered, and left me. I felt very nervous, as the sound of his retreating footsteps died away down stairs. I had half a mind to follow him.

"Who's there?" enquired a female voice through the door, opened only an inch or two.

"It's I—a doctor. Is your name O'Hurdle? Is any one ill here? I'm come to see you: Betsy Jones, a char-woman, told me of you."

"You're right, sir," replied the same voice, sorrowfully. "Walk in, sir;" and the door was opened wide enough for me to enter.

Now, reader, who, while glancing over these sketches, are perhaps reposing in the lap of luxury, believe me when I tell you, that the scene which I shall attempt to set before you, as I encountered it, I feel to beggar all my powers of description; and that what you may conceive to be exaggerations, are infinitely short of the frightful realities of that evening. Had I not seen and known for myself, I should scarce have believed that such misery existed.

"Wait a moment, sir, an' I'll fetch you a light," said the woman, in a strong Irish accent; and I stood still outside the door till she returned with a rushlight, stuck in a blue bottle. I had time for no more than one glimpse at the haggard features and filthy ragged appearance of the bearer, with an infant at the breast, before a gust of wind, blowing through an unstoppered broken pane in the window, suddenly extinguished the candle, and we were left in a sort of darkness visible, the only object I could see being the faint glow of expiring embers on the hearth. "Would your honour be after standing still a while, or you'll be thredwing on the chilter?" said the woman; and, bending down, she endeavoured to re-light the candle by the embers. The poor creature tried in vain, however; for it seemed there was but an inch or two of candle left, and the heat of the embers melted it away, and the wick fell out.

"Oh, murther—there! What will we do?" exclaimed the woman, "that's the last bit of candle we've in the house, an' it's not a farthing I have to buy another!"

"Come—send and buy another," said I, giving her a shilling, though I was obliged to feel for her hand.

"Oh, thank your honour!" said she, "an' we'll soon be seeing one another. Here, Sal! Sal! Sally!—Here, ye cratur!"

"Well, and what d'ye want with me?" asked a sullen voice from another part of the room, while there was a rustling of straw.

"Fait, an' ye must get up wid ye, and go to buy a candle. Here's a shilling!"—

"Heigh—and isn't it a loaf o' bread ye should rather be after buying, mother?" growled the same voice.

"Perhaps the Doctor won't mind," stammered the mother; "he won't mind our getting a loaf too."

"Oh, no, no! For God's sake, go directly, and get what you like!" said I, touched by the woman's tone and manner.

"Ho, Sal! Get up—ye may buy some bread too!"—

"Brend! Brend! Brend!—Where's the shilling?" said the same voice, in quick and eager tones; and the ember-light enabled me barely to distinguish the dim outline of a figure rising from the straw on which it had been stretched, and which newly overturned me by stumbling against me, on its way towards where the mother stood. It was a grown-up girl, who, after receiving the shilling, promised to bring the candle lighted, lest their own fire should not be sufficient, and withdrew, slamming the door violently after her, and rattling down stairs with a rapidity which shewed the interest she felt in her errand.

"I'm sorry it's not a seat we have that's fit for you, sir," said the woman, approaching towards where I was standing; "but if I may make so bold as to take your honour's hand, I'll guide you to the only one we have—barring the floor—a box by the fire, and there ye'll sit perhaps till she comes with a light."

"Anywhere—anywhere, my good woman," said I; "but I hope your daughter will return soon, for I have not long to be here," and giving her my gloved hand, she led me to a deal-box, on which I sat down, and she on the floor beside me. I was beginning to ask her some questions, when the moaning of a little child interrupted me.

"Hush! hush!—ye little divel—hush!—ye'll be wakin' your poor daddy!—hush!—go to sleep wid ye!" said the woman, in an earnest undertone.

"Och—och—mammy!—mammy! an' isn't it so could?—I can't sleep, mammy," replied the tremulous voice of a very young child; and directing my eyes to the quarter from which the sound came, I fancied I saw a poor shivering half-naked little creature, cowering under the window.

"Hish!—lie still wid ye, ye infortunat' little divel—an' ye'll presently get something to eat.—We ha'n't none of us tasted a morsel sin' the morning, Doctor!" The child she spoke to ceased its moanings instantly; but I heard the sound of its little teeth chattering, and as of its hands rubbing and striking together. Well it might, poor wretch—for I protest the room was nearly as cold as the open air; for, besides the want of fire, the bleak wind blew in chilling gusts through the broken panes of the window.

"Why, how many of you are there in this place, my good woman?" said I.

"Och, murder! murder! murder! an' isn't there—barring Sal, that's gone for the candle, and Bobby, that's out begging, and Tim, that the ould divels at Newgate have sent away to Bottomless yesterday," she continued, bursting into tears;—"Och, an' won't that same be the death o' me, and the poor father o' the boy—an' it wa'n't sich a sentence he deserved—but hush! hush!" she continued, lowering her tones, "an' it's wakin' the father o' him, I'll be, that doesn't!"

"I understand your husband is ill?" said I.

"Faith, sir—as ill as the 'smaulicks' [asthmatics] can make him—the Lord pity him! But he's had a blessed hour's sleep, the poor fellow! though the little brat he has in his arms has been making a noise—a little divel that it is—it's the youngest, barring this one I'm suckling—an' it's not a fortnight it is sin' it first looked on its mother!" she continued, sobbing, and kissing her baby's hand; "och, och! that the little cratur had niver been born!"

I heard footsteps slowly approaching the room; and presently a few rays of light flickered through the chinks and fissures of the door, which was in a moment or two pushed open, and "Sal" made her appearance, shading the lighted candle in her hand, and holding a quarter loaf under her arm. She had brought but a wretched rushlight, which she hastily stuck into the neck of the bottle, and placed it on a shelf over the fireplace; and then—what a scene was visible!

The room was a garret, and the sloping ceiling—if such it might be called—made it next to impossible to move anywhere in an upright position. The mockery of a window had not one entire pane of glass in it; but some of the holes were stopped with straw, rags, and brown paper, while one or two were not stopped at all! There was not an article of furniture in the place; no, not a bed, chair, or table of any kind; the last remains of it had been seized for arrears of rent—eighteenpence a-week—by the horrid harpy, their landlady, who lived on the ground-floor! The floor was littered with dirty straw, such as swine might scorn—but which formed the only couch of this devoted family! The rushlight eclipsed the dying glow of the few embers, so that there was not even the appearance of a fire! And this in a garret facing the north—on one of the bitterest and bleakest nights I ever knew! My heart sunk within me at witnessing such frightful misery and destitution, and contrasted it, for an instant, with the aristocratical splendour, the exquisite luxuries, of my last patient! Lazarus and Dives!—The woman with whom I had been conversing, was a mere bundle of filthy rags—a squalid, shivering, starved creature, holding to her breast a half-naked infant,—her matted hair hanging long and loosely down her back, and over her shoulders; her daughter "Sal" was in like plight—a sullen, ill-favoured slut of about eighteen, who seemed ashamed of being seen, and hung her head like a guilty one. She had resumed her former station on some straw—her bed!—in the extreme corner of the room, where she was squatting, with a little creature covering close beside her, both munching ravenously the bread which had been purchased. The miserable father of the family was seated on the floor, with his back propped against the opposite side of the fireplace to that which I occupied, and held a child clasped loosely in his arms, though he had plainly fallen asleep. O what a wretched object! a foul, shapeless, brown paper cap on his head, and a ragged fustian jacket on his back, which a beggar might have spurned with loathing!

The sum of what the woman communicated to me was, that her husband, a bricklayer by trade, had been long unable to work, on account of his asthma; and that their only means of subsistence were a paltry pittance from the parish, her own scanty earnings as a washer-woman, which had been interrupted by her recent confinement, and charities collected by "Sal," and "Bobby" who was then out begging." Their oldest son, Tim, a lad of sixteen, had been transported for seven years, the day before, for a robbery, of which his mother vehemently declared him innocent; and this last circumstance had, more than all the rest, completely broken the hearts of both his father and mother, who had absolutely starved themselves and their children, in order to hoard up enough to see an Old-Bailey counsel to plead for their son! The husband had been for some time, I found, an out-patient of one of the infirmaries; "and this poor little darlint," said she, sobbing bitterly, and hugging her infant closer to her, "has got the measles, I'm fearin'; and little Bobby, too, is catching them.—Och, murder—murder! Oh, Christ, pity us, poor sinners that we are!—Oh! what will we do;—what will we do?" and she almost choked herself with stifling her sobs, for fear of waking her husband.

"And what is the matter with the child that your husband is holding in his arms?" I enquired, pointing to it, as it sat in its father's arms, munching a little crust of bread, and ever and anon patting its father's face, exclaiming, "Da-a-a!—Ab-bab-ba!—Ab-bab-ba!"

"Och! what ails the cratur? Nothing, but that it's half-starved and naked—an' isn't that enough—an' isn't it kilt? I wish we all were—every mother's son of us!" groaned the miserable woman, sobbing as if her heart would break. At that moment a lamentable noise was heard on the stairs, as of a lad crying, accompanied by the pattering of naked feet. "Och! murder!" exclaimed the woman, with an agitated air.—"What's ailing with Bobby? Is it crying he is?" and starting to the door, she threw it open time enough to admit a ragged shivering urchin, about ten years old, without shoes or stockings, and having no cap, and rage pinned about him, which he was obliged to hold up with his right hand, while the other covered his left cheek. The little wretch, after a moment's pause, occasioned by seeing a strange gentleman in the room, proceeded to put three or four coppers into his mother's lap, telling her, with painful gestures, that a gentleman, whom he had followed a few steps in the street, importuning for charity, had turned round unexpectedly, and struck him a severe blow with a cane, over his face and shoulders.

"Let me look at your face, my poor little fellow," said I, drawing him to me; and on removing his hand, I saw a long weal all down the left cheek. I wish I could forget the look of tearless agony with which his mother put her arms round his neck, and drawing him to her breast, exclaimed, faintly,—"Bobby! My Bobby!" After a few moments she released the boy, pointing to the spot where his sisters sat still munching their bread. The instant he saw what they were doing, he sprung towards them, and plucked a large fragment from the loaf, fastening on it like a young wolf!

"Why, they'll finish the loaf before you've tasted it, my good woman," said I.

"Och, the poor things!—Let them—let them!" she replied, wiping away a tear. "I can do without it longer than they—the cratures!"

"Well, my poor woman," said I, "I have not much time to spare, as it is growing late. I came here to see what I could do for you as a doctor. How many of you are ill?"

"Fait, an' isn't it ailing—we all of us are! Ah, your honour!—A 'Firmiry, without physic or vic-tuals!"

"Well, we must see what can be done for you. What is the matter with your husband, there?" said I, turning towards him. He was still asleep, in spite of the tickling and stroking of his child's hands, who, at the moment I looked, was trying to push the corner of its crust into its father's mouth, chuckling and crowing the while, as is the wont of children who find a passive subject for their drolleries.

"Och, och! the little villain—the thing, said she, impatiently, seeing the child's employment. "Isn't it waking him, it'll be?—at—at!"

"Let me see him nearer," said I; "I must wake him, and ask him a few questions."

I moved from my seat towards him. His head hung down drowsily. His wife took down the candle from the shelf, and held it a little above her husband's head, while I came in front of him, and stooped on one knee to interrogate him.

"Phelim! Love! Honey! Darling!—Wake wid ye! And isn't it the doctor that comes to see ye?" said she, nudging him with her knee. He did not stir, however. The child, regardless of us, was still playing with his passive features. A glimpse of the awful truth flashed across my mind.

"Let me have the candle a moment, my good woman," said I, rather seriously.

The man was dead.

He must have expired nearly an hour ago, for his face and hands were quite cold; but the position in which he sat, together with the scantiness of the light, concealed the event. It was fearful to see the ghastly pallor of the features, the fixed pupils, the glassy glare downwards, the fallen jaw!—Was it not a subject for a painter? The living child in the arms of its dead father, unconsciously sporting with a corpse!

To attempt a description of what ensued, would be idle and even ridiculous. It is hardly possible even to imagine it! In one word, the neighbours who lived on the floor beneath were called in, and did their utmost to console the wretched widow and quiet the children. They laid out the corpse decently; and I left them all the silver I had about me to enable them to purchase a few of the more pressing necessities. I succeeded afterwards in gaining two of the children admittance into a charity school; and, through my wife's interference, the poor widow received the efficient assistance of an unobtrusive, but most incomparable institution, "The Stranger's Friend Society." I was more than once present when those angels of mercy—those "true Samaritans"—the "Visitors" of the Society, as they are called—were engaged on this noble errand, and wished that their numbers were countless, and their means inexhaustible!

GRAVE DOINGS.

My gentle reader—start not at learning that I have been, in my time, a RESURRECTIONIST. Let not this appalling word, this humiliating confession, conjure up in your fancy a throng of vampire-like images and associations, or earn your "Physician's" dismissal from your hearts and hearths. It is your own groundless fears, my fair trembler!—your own superstitious prejudices that have driven me, and will drive many others of my brethren, to such dreadful doings as those hereafter detailed. Come, come—let us have one word of reason between us on the abstract question—and then for my tale. You expect us to cure you of disease, and yet deny us the only means of learning how? You would have us bring you the ore of skill and experience, yet forbid us to break the soil, or sink a shaft! Is this fair, fair reader? Is this reasonable?

What I am now going to describe was admitted a patient at the hospital I attended; her case baffled all our skill, and her symptoms even defied our nosology. Now it seemed an enlargement of the heart—now an ossification—now this, that, and the other; and at last it was plain we knew nothing at all about the matter—no, not even whether her disorder was organic or functional, primary or symptomatic—or whether it was really the heart that was at fault. She received no benefit at all under the fluctuating schemes of treatment we pursued, and at length fell into dying circumstances. As soon as her friends were apprized of her situation, and had an inkling of our intention to open the body, they insisted on removing her immediately from the hospital, that she might “die at home.” In vain did Sir —— and his dressers expostulate vehemently with them, and represent in exaggerated terms the imminent peril attending such a step. Her two brothers avowed their apprehension of our designs, and were inflexible in exercising their right of removing their sister. I used all my rhetoric on the occasion—but in vain, and at last said to the young men, “Well, if you are afraid only of our dissecting her, we can get hold of her, if we are so disposed, as easily if she died with you, as with us.”

“Well—we’ll try that, measter,” replied the elder, while his Herculean fist oscillated somewhat significantly before my eyes. The poor girl was removed accordingly to her father’s house, which was at a certain village about five miles from London, and survived her arrival scarcely ten minutes! We soon contrived to receive intelligence of the event; and as I and Sir ——’s two dressers had taken great interest in the case throughout, and felt intense curiosity about the real nature of the disease, we met together and entered into a solemn compact, that come what might, we would have her body out of the ground. A trusty spy informed us of the time and exact place of the girl’s burial; and on expressing to Sir —— our determination about the matter, he patted me on the back, saying, “Ah, my fine fellow—if you have spirit enough—dangerous,” &c. &c. Was it not skillfully said? The baronet further told us he felt himself so curious about the matter, that if fifty pounds would be of use to us, they were at our service. It needed not this, nor a glance at the clat with which the successful issue of the affair would be attended among our fellow-students, to spur our resolves.

The notable scheme was finally adjusted at my rooms in the Borough. M—— and E——, Sir ——’s dressers, and myself, with an experienced “grab,” that is to say, a professional resurrectionist—were to set off from the Borough about nine o’clock the next evening—which would be the third day after the burial—in a glass coach, provided with all “appliances and means to boot.” During the day, however, our friend the grab suffered ~~by~~ severely from an over-night’s excess, as to disappoint us of his invaluable assistance. This unexpected contretemps nearly put an end to our project; for the few other grabs we knew, were absent on professional tours! Luckily, however, I bethought me of a poor Irish porter—a sort of “ne’er-do-weel” hanger-on at the hospital, whom I had several times hired to go on errands. This man I sent for to my rooms, and in the presence of my two coadjutors, persuaded, threatened, and bothered into acquiescence, promising him half a guinea for his evening’s work—and as much whisky as he could drink prudently. As Mr Tip—that was the name he went by—had some personal acquaintance with the sick grab, he succeeded in borrowing his chief tools; with which, in a sack large enough to contain our expected prize, he repaired to my rooms about nine o’clock, while the coach was standing at the door. Our Jehu had received a quiet douceur in addition to the hire of himself and coach. As soon as we had exhibited sundry doses of Irish cordial to our friend Tip, under the effects of which he became quite “bouncible,” and rauted about the feat he was to take a prominent part in—and equipped ourselves in our worst clothes, and white top-coats, we entered the vehicle—four in number—and drove off. The weather had been exceedingly capricious all the evening—moonlight, rain, thunder and lightning, fitfully alternating. The only thing we were anxious about, was the darkness, to shield us from all possible observation. I must own that in analyzing the feelings that prompted me to undertake and go through with this affair, the mere love of adventure operated as powerfully as the wish to benefit the cause of anatomical science. A midnight expedition to the tombs!—It took our fancy amazingly; and then—Sir——'s cunning hint about the "danger"—and our "spirit!"

The garrulous Tip supplied us with amusement all the way down—rattle, rattle, rattle, incessantly; but as soon as we had arrived at that part of the road where we were to stop, and caught sight of——church, with its hoary steeple grey-glistening in the fading moonlight, as though it was standing sentinel over the graves around it, one of which we were going so rudely to violate, Tip's spirits began to falter a little. He said little—and that at intervals. To be very candid with the reader, none of us felt over much at our ease. Our expedition began to wear a somewhat halfbrained aspect, and to be enlivened with formidable contingencies which we had not taken sufficiently into our calculations. What, for instance, if the two stout fellows, the brothers, should be out watching their sister's grave? They were not likely to stand on much ceremony with us. And then the manual difficulties! F—— was the only one of us that had ever assisted at the exhumation of a body—and the rest of us were likely to prove but bungling workmen. However, we had gone too far to think of retreating. We none of us spoke our suspicions, but the silence that reigned within the coach was significant. In contemplation, however, of some such contingency, we had put a bottle of brandy in the coach-pocket; and before we drew up, we had all four of us drunk pretty deeply of it. At length, the coach turned down a by-lane to the left, which led directly to the churchyard wall; and after moving a few steps down it, in order to shelter our vehicle from the observation of highway passengers, the coach stopped, and the driver opened the door.

"Come, Tip," said I, "out with you!"

"Get out, did ye say, sir? To be sure I will—Out! to be sure I will." But there was small shew of alacrity in his movements as he descended the steps; for while I was speaking, I was interrupted by the solemn clangour of the church clock announcing the hour of midnight. The sounds seemed to warn us against what we were going to do.

"'Tis a could night, yer honours," said Tip, in an under tone, as we successively alighted, and stood together, looking up and down the dark lane, to see if any thing was stirring but ourselves. "'Tis a could night—and—and—and"—he stammered.

"Why, you cowardly old scoundrel," grumbled M——, "are you frightened already? What's the matter, eh? Hoist up the bag on your shoulders directly, and lead the way down the lane."

"Och, but yer honours—och! by the mother that bore me, but 'tis a murderously cruel thing, I'm thinking, to wake the poor cratur from her last sleep." He said this so querulously, that I began to entertain serious apprehensions, after all, of his defection; so I insisted on his taking a little more brandy, by way of bringing him up to par. It was of no use, however. His reluctance increased every moment—and it even dispirited us. I verily believe the turning of a straw would have decided us all on jumping into the coach again, and returning home without accomplishing our errand. Too many of the students, however, were apprized of our expedition, for us to think of terminating it so ridiculously! As it were by mutual consent, we stood and paused a few moments, about half way down the lane. M—— whistled with infinite success and distinctness; E—— remarked to me that he "always thought that a churchyard at midnight was the gloomiest object imaginable;" and I talked about business—"soon be over"—"shallow grave," &c. &c. "Confound it—what if those two brothers of hers should be there?" said M—— abruptly, making a dead stop, and folding his arms on his breast.

"Powerful fellows, both of them!" muttered E——. We resumed our march—when Tip, our advanced guard—a title he earned by anticipating our steps about three inches—suddenly stood still, let down the bag from his shoulders—elevated both hands in a listening attitude—and exclaimed “Whisht!—whisht!—By my soul—what was that?” We all paused in silence, looking palely at one another—but could hear nothing except the drowsy flutter of a bat wheeling away from us a little over-head.

“Fuit—an’ waa’n’t it somebody spaking on the far side o’ the hedge, I heard?” whispered Tip.

“Pho—stuff, you idiot!” I exclaimed, losing my temper. “Come, M—— and E——, it’s high time we had done with all this cowardly nonsense, and if we mean really to do any things we must make haste. ‘Tis past twelve—day breaks about four—and it is coming on wet, you see.” Several large drops of rain, pattering heavily among the leaves and branches, corroborated my words, by announcing a coming shower, and the air was sultry enough to warrant the expectation of a thunder-storm. We therefore buttoned up our great-coats to the chin, and hurried on to the churchyard wall, which ran across the bottom of the lane. Thus wall we had to clump over to get into the churchyard, and it was not a very high one. Here Tip annoyed us again. I told him to lay down his bag, mount the wall, and look over into the yard, to see whether all was clear before us; and, as far as the light would enable him, to look about for a new-made grave. Very reluctantly he complied, and contrived to scramble to the top of the wall. He had hardly time, however, to peer over into the churchyard, when a fluttering streak of lightning flashed over us, followed in a second or two by a loud burst of thunder! Tip fell in an instant to the ground, like a cock-chaffer shaken from an elm-tree, and lay crossing himself, and muttering Pater-nosters. We could scarce help laughing at the manner in which he tumbled down, simultaneously with the flash of lightning. “Now, look ye, gentlemen,” said he, still squatted on the ground, “do ye mane to give the poor cratur Christian burial, when ye’ve done wid her? An’ will ye put her back again?”

found her? ‘Case, if you wont, blood an’ oons!”

“Now, look ye, Tip,” said I, sternly, taking out one of a brace of empty pistols I had put into my great-coat pocket, and presenting it to his head, “we have hired you on this business, for the want of a better, you wretched fellow! and if you give us any more of this nonsense, by —— I’ll send a bullet through your brain! Do you hear me, Tip?”

“Och, aisy, aisy wid ye! don’t murther me! Bad luck to me, that I ever cam wid ye! Och, and if I live to die, wont I see and bury my ould body out o’ the rache of all the docthers in the world? If I don’t, devil burn me!” We all laughed aloud at Mr Tip’s truly Hibernian expostulation.

“Come, sir, mount! over with you!” said we, helping to push him upwards. “Now, drop this bag on the other side,” we continued, giving him the sack that contained our implements. We all three of us then followed, and alighted safely in the churchyard. It poured with rain; and to enhance the dreariness and horrors of the time and place, flashes of lightning followed in quick succession, shedding a transient awful glare over the scene, revealing the white tombstones, the ivy-grown venerable church, and our own figures, a shivering group, come on an unhallowed errand! I perfectly well recollect the lively feelings of apprehension—the “compunctions visitings of remorse”—which the circumstances called forth in my own breast, and which I had no doubt were shared by my companions.

As no time, however, was to be lost, I left the group for an instant under the wall, to search out the grave. The accurate instructions I had received enabled me to pitch on the spot with little difficulty; and I returned to my companions, who immediately followed me to the scene of operations. We had no umbrellas, and our great-coats were saturated with wet; but the brandy we had recently taken did us good service, by exhilarating our spirits, and especially those of Tip. He untied the sack in a twinkling, and shook out the hoes and spades, &c.; and taking one of the latter himself, he commenced digging with such energy, that we had hardly prepared ourselves for work, before he had cleared away nearly the whole of the mound. The rain soon abated, and the lightning ceased for a considerable interval, though thunder was heard occasionally rumbling sullenly in the distance, as if expressing anger at our unholy doings—at least I felt it so. The pitchy darkness continued, so that we could scarce see one another's figures. We worked on in silence, as fast as our spades could be got into the ground; taking it in turns, two by two, as the grave would not admit of more. On—on—on we worked, till we had hollowed out about three feet of earth. Tip then hastily joined a long iron screw, or borer, which he thrust into the ground, for the purpose of ascertaining the depth at which the coffin yet lay from us. To our vexation, we found a distance of three feet had yet to be got through. "Sure, and by the soul of St Patrick, but we'll not be down by the morning!" said Tip, as he threw down the instrument, and resumed his spade. We were all discouraged! Oh, how greatly I wished myself at home, in my snug little bed in the Borough! How I cursed the Quixotism that had led me into such an undertaking! I had no time, however, for reflection, as it was my turn to relieve one of the diggers; so into the grave I jumped, and worked away as lustily as before. While I was thus engaged, a sudden noise, close to our ears, startled me so, that I protest I thought I should drop down dead in the grave I was robbing. I and my fellow-digger dropped our spades, and all four stood still for a second or two, in an ecstasy of fearful apprehension. We could not see more than a few inches around us, but heard the grass trodden by approaching feet! They proved to be those of an ass, that was turned at night into the churchyard, and had gone on eating his way towards us; and, while we were standing in mute expectation of what was to come next, opened on us with an astounding hee-haw! hee-haw! hee-haw! Even after we had discovered the ludicrous nature of the interruption, we were too agitated to laugh! The brute was actually close upon us, and had given tongue from under poor Tip's elbow, having approached him from behind as he stood leaning on his spade. Tip started suddenly backward against the animal's head, and fell down. Away sprung the jack-ass, as much confounded as Tip, kicking and scampering like a mad creature among the tombstones, and hee-hawing incessantly, as if a hundred devils had got into it for the purpose of discomfiting us. I felt so much fury, and fear, lest the noise should lead to our discovery, that I could have killed the brute, if it had been within my reach, while Tip stammered in an affrighted whisper—"Och, the baste! Och, the baste! The big black divel of a baste! The murderous—murthering!"—and a great many epithets of the same sort. We gradually recovered from the agitation which this provoking interruption had occasioned; and Tip, under the promise of two bottles of whisky as soon as we arrived safe at home with our prize, renewed his exertions, and dug with such energy, that we soon cleared away the remainder of the superincumbent earth, and stood upon the bare lid of the coffin. The grappers, with ropes attached to them, were then fixed in the sides and extremities, and we were in the act of raising the coffin, when the sound of a human voice, accompanied with foot-steps, fell on our startled ears. We heard both distinctly, and crouched down close over the brink of the grave, awaiting in breathless suspense a corroboration of our fears. After a pause of five or six minutes, however, finding that the sounds were not renewed, we began to breathe freer, persuaded that our ears must have deceived us. Once more we resumed our work, succeeded in hoisting up the coffin—not without a slip, however, which nearly precipitated it down again to the bottom, with all four of us upon it—and depositing it on the grave-side. Before proceeding to use our screws, or wrenches, we once more looked and listened, and listened and looked; but neither seeing nor hearing any thing, we set to work, and prised off the lid in a twinkling, and a transient glimpse of moonlight disclosed to us the shrowded inmate—all white and damp. I removed the face-cloth, and unspinned the cap, while M— loosened the sleeves from the wrists. Thus were we engaged, when E—, who had hold of the feet, ready to lift them out, suddenly let them go—gasped—"Oh, my God! there they are!" and placed his hand on my arm. He shook like an aspen leaf. I looked towards the quarter, where his eyes were directed, and, sure enough, saw the figure of a man—if not two—moving stealthily towards us. "Well, we're discovered, that's clear," I whispered as calmly as I could. "We shall be murdered!" groaned E—. "Lend me one of the pistols you have with you," said M—, resolutely. "By —, I'll have a shot for my life, however!" As for poor Tip, who had heard every syllable of this startling colloquy, and himself seen the approaching figures, he looked at me in silence, the image of blank horror! I could have laughed even then, to see his staring black eyes—his little cocked ruby-tinted nose—his chattering teeth. "Hush—hush!" said I, cocking my pistol, while M— did the same: for none but myself knew they were unloaded. To add to our consternation, the malignant moor withdrew the small scintling of light she had been doling out to us, and sunk beneath a vast cloud, "black as Erebus," but not before we had caught a glimpse of two more figures moving towards us in an opposite direction. "Surrounded!" two of us muttered in the same breath. We all rose to our feet, and stood together, not knowing what to do—unable in the darkness to see one another distinctly. Presently we heard a voice say, "Where are they? where? Sure I saw them! Oh, there they are! Halloo—halloo!"

That was enough—the signal for our flight. Without an instant's pause, or uttering another syllable, off we sprung like small-shot from a gun's mouth, all of us in different directions, we knew not whither. I heard the report of a gun—mercy on me! and pelted away, scarce knowing what I was about, dodging among the graves,—now coming full-butt against a plaguy tombstone, then stumbling on the slippery grass—while some one followed close at my heels panting and puffing, but whether friend or foe, I knew not. At length I stumbled against a large tombstone; and finding it open at the two ends, crept under it, resolved there to abide the issue. At the moment of my evincing myself, the sound of the person's footsteps who had followed me suddenly ceased. I heard a splashing sound, then a kicking and scrambling, a faint stifled cry of, "Ugh—oh—ugh!" and all was still. Doubtless it must be one of my companions, who had been wounded. What could I do, however? I did not know in what direction he lay—the night was pitch dark—and if I crept from my hiding-place, for all I knew, I might be shot myself. I shall never forget that hour—no, never! There was I, squatting like a toad on the wet grass and weeds, not daring to do more than breathe! Here was a predicament! I could not conjecture how the affair would terminate. Was I to lie where I was till daylight? What was become of my companions?—While I was turning these thoughts in my mind, and wondering that all was so quiet, my ear caught the sound of the splashing of water, apparently at but a yard or two's distance, mingled with the sounds of a half-smothered human voice—"Ugh! ugh! Och, murther! Murther' murther!"—another splash—"and isn't it drowned and kilt I am!"—

"Whew! Tip in trouble," thought I, not daring to speak. Yes—it was poor Tip, I afterwards found—who had followed at my heels, scampering after me as fast as fright could drive him, till his career was unexpectedly ended by his tumbling—souse—head over heels, into a newly-opened grave in his path, with more than a foot of water in it. There the poor fellow remained, after recovering from the first shock of his fall, not daring to utter a word for some time, lest he should be discovered—straddling over the water with his toes and elbows stuck into the loose soil on each side, to support him. This was his interesting position, as he subsequently informed me, at the time of uttering the sounds which first attracted my attention. Though not aware of his situation at the time, I was almost choked with laughter as he went on with his colloquy, somewhat in this strain:—

"Och, Tip, ye ould divel! Don't it sarve ye right, ye fool? Ye villainous ould coffin-robber! Won't ye burn for this hereafter, ye sinner?"

Ualoo! When ye are dead yourself, may ye be treated like that poor cratur—and yourself alive to see it! Och, hubbahoo! hubbahoo! Isn't it sure that I'll be drowned, an' then it's kilt I'll be!"—a loud splash, and a pause for a few moments, as if he was re-adjusting his footing—"Och, an' I'm catching my dith of could! Fait, an' it's a divel a drop o' the two bottles o' whisky I'll ever see—Och, och, och!"—another splash—"Och, an' isn't this uncomfortable! Och, an' if ever I come out of this—sha'n't I be dead before I do?"

"Tip—Tip—Tip!" I whispered, in a low tone. There was a dead silence. "Tip, Tip, where are you? What's the matter, eh?"—No answer; but he muttered in a low tone to himself—"Where am I, by my soul! Isn't it dead, and kilt, and drowned, and murdered I am—that's all!"

"Tip—Tip—Tip!" I repeated, a little louder.

"Tip, indeed! Fait, ye may call, bad luck to ye—whoever ye are—but its divel a word 'll I be after speaking to ye."

"Tip, you simpleton! It's I—Mr —!"

In an instant there was a sound of jumping and splashing, as if surprise had made him slip from his standing again, and he called out, "Whoo! Whoo! an' is't you, sweet Mr —? What is the matter wid ye? Are ye kilt? Where are they all? Have they taken ye away, every mother's son of you?" he asked eagerly, in a breath.

"Why, what are you doing, Tip? Where are you?"

"Fait, an' it's being washed I am, in the feet, and in the queereast tub your honour ever saw!"—A noise of scuffling not many yards off silenced us both in an instant. Presently I distinguished the voice of E—, calling out—"Help, M—!" my name—"Where are you?" The noise increased, and seemed nearer than before. I crept from my lurking-place, and aided at Tip's resurrection, and both of us hurried towards the spot where the sound came from. By the faint moonlight, I could just see the outlines of two figures violently struggling and grappling together. Before I could come up to them, both fell down locked in each other's arms, rolling over each other, grasping one another's collars, gasping and panting as if in mortal struggle. The moon suddenly emerged, and who do you think, reader, was E—'s antagonist? Why, the person whose appearance had discomfited and affrighted us all—our COACHMAN.—That worthy individual, alarmed at our protracted stay, had, contrary to our injunctions, left his coach to come and search after us. He it was whom we had seen stealing towards us; his steps—his voice had alarmed us, for he could not see us distinctly enough to discover whether we were his fare or not. He was on the point of whispering my name, when we should all have understood one another—when lo, we all started off in the manner which has been described; and he himself, not knowing that he was the reason of it, had taken to his heels, and fled for his life! He supposed we had fallen into a sort of ambushade. He happened to hide himself behind the tombstone next but one to that which sheltered E—. Finding all quiet, he and E—, as if by natural consent, were groping from their hiding-places, when they unexpectedly fell foul of one another—each too affrighted to speak—and hence the scuffle.

After this satisfactory denouement, we all repaired to the grave's mouth, and found the corpse and coffin precisely as we had left them. We were not many moments in taking out the body, stripping it, and thrusting it into the sack we had brought. We then tied the top of the sack, carefully deposited the shroud, &c., in the coffin, re-screwed down the lid—fearful—impious mockery! and consigned it once more to its resting-place—Tip scattering a handful of earth on the lid, and exclaiming reverently,—"An' may the Lord forgive us for what we have done to ye!" The coachman and I then took the body between us to the coach, leaving M—, and E—, and Tip, to fill up the grave.

Our troubles were not yet ended, however. Truly it seemed as though Providence was throwing every obstacle in our way. Nothing went right! On reaching the spot where we had left the coach, behold it lay several yards further in the lane, tilted into the ditch—for the horses, being hungry, and left to themselves, in their anxiety to graze on the verdant bank of the hedge, had contrived to overturn the vehicle in the ditch—and one of the horses was kicking vigorously when we came up—his whole body off the ground, and resting on that of his companion. We had considerable difficulty in righting the coach, as the horses were inclined to be obstreperous. We succeeded, however—deposited our unholy spoils within, turned the horses' heads towards the high-road, and then, after enjoining Jehu to keep his place on the box, I went to see how my companions were getting on. They had nearly completed their task, and told me that "shovelling in, was surprisingly easier than shovelling out!" We took great pains to leave every thing as neat, and as nearly resembling what we found it, as possible, in order that our visit might not be suspected. We then carried each our own tools, and hurried as fast as possible to our coach, for the dim twilight had already stolen a march upon us, devoutly thankful that, after so many interruptions, we had succeeded in effecting our object.

It was broad daylight before we reached town—and a wretched coach-company we looked—all wearied and dirty—Tip especially, who snored in the corner as comfortably as if he had been warm in his bed. I heartily resolved, with him, on leaving the coach, that it should be "the driver's own dear self only that should timpl me out agin body-snatching!"*

ON THE FINANCIAL MEASURES OF A REFORMED PARLIAMENT.

No. 7.

THE WHIG BUDGET.

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum," is the charitable maxim of private life; and it admits of application to the political projects of legislative, as well as the characters of individual life. The Whig Budget is now extinct: The good sense of the nation has revolted against its absurdity; but important instruction may be drawn from its character, as to the future measures of finance to which we are to be subjected by a reforming government.

That the Whig Budget is the most complete failure which has occurred in the memory of any man living, is now admitted, even by the warmest partisans of Ministers. Between concessions to avoid, and retractions consequent on defeat, hardly a vestige of it remains. With the exception of the little fragment of the steam-boat tax, not one of the proposed new taxes is preserved; and how Government are to meet the public expenses with the duties they have abandoned, without any to supply their place, is a problem which it remains for them to solve.

That the Cabinet contains several able men is quite certain. No one can have heard Lord Brougham's, Lord Grey's, or Mr Charles Grant's speeches, without being convinced of that fact. How then has it happened, that from such a source, so miserable a project has proceeded; one which wars alike against philosophical principle, national integrity, and important interests? The answer is to be found in the known difference between men of speculation and men of action, and in the homage which those who rest on the support of the populace are compelled to pay to their wishes.

The taxes proposed to be taken off are those—

On Sea-borne Coals.
On Candles.
On Tobacco.
On Calico Prints.

Those to be imposed were on—

Transfers of Funded Property.
Transfers of Landed Property.
On Canadian Timber.
On Steam-Boats.
On Raw Cotton.
On Cape Wine.

The reduction of the duty on sea-borne coals was a just and judicious measure. Being a local tax, which pressed with severity on a necessary of life in the metropolis, from which a great part of the country was exempted, its removal was expedient.

The reduction of the duty on candles, though not perhaps so important a boon as the removal of the tax on soap, or some other articles of primary necessity, may also be considered as unexceptionable.

With these exceptions, the Budget was a tissue of philosophical and political error.

What could be more absurd than the abolition of the duty on tobacco? Can any object be a fairer subject of taxation than one which is neither a necessary nor a convenience of life, but which, nevertheless, from its general use, yielded so large a revenue as £200,000 a-year? What could have induced any rational man to have contemplated a reduction of this duty, it is difficult to imagine. It is, literally speaking, a tax on a disgusting luxury, which degrades the higher, and brutalizes the lower orders, which has been adopted by fops from the imitation of foreign fashion, and by operatives from the example of foreign grossness. It may safely be affirmed, that the habit of smoking permanently injures the manners of the lower orders, and can never become general without lowering the national character; and there is a reason for this, of universal application—Women nowhere smoke, and the practice is everywhere revolting to their feelings. The prevalence of this custom, therefore, is a continual indulgence of selfish gratification on the part of man, to the exclusion of the comfort of the other sex: In other words, a continual approach to the selfishness and brutality of savage life.

Something was said about the demoralizing effect of the smuggling of tobacco on the west coast of Ireland, as the real motive for the removal of this duty. This reason is an exact counterpart of the grounds assigned for the fatal reduction of the duty on spirits, so strongly pressed on the late administration by the Edinburgh Review. The answer to both is, that the evil sought to be reduced is local and partial. The mischief done by removing it is general, and of incomparably greater extent. For thousands demoralized by Highland smuggling, tens of thousands are ruined by cheap whisky. For every man whose habits are injured by Irish tobacco smuggling, twenty would be brutified by the more general use of that noxious weed.

Besides this, it is evidently impossible to impose a tax on objects of consumption which will not prove burdensome to some class, and afford a bounty for smuggling in some quarter. The evils of contraband trade, how great soever, are inseparable from a system of indirect taxation: They are the price which the nation pays for the immense advantages of raising a revenue, without its weight being perceived by those who pay it, or being imposed on any but articles of voluntary consumption. This being evident, the repeal of the duty on tobacco, if accompanied by an increase of duties in some other quarter, was not a diminution of the evils of smuggling, but only a transference of them from one quarter of the empire to another.

The reduction of the duty on calico prints was equally unfounded in principle and expedience. It was not felt as burdensome—it was not the subject of any vehement complaint. Ingenuity and machinery had more than compensated the burden; and in spite of it, the British manufactures of that description had a most extensive and unprecedented sale. To sacrifice £500,000 a-year, by reducing that branch of taxation, was impolitic, both with reference to domestic consumption and foreign export. To domestic consumption, because it fell on a branch of industry which ministered to luxury or comfort, not necessity;—to foreign export, because it was directed against a manufacture in which, more perhaps than any other, the division of labour, and application of machinery, were capable of effecting an indefinite reduction of price. The continual and astonishing reduction in the price of printed cottons since the peace, is the clearest proof of the capability of machinery to reduce the cost of its production. An article of this description, which in 1814 cost fifty shillings, can now be produced in Glasgow for six; being a reduction in the price of production, to less than an eighth-part of its former amount. This being the case, it is evident that fabrics of this description were, of all others, the fittest subjects of taxation, because, from the nature of the manufacture employed in producing them, any subsidiary burden was capable of being much more than compensated by the increased skill and diminished cost of production! And, in truth, the tax was paid neither by the consumer nor the producer, but the talent of the manufacturer, called into existence by the tax, and which, but for it, would have lain dormant in the mind of the mechanist.

But of all parts of the Budget, the most extraordinary and ruinous was, the proposed tax on transfers of stock.

To understand the merits of this question, it is necessary to recollect, that the acts creating the stock had declared, in the most express terms, that, “in no time coming should any tax, duty, or burden whatsoever, be imposed upon the sale, or transfer, of the said stock.” This was the condition solemnly sanctioned by many acts of Parliament, on which the money was advanced by the public creditor, and on the credit of which it had passed through innumerable hands, and was now held by the proprietors of the stock. How was it possible to violate this condition, without breaking faith with the public creditor—in other words, undoing the public faith of Britain?

It was urged by Ministers, that the income tax was a violation of this original compact; and a speech of Mr Pitt was quoted by Mr Charles Grant, in which that great statesman declared, "that he did not regard it as any violation of the slightest faith of Government to impose a tax on the income derived from stock, when imposed equally at the same time on the income derived from every other source, because the nation was not pledged to keep the income derived from the funds entirely free of taxation, but only not to impose any particular tax on that species of property." These words, thus cautiously guarded and restricted to the imposition of an universal tax, were seriously quoted by Mr Grant as supporting a particular duty of one half per cent on the transfer of funded stock. Nothing can be clearer than that the principle of Mr Pitt had no sort of application, unless the proposed transfer duty on stock were extended at the same time to every other alienation. Now, the tax proposed was solely on transfer of stock and land. The sale of manufactured articles to any amount: of ships, furniture, movables of every sort, cattle, grain, farm produce, &c. were entirely free from any imposition. Here, then, was a particular duty laid on the fund and landholders, directly contrary to the plighted national faith to the former of these parties. It is idle to pretend that such a measure, if carried into effect, would not have been a direct breach of national faith.

Supposing it had been as true as it in reality was false, that Mr Pitt had, by the income-tax, infringed the condition on which the stock was subscribed, was that any reason why so great a violation of faith should be repeated? Because a man, under the pressure of extreme want, has once committed theft, is that any reason why the crime should be again committed, when no such palliating circumstance exists? Because the nation, during the difficulties of a mortal conflict, was obliged to tax the fundholders, along with other classes, is that any excuse for the imposition of a similar burden on him alone, during a period of profound peace?

It may be added that the tax on the funds, apparently directed against the rich, was, in reality, levelled at the most meritorious and valuable of the poorer classes. The public debt constitutes the great deposit of the savings of the nation, and more especially of the middling and lower orders. This is sufficiently demonstrated by the fact, that the funded proprietors are 280,000 in number, and that two-thirds of the three per cents are in the hands of persons who permanently use their stock as a source of income. The tax, therefore, was not a burden on the bankers of Lombard Street, or the capitalists of London, but on the little stock of the shopkeeper, and the savings of the poor. The great and meritorious investments of the Life Insurance Societies, the resource of the middling, and of the Savings' Banks, the deposit of the poorer orders, were all threatened by the proposed measure. No less than £15,000,000 is lodged in the three per cents from the Savings' Banks, and this sum, from its belonging to the humblest classes, is, in an especial manner, liable to be frequently drawn out, that is, to be frequently brought under the operation of the tax.

But the ruinous tendency of this tax is not to be measured by its actual and immediate operation. It is as a precedent of violation of national faith that it is chiefly of importance. Considered in this view, it would have inflicted a lasting and irreparable wound on the national credit, of which the bitter fruits would have been experienced in the next crisis of the national fortunes. In vain would government, on the recurrence of similar scenes of financial difficulty with those which were so common during the late war, have sought to impledge the national resources for immediate assistance; the fatal precedent of 1831 would have risen up in judgment against them, and the nation been under the necessity of guaranteeing the capitalist against future spoliation by the severity of present exaction. Good faith with nations is like honesty with individuals; it can never be violated without the consequences visiting the children unto the third and fourth generation of those who have broken it.

Nor would this first grand precedent of injustice have been less fatal, as a measure of relief, to succeeding governments. We have seen how gladly the ministers recurred to the precedent, so little in point, or rather so decidedly against them, of Mr

Pitt and the income tax. How gladly, under the influence of the same motives, would succeeding administrations have recurred to the Whig budget! How triumphantly would they have referred to this grand example of a concession to necessity to justify future violations of good faith, from still lower motives, or under the pressure of inferior difficulty!—Majus et minus non variant speciem is a maxim of morality not less than law; the first step in the career of iniquity is the one which must be resisted; when it is once taken, the difficulty of ulterior resistance is increased with every deviation from rectitude which has been made.

The proposed duty on transfers of land was as objectionable, on the footing of political expedience, as that on funded property was on principles of public justice. If there is any one circumstance more than another to be regretted in the present political state of Britain, it is the small extent to which the investments of the poor are directed towards land, and the consequent engrossing of estates in the hands of a few great proprietors—while the landed proprietors of France are above 4,000,000, those of Britain do not exceed 50,000. This is an evil of the very first magnitude, both with reference to the stability of the state and the habits of the labouring classes. Nor is it difficult to perceive from what cause this anomalous state of things has arisen. The expense of making out feudal titles, and the heavy duty on the disposition, operate as a complete bar against the investment of small savings in land. The ad valorem duty of one per cent, coupled with the expense of legal titles, amounting to at least five per cent more on small properties, are such serious burdens, that the lower orders never think of investing their savings in that species of property, but either put them in a bank, or in the funds, which costs comparatively nothing. Because these burdens were not already sufficiently great, the Ministers proposed to put an additional tax of half a per cent on transfers of land; the effect of which would have been to close the door altogether against this salutary species of investment.

This is a matter of the very utmost importance for the future habits of the lower orders. No man knows better than Lord Brougham the powerful influence of habits of frugality and foresight on their character, or the necessity of a secure investment to promote the growth of such habits among them. In his Colonial Policy he has pointed it out in the clearest manner.* How, then, has it happened that a Whig cabinet, composed of men professing the utmost regard for the labouring classes, should begin their career by a measure calculated to weaken these habits; to prevent altogether the purchase of land, with all its consequent blessings, by the industrious poor, and to diminish the security and profits of that great investment, which embraces nine-tenths of the savings of the nation?

The duty on Canadian timber, now fortunately abandoned, was another part of the Budget utterly inexplicable, both on the previous principles of the Cabinet, and on the plainest dictates of expedience. Lord Brougham's work on Colonies was expressly intended to point out the superiority of the Colonial over the Foreign Trade, on account of the profit being double to the nation, from the intercourse with its colonies, and single only on its commerce with foreign states. And there can be no doubt that this observation was well founded. Colonies are to be regarded, according to his well-known expression, as "distant provinces of the empire."† The wealth gained by the trade with Canada, enriches both the British merchant in the St Lawrence who exports timber, and the British manufacturer in England who exports cottons. The profit is felt "at both ends," and both flow into the British treasury. But the trade with the United States enriches only one of these parties, viz. the English manufacturer; the profit at the other end goes into the pockets of the American merchant; and instead of adding to the sum of British wealth, tends directly to strengthen the resources of his rival. This distinction is of the utmost importance, * Colonial Policy, I. 32.

† Ibid. II. 232.

and illustrates the great superiority of the colonial over any other foreign trade; of the trade in timber with Canada, for example, over that with Norway.

But, farther, the timber trade is connected with another and a still more momentous consideration. It is of the utmost moment to a maritime power to have its naval resources within itself; and to depend on no foreign power for the materials of its national defence. This state of things was fast approaching in this country. The Canadian forests were yielding an inexhaustible supply of timber for the navy; and its climate promised to render that important dependency the nursery of all the stores required in ships. The alleged inferiority of the wood was disproved by the fact, that, at the very time when the Budget was brought forward, the newspapers contained advertisements for a great supply of Canadian timber for the use of the royal navy. For many purposes, the American wood is fully as good as the Norwegian; and if for others it is not so, the difference is compensated by the great difference in price. Of the importance of having our naval resources within ourselves, ample evidence was afforded by the armed neutrality of the northern powers in 1780, the coalition of the Baltic states against England in 1800, and the closing of all friendly harbours in that quarter after the treaty of Tilsit in 1807. Of this immense advantage the nation was to be gratuitously, and without any compensation, deprived by the proposed duty on the timber brought from our Transatlantic possessions.

The trade with Canada has become of immense importance. It amounts to 400,000 tons annually, being about a fifth part of the whole trade of the empire; while the trade with North America employs only 80,000.* Great Britain enjoys the exclusive right of supplying these colonies with manufactures; and articles of that description, to the value of £2,700,000, are annually sent to her American colonies. The seamen employed in this trade are 18,700; while those engaged in the intercourse with

North America are only 8646† These facts demonstrate the importance of this traffic, both as a nursery for seamen, a vent for manufactures, and a storehouse of naval resources. It is rapidly increasing, having quadrupled in the last ten years; and at a similar rate of progress it would soon amount to a half of the whole foreign trade of Great Britain.

Extreme delicacy is required in the management of these colonies. Though warmly attached to the mother countries, their inhabitants are of an extremely jealous and irascible disposition. Many very serious disputes have arisen between the British governor and the colonial legislature. The tenure of our authority is extremely slender. It might be snapped asunder in a moment; and the American dominion established from the Frozen Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico. The advantages afforded by the present low state of the duties on timber, is at present the chief link which unites them to the mother country. What the consequences would have been of the removal of this advantage, may easily be foreseen.

What were the advantages proposed to counterbalance these enormous evils in the proposed change of the duties? Nothing; but that Norway timber should be encouraged in preference to Canadian; in other words, a stranger's property rather than our own subjects. So obstinately did Ministers cling to this determination to encourage foreigners instead of ourselves, that after they had been compelled to abandon the proposed increase of the duties, they brought in a prospective resolution to lower the duties on Norwegian timber in 1832; that is, since they could not impose a burden on their own subjects, they were at least determined to take it off the inhabitants of foreign states!

It is no doubt desirable to purchase good wood cheap; but this is a trifling object in comparison of the disadvantages at which it was to be acquired. The trade with Norway is important; but it is not of a tenth part of the importance of the Canadian commerce—to sacrifice the great and vital interests bound up in the colonial timber trade to the propect of getting Memel logs somewhat cheaper than at present, is to legislate like statesmen, but if narrow-minded shopkeepers.

The same objections apply with equal strength to the proposed increase on the duties on Cape wine. To subject inferior wine at so great a distance, and in an infant colony, to nearly the same duty as French wines on the other side of the Channel, was to expose the cultivation of that article at the Cape to certain destruction. The proposed rise from 2s. 8d. to 5s. 6d. a-gallon, would at one blow have annihilated both the growth and the commerce in Cape wine. Not less than L.1,300,000, vested in these employments on the faith of the protection of the British Statutes, would have been destroyed. For what purpose was this great sacrifice to be committed, and the prosperity of an infant colony to be nipt in the bud? To follow the phantom of Free Trade, at the expense of our best interests: to destroy our own colonial industry, in order to encourage that of our hereditary rivals.

Cape wine, it is said, is of an inferior quality—so it is; but is that any reason for totally extinguishing its growth? It is not so good as claret or champagne; but is that a sufficient ground for subjecting it to the same import duties? Unless the duty bears some proportion to the value of the article taxed, it must operate as a prohibition. If wine worth 1s. 6d. a-bottle is subjected to the same burden as that worth 5s., of course the former will disappear from the market. If wine raised at the southern extremity of Africa is taxed as heavily as that raised on the Garonne, the cultivation must speedily cease at the distant point.

The motive for this extraordinary tax cannot be divined. It certainly would not have the effect of cheapening any kind of wine in the market to double the duties on that produced at the Cape. The interests of the middling orders evidently require that cheap wines should be accessible to limited fortunes: and how is this to be done, if the cheapest wines now raised are to be elevated in price by the imposition of the same duties as those levied on the finest wines of French growth? Ministers proposed to lower the duties on champagne and claret from 7s. to 5s. 4d. a-gallon; and to raise those imposed on Cape Madeira to the same amount, or in other words, to enable the rich man to consume his luxuries at a cheaper, and compel the poor one to purchase his necessities at a dearer rate.

The duty on raw cottons, calculated as likely to produce L.500,000, is equally inexplicable both on principle and expedience. Professing to wish to lighten the springs of industry; to cheapen the raw produce, which enters into and forms the substratum of our manufactures, they brought forward a proposal to burden the article which forms the staple manufacture of England. The manufacture of cotton goods has now risen to such an extraordinary height, that no less than 227,000,000 pounds of cotton were imported into the empire in the year 1828, being nearly five times what it was at the conclusion of the war. The working up of cotton goods is by far the most important branch of British manufacturing industry; in fact, it is equal to all our other manufactures put together. How is the imposition of a burden on the staple of this immense branch of industry to be defended? Proceeding on the principles of free trade, and on the experienced benefit of reducing the duties on raw silk, by what extraordinary process did Ministers arrive at the conclusion, that by raising the duties on raw cotton, the springs of that important branch of industry would be lightened?

By increasing the prime cost of the article, an increase is given to the ultimate price, incomparably greater than the mere addition of the newly imposed duty. The cost of production, the original outlay being increased, the capital expended on the article in all the subsequent hands through which it goes, must be increased also. A larger outlay is required for manufacturing it, for selling it to the wholesale merchant, for disposing of it in the retail trade. Every one of these persons must have his profit on the enlarged advance he is required to make. The prejudicial effect of such an addition to the original outlay has been distinctly proved by the result of the duty on leather, malt, and other articles, where the elevation of price to the ultimate consumer was always incomparably greater than the tax imposed; for this evident reason, that all the subsequent hands through whom it went, levied an additional profit on their enlarged outlay. The same effect must have followed the increased duty on cotton; and this was proposed by an administration professing to lighten the springs of manufacturing industry!

It may be added, that the proposed duty would have pressed with peculiar severity, upon the working classes, while it would have been comparatively unfelt by their superiors. Cotton goods have now become an absolute necessity to the lower orders; they appear in the shirts, stockings, trousers, and waistcoats, of the men; in the gowns, petticoats, shifts, caps, and stockings, of the women; two-thirds of the expenditure for clothing of every poor family, is for articles worked out of this material. The proposed tax would necessarily have raised the price of all these articles, unless the increasing skill of the manufacturers could have counteracted this effect by a still farther extended application of machinery. This could not have been done without diminishing the employment of the operatives employed in those departments. In either view, the lower orders must have suffered from the proposed duty; if the price of cotton goods was raised, this would at once and universally have abridged their comforts; if not, this could have been effected only by their diminished employment.

By being imposed on the raw material, and not on the manufactured article, in any of its subsequent stages, the advance of price would in a peculiar and most unequal manner have pressed on the labouring classes. The cotton articles which they consume are those of the coarser fabric, in which the original cost of the article bears a great proportion to the subsequent charge of its manufacture. What the higher orders again principally require are the finer and more manufactured kinds, where the chief part of the price arises from the costly processes to which the original materials are subjected; of course, the enhancement of price by the imposition of a duty on the raw material is much greater in the first class than in the second. The difference would hardly have been perceived in the splendid shawl which adorns the figure, or the richly-worked stockings which set off the ankles of the lady of fashion; but it would have been sensibly felt by the artisan when he came to purchase the coarse shirts, moleskin jackets, or dimity petticoats, which constituted the clothing of himself and his family.

Lastly came the duty on steam-boats, a tax imposed seemingly for no other reason but to leave no principle of philosophy unviolated, and no enjoyment of the poor unaffected by fiscal regulations. If there is any one principle more firmly fixed than another by political economy, it is the incalculable advantage of an extended, cheap, and rapid internal communication. In this particular, the conclusions of experience are perfectly in unison with the deductions of reason; and the beneficial effect of rail-roads, canals, and highways, is universally felt and acknowledged. The wonderful effects of the application of steam to navigation were only beginning to develop themselves; whole regions were starting into activity under its beneficial influence; the remoter provinces of the empire were brought close to the metropolis by its means, and the disadvantages of climate and soil compensated, in many extensive districts, by mere proximity to the sea-coast. In Scotland, in particular, steam-boats had proved of extraordinary and unlooked for utility. The deeply indented coast and numerous islands of the western counties were starting in consequence into life and activity. Every man who had the sea at his door found himself within an easy journey of the most opulent districts; and farm produce, hitherto useless for want of a market, found a rapid and increasing sale. Seventy steam-boats daily passed up and down the Clyde; four boats went daily to Inverary from Glasgow, a town not visited, fifteen years ago, by a single public conveyance; cattle were sent every week from Morayshire to London by water; the farm and garden produce of Argyshire was daily brought to Glasgow; and an immense commerce carried on in potatoes from the Mull of Cantire to Dublin. In the most remote and hitherto unfrequented districts of the West Highlands, the arrival of a steam-boat every day afforded both the means of communication with more civilized quarters, and the opportunity of disposing of the fruits of their industry to advantage; and under the benignant influence of increasing intercourse with mankind, civilisation was advancing, knowledge extending, and the inveterate indolence of the Celtic character giving way to the artificial wants of polished life.

Of most of these immense advantages, which Scotland had begun and Ireland might hope to reap from steam-navigation, this country would have been deprived by the proposed duty. The tax of 1s. a-head on all passengers would have doubled, in most cases, in many quadrupled the expense of water conveyance. At the numerous ferries which intersect the Western Highlands, it would have operated as a complete and impassable barrier. With so little local knowledge was this tax originally imposed, that the same duty was laid on a passenger on crossing an inconsiderable ferry, as on a voyage from Edinburgh to London, and the total produce of the tax estimated at £100,000—whereas it was ascertained, that, in the Frith of Forth alone, its amount would be £13,000 a-year.

It may be added that this was a tax levied peculiarly, and almost exclusively, on the best and most innocent enjoyments of the poor. Many other luxuries degrade the life, and ruin the character, of the lower orders. Tobacco brutalizes their habits, spirits poison the mind as well as weaken the body; but the cheap travelling which steam-navigation introduced produced nothing but beneficial effects. For the pale and sickly mechanic or operative workman to escape from the smoke and contagion of cities, and visit the tranquil and beautiful scenes of the country, was an enjoyment to all of the most innocent, to some of the most elevating kind. None could be brutalized by visiting Inverary, Loch Lomond, or Loch Ness; many might be wakened by such unlooked-for gratification to a sense of the baseness of sensual and the superiority of intellectual enjoyment. The same Budget which proposed to burden these innocent and elevating enjoyments, rendered it cheaper to chew and smoke tobacco; and this was the system of the partisans of intellectual improvement, and the friends of the poor!

Such is the celebrated Whig Budget, now happily extinct, except as a monument of rash and ill-considered legislation, and as a warning to future times of what may be anticipated from the continued influence of the same interests which have produced this abortion.

The explanation of this measure is to be found in the words with which Lord Althorpe concluded his speech introducing it: "This Budget will be liked by the manufacturers, but not by the fundholder." Ministers were quite aware that they were trenching on the interests both of the capitalist and of the merchant; that they were taxing the colonies, and breaking faith with the public creditor; but they were willing to incur their displeasure to secure the favour of the manufacturers. Such is the consequence of being governed by an administration, who rest on popular favour, and are impelled to sacrifice the best interests of the empire to maintain their interest with the populace in the great cities.

It is in this view, that the consideration of the late Budget is chiefly of value. It points to the course of policy which has been adopted by a popular, and must be followed up by a reforming ministry. The same causes, which, in opposition to principle, philosophy, and expedience, compelled the cabinet into the proposed measures of finance, must operate with increased force, when additional power is given to the popular voice, and greater sway to the manufacturing interest in the legislature.

The important and vital fact that two-thirds of the whole population of Great Britain are engaged in trade and manufactures, and only one-third in the cultivation of the soil,* is decisive on this point. The increasing preponderance of the manufacturing over the agricultural interest, has long been felt in the legislature; but under the new system of introducing all the householders inhabiting a house rented at L.10 a-year and upwards, it will evidently become overwhelming. What the measures are which they will force upon government may be judged of by those which were adopted to conciliate their good-will. Confiscation of the funds, under the name of taxes on transfers or on equitable adjustment: the withdrawing of all protecting duties on the produce of the colonies: the sacrifice of every other interest, to furnish cheap articles of necessity or convenience, to the sovereign multitude in the towns of the empire, will and must be the future policy of the government. The landed interest will be sacrificed by a repeal of the corn laws to procure their favour by the cheap price of bread; the Canadas will be lost, in the attempt to throw open the trade in timber; the West Indies in the conflagration consequent on the sudden emancipation of the negroes, or in the losses arising from a free trade in sugar; the East India interest, deprived of the exclusive trade to China, will be reduced to the doubtful and perilous sovereignty of a distant continent. These effects may not all follow at once—considerable periods may elapse between each successive step; but their ultimate establishment under a reformed parliament is as certain as that night succeeds day.

The facts, that a large proportion of the members of the House of Commons who voted against Ministers on the Timber question, supported them on Reform; that the funds maintain their value notwithstanding the tempest with which they are menaced; that the city of London has returned all its members not only to the reforming, but the radical interest; and that the landed freeholders have almost everywhere returned reforming candidates at the late elections, are among the most extraordinary incidents of this eventful age. They demonstrate how little the march of intellect has added to the real knowledge of mankind, and how scanty is the stock of political information in the world, notwithstanding the incessant discussions of the newspapers. The fundholders fondly imagine that their dividends will be as regularly paid by a reformed as a constitutional Parliament: the shipping owners, that the interest of navigation will be as steadily adhered to by the sovereign multitude as by the ancient and stable British Government: the colonial proprietors, that the vast fabric of the empire will be as securely held together by the unstable many, as the stable few: the farmers, that the interests of agriculture will be as well attended to in the Chapel of St Stephen, by the delegates of the manufacturing interest, as the representatives of the landed property. On they go like a flock of sheep, supporting each other in the cry for reform, until at length they have returned a Parliament composed of such materials, that even a reforming administration tremble for the consequences. All this has taken place at the very time that the warning fire of revolution was devastating the European continent; and in the lifetime of the very generation who had witnessed the church, the colonies, the commerce, and the landed estates of France, perish in the first gales of their reformed assembly. Well might the Chancellor Oxenstierna exclaim—Videat quam parva sapientia regitur mundus.

TOM CRINGLE'S LOG.*

NEXT morning, we proceeded towards the Spanish headquarters, provided with horses through the kindness of the Captain of the outpost, and preceded by a guide on an ass. He was a moreno, or man of colour, who, in place of bestriding his beast, gathered his limbs under him, and sat crosslegged on it like a tailor; so that when you saw the two "end on," the effect was laughable enough, the flank and tail of the ass appearing to constitute the lower part of the man, as if he had been a sort of composite animal, like the ancient satyr. The road traversed a low swampy country, from which the rank moisture arose in a hot palpable mist, and crossed several shallow lagoons, from two to six feet deep of tepid, muddy, brackish water, some of them half a mile broad, and swarming with wild waterfowl. On these occasions, our friend the Satyr was signalled to make sail ahead on his donkey to pilot us; and as the water deepened, he would betake himself to swimming in its wake, holding on by the tail, and shouting, "Cuidado Barrio, Cuidado que no te ahogues."

While passing through the largest of these, we noticed several calashes about pistol-shot on our right;

as we fancied one of them bobbed now and then, it struck me they might be Indian fishing-floats. To satisfy my curiosity, I hauled my wind, and leaving the track we were on, swam my horse towards the group. The two first that I lifted had nothing attached to them, but proved to be what I thought they were, merely empty gourds floating before the wind; but when I tried to seize the largest, it eluded my grasp in a most incomprehensible manner, and slid away astern of me with a curious hollow gabbling sort of noise, whereupon my palfrey snorted and reared, and nearly capsize me over his bows. What a noble fish, thought I, as I tacked in chase, but my Bucephalus refused to face it. I therefore bore up to join my companions again; but in requital of the disappointment, smashed the gourd in passing with the stick I held in my hand, when, to my unutterable surprise, and amidst shouts of laughter from our moreno, the head and shoulders of an Indian, with a quantity of sedges tied round his neck, and buoyed up by half-a-dozen dead teal fastened by the legs to his girdle, started up before me. "Ave Maria, purísima! you have broken my head, señor." But as the vegetable helmet had saved his skull, of itself possibly none of the softest, a small piece of money splintered the feud between us; and as he fitted his pate with another calash, preparatory to resuming his cruise, he joined in our merriment, although from a different cause.— "What can these English simpletons see so very comical in a poor Indian catching wild-ducks?"

Shortly after, we entered a forest of magnificent trees, whose sombre shade, on first passing from the intolerable glare of the sun, seemed absolute darkness. The branches were alive with innumerable tropical birds and insects, and were laced together by a thick tracery of vines, along which a guana would occasionally dart, coming nearest of all the reptiles I had seen to the shape of the fabled dragon.

But how different from the clean stems, and beautiful green sward of our English woods! Here, you were confined to a quagmire by imperious underwood of prickly pear, penguin, and speargrass; and when we rode under the drooping branches of the trees, that the leaves might brush away the halo of mosquitoes, flying ants, and other winged plagues that buzzed about our temples, we found, to our dismay, that we had made bad worse by the introduction of a whole colony of garapatos, or wood-ticks, into our eyebrows and hair. At length we reached the headquarters at Torrecilla, and were well received by the Spanish commander-in-chief, a tall, good-looking, soldierlike man, whose personal qualities had an excellent foil in the captain-general of the province, whom at first I took for a dancing-master, or, at the best, perruquier en general to the staff.

After being furnished with food and raiment, we retired to our *quatre*s, a most primitive sort of couch, being a simple wooden frame, with a piece of canvass stretched over it. However, if we had no mattresses, we had none of the disagreeables often incidental to them, and fatigue proved a good opiate, for we slept soundly until the drums and trumpets of the troops, getting under arms, awoke us at daylight. The army was under weigh to occupy Carthagena, which had fallen through famine, and we had no choice but to accompany it.

I knew nothing of the misery of a siege but by description; the reality even to me, case-hardened as I was by my own recent sufferings, was dreadful. We entered by the gate of the raval, or suburb. There was not a living thing to be seen in the street; the houses had been pulled down, that the fire of the place might not be obstructed in the event of a lodgement in the outwork. We passed on, the military music echoing mournfully amongst the ruined walls, to the main gate, or Puerto de Tierra, which was also open, and the drawbridge lowered. Under the archway, we saw a delicate female, worn to the bone, and weak as an infant, gathering garbage of the most loathsome description, the possession of which had been successfully disputed by a carrion crow. A little farther on, the bodies of an old man and two small children were putrefying in the sun, while beside them lay a miserable, wasted, dying negro, vainly endeavouring to keep at a distance with a palm branch, a number of the same obscene birds that were already devouring the carcass of one of the infants; before two hours, the faithful servant, and those he attempted to defend, were equally the prey of the disgusting gallinazo. The houses, as we proceeded, appeared entirely deserted, except where a solitary spectrelike inhabitant appeared at a balcony, and feebly exclaimed, "Viva, los Espanoles! Viva, Fernando Septimo!"—

We saw no domestic animal whatever, not even a cat or a dog; but will not dwell on these horrible details any longer.

One morning, shortly after our arrival, as we strolled beyond the land gate, we came to a place where four banquillos (a sort of short bench or stool, with an upright post at one end firmly fixed into the ground), were placed opposite a dead wall. They were painted black, and we were not left long in suspense as to their use; for solemn music, and the roll of muffled drums in the distance, were fearful indications of what we were to witness.

First came an entire regiment of Spanish infantry, which, filing off, formed three sides of a square,—the wall near which the banquillos were placed forming the fourth; then eight priests, and as many choristers chanting the service for the dying; next came several mounted officers of the staff, and four firing parties of twelve men each. Three Spanish American prisoners followed, dressed in white, with crucifixes in their hands, each supported, more dead than alive, by two priests; but when the fourth victim appeared, we could neither look at nor think of any thing else.

On enquiry we found he was an Englishman, of the name of S —, English that is, in all except the place of his birth, for his whole education had been English, as were his parents and all his family; but it came out, accidentally I believe, on his trial, that he had been born at Buenos Ayres, and having joined the patriots, this brought treason home to him, which he was now led forth to expiate. Whilst his fellow-sufferers appeared crushed down to the very earth, under their intense agony, so that they had to be supported as they tottered towards the place of execution, he stepped firmly and manfully out, and seemed impatient when at any time, from the crowding in front, the procession was obliged to halt. At length they reached the fatal spot, and his three companions in misery being placed astride on the banquillos, their arms were placed round the upright posts, and fastened to them with cords, their backs being towards the soldiers. Mr S — walked firmly up to the vacant bench, knelt down, and covering his face with his hands, rested his head on the edge of it. For a brief space he seemed to be engaged in prayer, during which he sobbed audibly, but soon recovering himself he rose, and folding his arms across his breast, sat down slowly and deliberately on the barquillo, facing the firing party with an unshrinking eye.

He was now told that he must turn his back and submit to be tied like the others. He resisted this, but on force being attempted to be used, he sprung to his feet, and stretching out his hand, while a dark red flush passed transiently across his pale face, he exclaimed, in a loud voice, "Thus, thus, and not otherwise, you may butcher me, but I am an Englishman and no traitor, nor will I die the death of one." Moved by his gallantry the soldiers withdrew, and left him standing. At this time the sun was intensely hot, it was high noon, and the monk who attended Mr S— held an umbrella over his head; but the preparations being completed, he kissed him on both cheeks, while the hot tears trickled down his own, and was stepping back, when the unhappy man said to him, with the most perfect composure, "Todavía pater, todavía, mucho me gusta la santidad." But the time had arrived, the kindhearted monk was obliged to retire. The signal was given, and they were as clouds of the valley—"Truly," quoth old Splinter, "a man does sometimes become a horse by being born in a stable."

Some time after this we were allowed to go to the village of Turhaco, a few miles distant from the city, for change of air. On the third morning after our arrival, about the dawning, I was suddenly awakened by a shower of dust on my face, and a violent shaking of the bed, accompanied by a low grumbling unearthly noise, which seemed to pass immediately under where I lay. Were I to liken it to any thing I had ever experienced before, it would be to the lumbering and tremor of a large waggon in a tempestuous night, heard and felt through the thin walls of a London house.—Like—yet how fearfully different.

In a few seconds the motion ceased, and the noise gradually died away in hollow echoes in the distance—whereupon ensued such a crowing of cocks, cackling of geese, barking of dogs, lowing of kine, neighing of horses, and shouting of men, women, and children, amongst the negro and coloured domestics, as baffles all description, whilst the various white inmates of the house (the rooms, for air and coolness, being without ceiling, and simply divided by partitions run up about ten feet high) were, one and all, calling to their servants and each other, in accents which did not by any means evince great composure. In a moment this hubbub again sank into the deepest silence—man, and the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, became mute with breathless awe, at the impending tremendous manifestation of the power of that Almighty Being in whose hands the hills are as a very little thing—for the appalling voice of the earthquake was once more heard growling afar off, like distant thunder mingling with the rushing of a mighty wind, waxing louder and louder as it approached, and upheaving the sure and firm set earth into long undulations, as if its surface had been the rolling swell of the fathomless ocean. The house rocked, pictures of saints fell from the walls, tables and chairs were overturned, the window frames were forced out of their embrasures and broken in pieces, beams and rafters groaned and screamed, crushing the tiles of the roof into ten thousand fragments. In several places the ground split open into chasms a fathom wide, with an explosion like a cannon shot; the very foundation of the house seemed to be sinking under us; and whilst men and women rushed like maniacs naked into the fields, with a yell as if the Day of Judgment had arrived, and the whole brute creation, in an agony of fear, made the most desperate attempts to break forth from their enclosures into the open air, the end wall of my apartment was shaken down; and falling outwards with a deafening crash, disclosed, in the dull grey mysterious twilight of morning, the huge knarled trees that overshadowed the building, bending and groaning, amidst clouds of dust, as if they had been tormented by a tempest, although the air was calm and motionless as death.

THE LORD ADVOCATE ON REFORM.

It has long been a questio vexata with moralists, whether greatness of mind be most severely tried by prosperity or adversity. We have now the finest opportunity afforded us that ever befell philosophers of lulling it into perpetual peace. For we, who a few months ago were sitting like a bright young bridegroom blackbird on the topmost twig of the tree of felicity, making the woods ring with our song, are now sitting like an old sick widower crow at its foot, incapable even of a caw, and deepening the gloom with that of our dishevelled plumage that bears tokens both of Erebus and Friesland.

"Surely you don't say so?" whispers, with the sweetest of all susurrus, the Pensive Public. "Awake! arise! or be for ever fallen!" continueth also the silver-trumpet-tongued; and responding, "Christopher is himself again!" we spring suddenly to our feet, and exult to feel, what all the world sees, that still doth our "stature reach the sky!"—that even in these days there are giants.

One thing at least is already manifest, (and our enemies, we do hope, will not fail bitterly to abuse us for it,) that our high opinion of ourselves is not lowered by the Decline and Fall of that Tory Empire of which we yet are the head. Perhaps Decline and Fall are words too Gibbonian for the occasion; and we should be speaking more correctly, perhaps, were we to say, the Dismemberment or Partition of Toryland. Those provinces which had been wrested from us by the Radicals, our valour has already more than half-rescued from their gripe—and we fear not but that the issue of this opening campaign will be the restoration to us, their lawful monarch, of the other provinces now in the possession of the Whigs. And thus the Empire will, as of old, maintain the balance of power in Europe, and put an end for ever to that kicking of the beam so offensive to the ear of blindfolded Justice.

Our high opinion of ourselves, we say, has not been lowered; and pray why should it? It has—pardon the expression—been heightened; and when we look around us on the general madness, and listen to its ravings, you can have no conception of the united sense of glory and of gratitude which lifts us up above—but not aloof from—that unhappy mass of mankind. "The general madness sayest thou, friend?" quoth a Quaker. "Yea, verily the general madness," is our prompt reply; and we are prevented but by our unconquerable courtesy from adding, that of all the insane now shouting under the epidemic, Broadbrim himself is the most conspicuously absurd, bawling for reform in a garb that holds the prophetic soul of the wide world "dreaming of things to come," at such defiance as, had she any sense of the ludicrous, would long ere now have made her split her sides with inextinguishable laughter.

Whatever, then, be the true nature of the predicament in which we—who seem to be in what Brother Jonathan would call a pretty considerable minority—are now placed,—and whatever the feelings which now agitate our secret hearts,—you see we are resolved at least to put on a cheerful pliz, and not to die either of the dumps or the mumps, or any other of the distempers. Such is the natural and acquired obstinacy—or, in other words, the heroic hilarity of our hearts, that a thousand times rather would we be what we are, a poor placeless Tory, who came into this world with a wooden ladle in his mouth, than any one of the devil's dozen of my Lord Grey's rich kith and kin Whigs, who are now reveling in place or pension, and who, to the astonishment of their respective accoucheurs, made their successful debut on the stage of life each with a silver spoon in his sucking organ.

We know that the downfall of Christopher North would rejoice the savage souls of the British Jacobins now, as intensely as the downfall of Paris rejoiced the savage souls of the French Jacobins at the Revolution. If things keep progressing, we shall not be at all surprised to find ourselves, on some fine sunny summer morning—guillotined. Let all then who love us and themselves prevent things from progressing; and thus the properties and persons of Tories—that is, all those blessings that make life desirable—and all those Christians who are worthy of enjoying them—may be preserved inviolate—in bright succession—in secula seculorum.

What are the Tories about? Answer that question they who can; for it is one of the few to which we must pause for a reply. Where is the Tory-Press? The only one we know is in Messrs Ballantyne's printing-office, and even now the happy engine has the ever-young and blooming Maga in his arms. He cannot contain himself in his ecstasy; but tells the secret of their loves to the whole court by a clanking and creaking that disturbs the peace, and threatens to shake the foundation of the establishment. What a contrast he to the lazy lubber in the adjacent chamber, shunning sleep with old faded Blue and Yellow at his back, who, dying of vexation, solicits in vain one feeble pressure once a-quarter! Were there a few more such nymphs as Maga in the world, and a few more such patent presses, soon would Toryism flourish like a green bay-tree, while the Loves and Graces, the Sciences and the Virtues, would lead choral-dancers round its trunk, and duly Morn and Eve celebrate beneath its shade their blameless orgies. The whole island would be a perfect Picardy; and one continuous Noctes Ambrosianæ (grumble not at the grammar) rule the year, that would not then miss the unneeded sun, and forget the dull day in those ineffable nocturnal splendours.

What are the Tories about? we again ask, and again pause for a reply. Where are their pens that used to be like poniards? Why sleep the assassins? Has death dethroned the Old Man of the Mountain? Extinguished are the royal race of Tory Anonymi—the viewless spirits who for ages have kept the golden rim that rounds the temples of our King from being torn from his forehead, and trampled under reforming and revolutionary feet? We call on them to UNFURL THEIR STANDARDS. One, however glorious, is not enough. Let them "Post to their revenge." Roar every John Bull as if he were of Bashan. Be every banner-staff of Ebony—difficult to bend and impossible to break—true Blackwood; tempered be every blade in the Thames, the Tweed, or the Shannon—the charge be with heads of columns—Christopher North Generalissimo of the allied armies—and our power shall level their long array like a storm lancing a forest.

We have for a long time past been sick of being never abused. What can everybody mean by nobody cursing Blackwood? The time was—'tis like the indistinct memory of a dream—a dream too like that of a region supposed by some to lie in the bowels of the earth, long to last on its surface—when all of woman born seemed to have entered into a solemn league and covenant to make Maga a monster. The Gentleman in Black, in their imagination, was a beauty to the Lady in Brown. Horns she had not, nor yet a tail; but such a face—such a head—and such a tongue in it! Why, the Fates, the Furies, the Harpies, and the Gorgons, in the world's diseased fancy, made but one Venus, Love's goddess on Mount Ida, in comparison with Maga, a hell-cat from the kingdom of Pluto, who, at the instance of Proserpine—(jealous,) had expelled her for sake of the peace of his doleful dominions. But now—we could shed tears to think of it, fast as "Arabian trees their medicinal gum"—we are, alas! looked on as human; our infernal is lost in our earthly; nay, some charitable single souls, if not whole sects, have publicly hinted their suspicions that we may be Christians; and one spirit beyond the present age—for which the future will vote him canonization—has boldly declared, that not only have we a soul to be saved, but that saved it is, and that in due time we shall go to heaven.

All this is mortifying exceedingly; yet mourn we not as those who have no hope. The bloody old Times may yet fall foul on us; the foggy Morning Chronicle yet shower its cold blast of sleet in our faces; the Herald cease the paltry sidewind war of the interpolation of our articles, and boldly proclaim our general infamy; the Globe, and all which it inherit, doom us, like Bellerophon, to "roam forlorn that sad Aleian field;" the Luminary, whom nobody must dare to call false, strike us with a coup de soleil; the Atlas, whose place must be no sinecure, make us an exception, and drop us from his world-supporting shoulder into a sea of penal fires; that lynx-eyed Minos, the Examiner, pry into our very heart, visited, as he once generously admitted it to be, with "occasional gleams of feeling," and sift our chaffy consciences, "desitute," as he once justly asserted them to be, of "principles, and leave us not the likeness of a dog or a Diogenes; while the Spectator, who, to other day, perspicuously expressed his wonder, and obscurely his disappointment, that the Edinburgh mob did not roll the seventeen citizens, who elected Mr Dundas member of the city instead of Mr Jeffrey, in the kennel all the way down that magnificent inclined plane cycled Leith Walk, and then cleanse them in the surgy Thetis, will, we would fain hope, with an intelligent countenance, stand smiling by, while a pulk or puke of Whigs, and a rag of Radicals, assailing Christopher in a fine fit of heroic patriotism akin to that which they felt who of yore exclaimed, "Oh! for a single hour of great Dundee!" attempt—perhaps to their own discomfiture—to drown the "old man eloquent" in the sea of oblivion.

Yes! we trust to Providence that there is "a brow time coming," and that we shall yet escape on wings from beneath the intolerable weight of almost universal and grievous praise, up into the troubled air of general and gross abuse, in which we shall career like an eagle among the murky clouds. How often we have compared ourself to an eagle—and yet every time with a new and various twinkle of our wing—so dissimilis, but not impar sibi, is genius—it is not for us, but for the admiring world, to attempt in vain to enumerate. In our hands well fareth it with eagle as with ship. Within the last two months, in and out of Pratem—we beg pardon for that lapsus lingua—Parliament—some grosses of times hath the state been figured by a ship. Sir James Graham, most elegant of land-lubbers, was succeeded in that image by Sir Joseph Yorke—Heaven hold his honest soul! for he was himself, and many eyes wept—our own among the number—when we heard the gallant old admiral had gone down, and that his "last sea-fight was o'er!" Not a fresh-water sailor, in prate or print, in House, magazine, or review, but must have a shy, forsooth, at the ship! Lord pity their squeamish stomachs, and sea-sick souls! Not one of them all know the meaning of "abast the binnac!" but old Christopher North, who was once captain of the fore-top (we have run a rig or two in our time) "on board the Arethusa," when she sailed with Seymour, Old Nick as we used to call him, till the day we "floored that ere bloody Frenchman," and then Old Nick, ever after—a noble nickname—as we come right afore the wind, goose-wing fashion, with the best Forty-four in tow at our stern that ever left Brest; and had she not struck when almost sinking, why, then we should have prevented that, d'ye see, by blowing the sheer hulk out of the water—Old Christopher, we say, took up the image—for had he not many a time and oft admired the sea-nymph herself smiling a-top the cut-water—and with "a sailor's zest, a painter's eye, and a poet's fancy" (so said of our picture one who has too high a heart often to let his politics, though "blowing a gale," disturb the calm sea of literature) he launched the "SHIP OF THE STATE," manned, masted, rigged her; and then, having gotten her guns all to look straight out of the port-holes, we let slip our cable—seas running too fresh to be bothered with raising our anchor—and as "five hundred men on our decks did dance," why—dang it—the Old Boy laid her up to the wind's eye, close-hauled as ever you saw a wild-swan on his way from Norway beating up again' an unexpected sou'wester, and sent her at ten knots snoring through the swell like a sea-serpent.—Hurrah, for the Arethusa!

"A frigate tight and brave, as ever stemmed the dashing wave;"

Not a doubt of it. We shall not only be abused "along the line of limitless desires," almost to the unapproachable point of contentment; but we see, or think we see, the dawn of promise of a general massacre of Maga and her contributors. For who are likely now to be our enemies? High Whigs and low Whigs—Radicals and root-and-branchers—

the lineal descendants of King Lud leading on the whole power of Cockneydom, from the floating scum of scamps to the settled dregs—

“The black, infernal, cold, tartarean dregs; Adverse to life”—

all will soon be upon us, their ranks swelled by Tory trimmers, those avowed traitors, who will also act as spies, divulge our camp, and by secret paths shew approaches to our position. But, after all, 'tis impregnable; and, whatever be the issue of the war, this is certain sure—that as soon as these our old friends are taken prisoners, which they will be some hour or other by a charge of cavalry that comes and goes like the lightning, we shall have infinite satisfaction in putting them to death with the most exquisite tortures, in sight of both armies enjoying a truce for sake of the spectacle. 'Twill be a delightful holiday. There you will see them—their ears and noses having first of course been cut off or slit—hanging with their heads downwards on a—But we must not anticipate. Suffice it to say, that they shall be gibbeted in a style that would please Tiberius, were the old gentleman alive; for the invention of a new pain surely shews the same genius, and deserves the same reward, as the invention of a new pleasure.

Pleasant, indeed, it is, far beyond our feeble powers of expression, to think of the variety of hostile feelings of which we shall be the object. Variety is, if not the soul, certainly the solace of life. Some will despise us, and we shall feel flattered by their contempt. True that 'twill be all pretence—but we shall not the less enjoy the folly because steeped in falsehood—for there is both preserve and pickle in lye. Others will seek to humble us into the worm-holes of the earth, by assuming ignorance, not only of our attributes, but of our being; and we think we see the unmy, with such hauteur curling on his lip as you might suppose Byron's to have shewn, had Byron become a Bandy, and discovered that his egg was rotten, and hear him asking, “Christopher North? Ah! who is he, pray? I never heard of him before;”—when click from behind comes the crutch on the deafest side of his empty knowledge-box; and though the blow be somewhat broken by the ear, it almost, at one and the same time, communicates and takes away the desired information. Others, again, though armed against us with dag and dagger—sword and spear—shield and buckler—pistol, musket, rifle, carbine, and blunderbuss—horrent with all the points of war—keep stealing from bush to bush—like hungry wild beasts in thickets—awatch for the moment when within shot our back is turned, to nail us from afar; for these are the pale sons of fear—and bite their lips and thumbs at us in the cruelty of cowardice, which, were we dead and cold, would fain lap our coagulated heart's-blood. And, last of all, lo! those who hate us with such a perfect hatred, that at the very thought of us their black bile boils—at the sight of us their livers quiver like a shrivelled hemlock-leaf—and the wretched Whigs—if such compact be not sworn already on other grounds—would sell their souls to Satan, so that we were but—dead. “Sincerity, thou first of virtues!” for thy sake, we almost love them that hate us—for in that, if in nothing else, sincere are their souls as Venetian glass—like it, too, clearly seen through—and like it at the touch of their own poison, see how they fall into shivers!

We are doomed to be in perpetual opposition. Long, long ago, when “her auld cloak was new,” Maga was the most ministerial of monthlies—she basked in the smiles of Premiers—lauded was she by First Lords of the Treasury; and Majesty itself shook its royal sides, to the genuine doric of Sir A. Barnard, one of the brightest and bravest of men, reading aloud to Great George's ear the Noctes Ambrosianæ. Loyal is she still, though the times are changed; and renewing her oath of fealty, she lays our crutch and knout at the foot of the throne. Let our king but say the word—and both shall flourish. On that crutch the House of Hanover shall yet lean—for Blackwood is the bold Brunswick-er who rejoices in the name of William. And as for the other instrument, let his Majesty but give us the sign manual—and his enemies shall have the knout—the whole knout—and nothing but the knout.

The chief of those enemies, we cannot help considering his Majesty's present Ministers. They seem to think themselves secure in their seats—but why so much sky between breech and saddle? Of that style of horsemanship we may say, "This will never do." The First Lord of the Treasury is like the tailor, riding to Brentford. Soon will they, one and all, be saddle-sick—and with philanthropic alacrity shall we run to stop their unruly Rozinantes, and even to assist them to dismount.

Our Sailor-King may possibly think them loyal; but his unsuspecting spirit will ere long discover its mistake. What is bred in the bone will shew itself in the flesh; and by and by his present adulators will shew him the same reverential love with which they smoothed the deathbed of his brother, which fell like light and like balm on the grey locks of his old sire's head, and on the sightless orbs of his eyes that rolled in vain in search of one sun-ray to cheer or sense or soul. Their character of that sire we dare not repeat; but without danger, or, we hope, offence, we may remind his Majesty, that the Lord High Chancellor of England, and his less famous friend, "the Attorney," have said that he is the brother of Nero. "The Advocate," too—he whom the Edinburgh mob always designate by the simple circumlocution of "the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland," once read this loyal lesson to Cobbett—which both parties perhaps have now forgotten, but which is embalmed in the Blue and Yellow:—"Is it too much to say that the zealous advocate of the Bourbons, and of all their connexions, might have been expected to speak of the sons of his sovereign in terms of less contempt and acrimony? His observations on the Dukes of York and Clarence, though we had no great objections to their substance, are certainly too much in the style of the professed enemies of royalty." The critic on Cobbett had no great objections to the substance of the observations. And what was it? Such brutal abuse as left the Dukes of York and Clarence hardly the common nature of man. Princes, indeed!—they were, in Cobbett's eyes, but cutpurses of the empire. Yet some few Englishmen may perhaps agree with us in thinking that a professed enemy of royalty is a better subject than a sneaking one who insinuates his scorn of the sons of his king into a hypocritical reproof of their revilers."

Has the nation forgotten the rumours circulated by the Whigs on the death of the late King—that there were reasons why a Regency might be of advantage to the kingdom? Strange notions had they then of the modern Alfred—but they were not, like Cobbett of old, "professed enemies of royalty," and therefore, "though they had no great objections to the substance" of those rumours, they circulated them silently, and with uplifted eyes and shrugging shoulders—the language which traitors love. And as for his Majesty's family—did not the "Leading Journal of Europe," the hand-organ now and foot-ally of the Ministry, insult and shame them on their birth, and threaten them, if they dared to shew their faces either on high or open places, to brand illegitimate on their forehead? And has not the same slave, at the bidding of his master's beck—for a freedman he will never be who is basely in love with bonds—has not the same slave of many masters shouted forth his pride on the elevation to an earldom of the very person whose high talents, stainless honour, and many accomplishments, half a year ago, could not save him, in a private station, from being dragged before the public by this infamous hireling, and held up to the scorn of the country, because he was the son of the King?

Yes—we are doomed to be in perpetual opposition. That budget of itself doth make Antis of us all. As Pandora's box contained all evils—so did it all blunders. And what will the same blockheads be about, does the nation suppose, when they have settled—if ever that be—the Question of Reform? The Bill, and the whole Bill, perhaps we are to have; but is it indeed true that we are to have nothing but the Bill? On such provender the people will starve. Yet, what other good shall we get from the Incapables, who know not even how to offer the nation a pinch of snuff, or a quid of tobacco? These are, in some sort, the louthsome luxuries of life. But wait till the Imbeciles attempt to lay a tax on Necessaries—and then their measures will stink in the nostrils of the whole nation. In Scotland—unless it be very severe indeed—the tax will be made productive; and if it be very severe indeed—why there will be a Rebellion after a Revolution, Reform on the back of Reform, out will turn the Whigs, in the Tories; the justly obnoxious tax—the reverse of a poll one—will be taken off in the midst of the most extraordinary vociferations, and the Country will be saved.

The Ready-Reckoner has other figures to sum up—and other ciphers to set down—besides those that appear upon the Bills of Reform. But not a single soul among all the Whigs has encountered Cocker but Joseph Hume; he is not a flaming minister; and many an error of omission and commission drops from his pen as he summeth up the “tottle of the whole.” But we must have another Budget. The old bag is burst past mending, nor will the only Sadler in the House stitch up the gaping wound. Worse still, the contents have been all scattered on the floor—the winds of Derision have watted, and the besom of Destruction has swept them clean away—and the abortive Budget evaporated in steam and smoke.

So much for the Headpiece—now for the Body—and by and by—the Tail of our Article. If either article or animal have a good headpiece, he may be easy about his body, and almost indifferent about his tail. Yet all three are essential to a perfect article or animal, for every production, either of Nature or of Art, should, like an epic poem, have a beginning, a middle, and an end. That our Article has had a beginning, nobody will deny—now let us rush in medias res—and pulling up at the eighth page, as on the successful completion of a trotting-match, for that distance, at the rate of three minutes to the mile, you might suppose that prince of sportsmen, Mr Osbaldstone, on Miss Turner, Rattler, or Tom Thumb, we shall then exhibit bit the nether end of our Article in comparative repose, just like that gentleman walking his tit into the nearest market town.

All persons who are now of opinion that Parliament needs but little reform, and all who are averse to such reform as his Majesty and his Ministers now propose giving us, are set down by that reforming Ministry, and their unreformed adherents, as enemies of the King, the country, and the constitution. Now, the Three Bills are not yet three months old—they are not so much as stirks—mere calves; and let us hear how some of their chief eulogists used to express themselves on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, before these abortions had. Let us begin and end, for the present, with one of the most eminent and able of them all—the Lord Advocate. Seventeen thousand signatures lately bore attestation to his character as a consistent, steady, and enlightened Friend of Reform. As the proof of the pudding lies in the eating of it, so does the proof of his Lordship's politics lie in the reading of them; and, therefore, without questioning the knowledge of the Deacons of the Tailors, Dyers, and Bonnet-makers, let us see if its accuracy be as correct as its range is extensive; and ascertain, from chapter and verse, whether or no their faith, which is that of the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, coincide with the faith of Mr Jeffrey, as for upwards of twenty years it was elaborately and periodically expounded in the celebrated Blue and Yellow, the far-famed Edinburgh Review.

We shall not weary the Deacons by any lengthened analysis of the first two articles—able both—that by implication discussed the subject of Parliamentary Reform in that Journal. We refer the Deacons to them, in two early numbers of the work with which they are so familiar, under the titles of “Memoires de Bailly” and “Filangieri on Legislation.” In the first of these two excellent articles—written by Mr Brougham—but which Mr Jeffrey, in a subsequent article, makes his own, by giving us, with complete acquiescence in all its doctrines, a very elegant abridgement—the highest, and we believe the justest, panegyric is pronounced on the British constitution as it then existed, now exists, and we fear, ere a few months elapse, will exist no more. Here is that elegant abridgement.

"On a former occasion we endeavoured to shew, that the most perfect representative legislature must be that which united in itself the greatest proportion of the effective aristocracy of the country, or contained the greatest proportion of the individuals who actually swayed the opinions of the people, by means of their birth, wealth, talents, or popular qualities. In this way, it was attempted to be shewn, that the nation was ultimately governed by the same individuals who, in their separate capacities, could have directed the sentiments of a very large majority; and that this was the only way in which the opinions and wishes of the people could be practically represented. Now, upon this footing alone, as it is evident that rank, fortune, and official situation, are among the most powerful of the means by which men are enabled individually to influence the opinions and conduct of those around them, so it follows that those qualifications should have their due share in returning members of the legislature; and that the government could not otherwise be either stable or respectable. The real power of every country is vested in what we have called its effective aristocracy; and that country is the happiest, in which the aristocracy is most numerous and most diversified as to the sources of its influence; that government the most suitable, secure, and beneficial, which is exercised most directly by the mediation of this aristocracy. In a country where rank, wealth, and office, constitute the chief sources of influence over individuals, it is proper that rank, wealth, and office, should make the greatest number of its legislators."

Such is (was) Mr Brougham's and Mr Jeffrey's Idea of a Perfect Commonwealth; and it was, they thought, realized in the British constitution. Mr Jeffrey says—"Now, without pretending to justify the irregularities which certainly subsist in our system of representation, and without arguing on the probable effects of these irregularities, we would merely ask, Whether it can be denied, in point of fact, that our Parliament, as it is now constituted, does actually possess the requisites which we have just now specified, and does actually perform the functions on which its substantial value depends? In spite of placemen and pensioners, and purchasers of boroughs, and nominees of lords, the House of Commons unquestionably contains a sufficient number and variety of persons to represent all the different opinions, and maintain all the different views of policy, which exist in the country at large. There is no sentiment so democratical—no accusation so uncourtly—no interest so local—but it finds there a voice to support and assist it."

Now, we ask the Deacons what they say to that panegyric on Parliament? Might they not imagine that this was not the logic of Francis Jeffrey—but of Christopher North? Had these been the opinions of the Lord Advocate too—then there is no saying but that the Seventeen might have elected his lordship instead of Mr Dundas. But, Deacons! do you call this backing the Bill? Deacons! do you persist in praising the consistency of his Lordship's "political literature?" Deacons! if this be Parliament, what need of Reform? Deacons! if this be not Parliament, when did it lose its virtues? Deacons! if such never were its virtues, why so indiscriminate in your eulogies on the "political literature" of the Man of the People?

In the article on Filangieri on Legislation, we find opinions equally enlightened, and equally panegyric on the constitution of our of late so much abused Parliament—that constitution of Parliament which so dissatisfies our Deacons. Thus the Reviewer saith—"If we think more lightly than others of some celebrated parts of our constitution, we are not less persuaded than they are of its intrinsic durability. We look less to the letter of the law than the real spirit and form of the general system. The whole British Constitution has undergone a mighty change in the last century: it has settled, to use the builder's phrase; it has shifted its centre of gravity; and the political theorems of past times are no longer applicable to it. Maximus novator tempus. The hand of the great Reformer has passed over the fabric." There is one Deacon in particular who will feel the beauty of the builder's phrase, "it has settled;" and who will understand the danger, as well, as the folly of tampering with an edifice "which has shifted its centre of gravity." Who ever denied it was founded on a rock? Why then touch it at all? Or, Deacon! if thou dost, must it not be with a gentle hand, "for there is a spirit in the stones;" and methinks we hear those at the corners pleading trumpet-tongued against "the deep damnation of their taking off." All the Eleven Deacons, and all the Eleven Thousand Signatures, know who was Filangieri. The Editor of the Edinburgh Review feared him for that he was a reformer; and showed, somewhat scornfully, certain strong reasons why no reformer should on an edifice "that had settled" lay his sacrilegious hands.

But perhaps the Eleven Deacons, and the Seventeen Thousand Signatures have forgot all they ever knew—were it little or much—about Jean Sylvian Bailly and Gaetano Filangieri—and are more at home on William Cobbett. He has all along been a sad fellow—and Mr Jeffrey once on a time gave him such a dressing, that the Edinburgh Deacons of those days thought he never could survive it, but would give up together the Political Register and the Ghost? But William Cobbett lived on, and so did Francis Jeffrey; and by some of those strange chances and changes that happen with all men, the Lord Advocate now not only holds the very self-same political principles for which he formerly strove to extinguish the fretful Peter Porcupine, after having first plucked out, as he supposed, all his quills, but vehemently striveth he with tongue, tooth, and nail, to make them the law of the land and the constitution of the state. Were the Deacons aware of this when they were concocting their petitions in panegyric of the uniform consistency of the "political literature" of their unchangeable man?

Why so fiercely ragged then Mr Jeffrey against Mr Cobbett; yea, even as if he were seeking to devour him like a roaring lion? Verily, because—to use the words of the Great Unchangeable—Mr Cobbett had striven

"in the recent numbers of his Political Register to spread abroad a general discontent and disrespect for the constitution, usages, principles, and proceedings, of Parliament! to communicate a very exaggerated and unfair impression of the evils, abuses, and inconveniences which arise from the present system of government," &c. Mr Jeffrey was particularly shocked with the following passage about Parliament, which he quotes with much horror. "I see not the least room to suppose that any insinuations, however foul, can sink the character of the House in the opinion of the country. No, the House is not to be affected by insinuations of any sort. Its character has long been such as to set all insinuations at defiance. I venture to assert, that its character is far beyond the reach of detraction." "After this," quoth Mr Jeffrey, "we need not quote any of his sneers at the honourable House." "Still less," he adds, "can it be necessary to retail any of his good old democratic sayings, as to the inadequacy of the representation," &c. All this was very wicked in Mr Cobbett, and we agree with Mr Jeffrey that such sneers were too intolerable to be retailed. But what thinks Mr Jeffrey of the following sneers—not from Mr Cobbett—but from a steam-engine called the Times, now in the service of that government of which the Lord Advocate is one of the staunchest friends and most faithful servants? "That enemy is now the usurper of the people's franchises—the cutpurses of the people's money—the robber of the public treasury under the forms of the law—of law enacted by the plunderer himself to favour his own extortion—his own systematic conversion of the fruits of other men's industry to selfish or criminal uses. When night after night borough-nominees rise to infest the proceedings of the House of Commons with arguments to justify their intrusion into it, and their continuance there, thus impudently maintaining what the lawyers call 'an adverse possession,' in spite of judgment against them, we really feel inclined to ask why the rightful owners of the House should be insulted by the presence of such unwelcome inmates? It is, beyond question, a piece of the broad-east and coolest effrontery in the world, for these hired lackeys of public delinquents to stand up as advocates of the disgraceful service they are embarked in." That is but one specimen of the style of speech that for some months past has kept perpetually flowing from the hired and unhired friends of reform. It is as insolent as may be; but not nearly so savage as many thousand others that must have met the eyes of all persons who take up a newspaper. Sir Thomas Denman, the Attorney-General of England, in his place in the House of Commons, said that he could not say that the allegations in the above passage from the Times were not true. We see no discountenance of these and other greater atrocities, that in fact fill all the newspapers, the demi-ministerial ones especially, to the brim, frowned now from the Blue and the Yellow, which, on the contrary, smiles sweetly on all the villains and all their villainies, and reserves all its vituperation for the friends of that constitution which it once would have annihilated Cobbett for attacking, but which it now assails with enginery more powerful than could ever be in the hands of private men—enginery worked by his Majesty's ministers—a park of light artillery having been committed to the "Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland," under whose sharp and scientific eye it has been brought to play against the Constitution with beautiful and pernicious precision—till ere long a breach will be effected—and the radicals rushing on, in immense numbers, succeed, we fear, in overpowering the garrison, dispirited from hopelessness of succour or supplies, and at the very commencement of the siege deserted by the governor.

But what else and what more said Mr Cobbett of yore to kindle the patriotic rage of Mr Jeffrey? Why he said—and Mr Jeffrey is avowed at the statement—"that all the evils under which we were groaning are produced by the improper composition of the legislative bodies, and especially of the House of Commons." To refute this wicked assertion, Mr Jeffrey set himself to work like a hero as he was and is; and first of all boldly met the incendiary on this his strongest position,—“that the members are not fairly chosen by the people, but are either nominated by the influence of great families, or purchase the seats from a junto of venal electors.” What style of fighting does the champion of Parliament adopt in conflict with such an “ugly customer?” He takes the bull by the horns, and by a sudden twist—like another Milo—flings the rough commoner over his knee whap upon the sod—knocking out his wind, and rendering him, by that single cross-buttock, incapable of coming to time—nay, when time is called, deaf as any post under government. In other words, more intelligible, perhaps, to Edinburgh Deacons—except the Deacon of the Fleshers—Mr Jeffrey admits all that Mr Cobbett has here said, and boldly declares to the whole world that such is—if not the very best imaginable—the very best practicable constitution of any Parliament. That it is, and must be so, he proves by many pretty pages of argument and illustration, to which we beg to refer all Deacons, and hereby offer a reward of a complete Set of Magna to him who shall produce such a refutation as shall seem even plausible to a Constituent Conventry assembled to decide on the comparative power and glory of the two “political literatures,” the one Mr Jeffrey’s, so adverse to the Bill and the whole Bill, and the other the Prize-Deacon’s, name and nature yet unknown, who shall succeed in giving that great Anti-reformer his quietus, and in rescuing Cobbett from his borough-mongering grasp.

Mr Jeffrey makes short work with William Cobbett’s arguments, and treats the strongest of them haut-en-bas thus:—“With regard to the interference of peers in elections, it is evidently impossible to prevent it by any statutory or authoritative regulation; and as, in fact, it is not very different from the interference of wealthy commoners,” (which interference the dauntless Deacon who shall buckle to Mr Jeffrey in single combat for the prize Set will please to observe his antagonist had, in an earlier part of his article, shewn to be attended with the happiest results,) “it is needless to say any thing more on the subject.”

That was a right-handed fencer no skill could parry, and in a moment poor Cobbett's daylight's were darkened—for it seems he had recovered from his insensibility, and insisted on renewing the fight. Mr Jeffrey was willing to accommodate the glutton—and do admire with us as clever a knock-down blow as ever teased smeller or potatoe-trap. "We are not much afraid of the influence of noble families. It is not, in general, a debasing or ungenerous influence; and in this country, there is so little of the oppressive, tyrannical spirit of some aristocracies, that we have really no apprehension at all from the prevalence of such a temper in our government. An English peer has scarcely any other influence than an English gentleman of equal fortune, and scarcely any other interest to maintain it. The whole landed interest, including the peerage, is scarcely a match for the monied interest, either in Parliament or society," &c.

But Mr Jeffrey does not stop here—but adds, that he has "still a word or two to say on the subject of venal boroughs, and we shall then take our leave of Mr Cobbett, and relieve our readers from this unreasonable demand on their attention." Let us hear this word or two from Mr Jeffrey's lips about venal boroughs—for he avoids the epithet "rotten," as not fit to mention before ears polite. "We are by no means certain that the consequences are so extremely injurious to the constitution as he appears to imagine. A venal borough is a borough which government has not bought; and which may therefore be bought by Mr Cobbett, or any other independent man. When a seat in Parliament is advertised for sale, a pretty fair competition, we think, is opened to politicians of all descriptions. The independent and well-affected part of the nation is far richer than the government or the peerage; and if all seats in Parliament could be honestly and openly sold for ready money, we have no sort of doubt that a very great majority would be purchased by persons unconnected with the Treasury or the House of Lords. Wealth is one of the democratical elements in this trading and opulent country; and an arrangement which gave it more immediate political efficacy probably would not be at all unfavourable to that part of our constitution."

What say the Eleven Deacons and the Seventeen Thousand Signatures to that? Or to Mr Jeffrey's concluding chuckle or crow over Cobbett lying like a huge hulk of a dunghill, with his broken and blunt natural spurs, beneath such a game-cock as our friend Mr Scot himself would admire, one of those ginger-piles that slaughter in silver? "Upon the whole, we hope we have said something to justify our love of our actual constitution—our aversion to Mr Cobbett's schemes of reform—and our indignation at his attempt to weaken the respect and attachment of the people to forms and establishments, without which, we are persuaded, there would be no security for their freedom."

And the man who thus wrote in the prime of his learned life, and vigour of his fine faculties, is now the advocate—the Lord Advocate for "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill!"

Bad as all Mr Cobbett's arguments were in Mr Jeffrey's eyes—they were not so bad as the spirit in which they were urged—which was nothing less than a desire to create in the minds of ignorant persons discontent with the best government that ever fostered and guarded freedom. Mr Jeffrey laughed to scorn, too, and withered with the fires of his indignation, the wicked assertion that a reform of Parliament would relieve the people from the weight of taxation. As "to sinecure places or pensions, these," said Mr Jeffrey, "are mere trifles. The most rigorous and unsparing reformer probably would not state the sum at a million annually. Mere faction to say that either this, or the sums lost by perculations, can make any sensible addition to the burdens of a nation which raises nearly fifty millions in the year, and that the poor would be at all relieved by a retrenchment to that extent." Taxation, he shewed, was made necessary by our debt—and our debt created by wars—and wars by whom? By the people; and that therefore were Parliament more popular—that is, were the voice of the people louder, then—we should have more wars—more debt—and more taxation. But with too much war, too much debt, and too much taxation—even with that constitution of Parliament which Mr Cobbett desired to reform, but Mr Jeffrey to preserve in statu quo—“So far,” says Mr Jeffrey, in answer to Mr Cobbett, who, it seems, had said this country was not worth fighting for—“so far from being a country the measure of whose sufferings is full, and to which every change must be gain, we conceive it to be obvious, on a very slight consideration, that we have attained a greater portion of happiness and civil liberty, than has ever before been enjoyed by any other nation; and that the frame and administration of our polity is, with all its defects, the most perfect and beneficial of any that men have yet invented and reduced to practice.”

The snake, however, if scotched, was not killed—and the cry was still kept up by Cobbett, Burdett, and others, for Reform. Mr Francis Jeffrey, therefore, the great Anti-reformer, was called upon by the conservative party again to buckle on the “armour of the invincible knights of old,” and, returning to the charge, to put all the enemies of the constitution to rout—in one total and irretrievable overthrow. As brave as patriotic, and as prudent as brave, and as skilful as prudent, and as wise as skilful, and as learned as wise, and as virtuous as learned, the champion of the constitution “insupportably his foot advanced,” and in an hour the day was won. The nation, it seems, during the two or three years that had elapsed since he chastised Cobbett, had grown exceedingly discontented with the government; and he at once admitted that “there was a very general desire for a more radical reform than could be effected by a mere change of ministry.” Evils, he cheerfully admitted, there must be; for how else account for the discontent? but then, said the wary anti-reformer, almost assuming the character of a moderate reformer, “We shall still have to determine whether the existing evils are capable of any remedy; whether the remedies which have been suggested are likely to prove effectual; and whether they could be applied without the hazard of greater evils than those which they were expected to cure.”

In pursuance of this plan, he asks, what are the great leading evils in our constitution? And these, he thinks, are, first, “the burden of the taxes; second, the preponderating influence of the crown; and, third, the monopoly of political power, which the very permanency and nature of the constitution has a tendency to create in the hands of a small part of the nation. “To these, and for all the other disorders which threaten our body politic, the popular prescription,” says Mr Jeffrey, with a slight sarcastic smile playing—we may well conceive while he was writing—about these thin, fine, eloquent-looking lips of his—is Parliamentary Reform. An amendment in the representation of the Commons, we are assured, is to ease us of our taxes—to reduce the influence of the crown—and to heal all breaches and heart-burnings between the governors and the governed. We are rather partial to this medicine on the whole; but it requires no ordinary skill and caution in the preparation and dosing; and, at all events, we are perfectly certain, is not capable of effecting half the wonders that are expected from it. No man of sense has any faith in universal specifics; and it is the part of an enemy, or a very pernicious friend, to degrade this useful medicine by investing it with the attributes of a quack panacea, and thus effectually to exclude it from all regular practice.”

With regard to taxes—extremely vexatious as Mr Jeffrey admits taxes to be—he says very properly, that “the actual burden of the taxes does not necessarily indicate any thing unsound or corrupt in the constitution or administration of the government;” and then shews, as we said half a page ago, that their great amount was entirely owing “to the warm and sanguine temper of the inhabitants,” who would have war, and yet were so unreasonable as to expect to indulge in that luxury without paying for it. “With regard,” says he, “to the taxes, in the first place, it appears to us in the highest degree chimerical to imagine that any change in the plan of representation should sensibly lessen the amount.” This chimera he is very anxious, indeed, to destroy—for it is a chimera breathing flames and fury—and feeding upon the very vitality of poor people. Thrice he slays this slain chimera—and the third time thus:—“We are clearly of opinion, that whatever other benefits might result from a reform in Parliament, it would be of no sensible benefit to the people by lightening the burden of the taxation; and that no delusion can be greater, and in some respects more mischievous, than that which represents these two things as essentially connected with each other.” We presume, that what was true then, is true now, with regard to taxes—and yet this is the very chimera that all the reformers are now feeding—till he is as big as the Bonassus. We may likewise say now, what Mr Jeffrey said then, “that to this false opinion, and to the pains which have been taken to disseminate it, we are perhaps indebted to a good part of the apparent zeal and activity which has lately been manifested on the subject of reform;” and—what say the Deacons?

The second point for Mr Jeffrey’s consideration, is the operation of Parliamentary Reform in diminishing the influence of the Government—that is, of the King and his Ministers. The power of the Crown was for many years either the bear or the bugbear of the Blue and Yellow. In almost every number you were sure to see the nondescript monster—at one time scampering through a forest, at another asleep in a cave—at another sucking his paws with a grim satisfaction which it might not have been safe to disturb. We suspect that we shall hear no more for some time of this bear, or bugbear, or buggoon, from the “Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland.” But fearful a monster as was the power of the Crown, in former times, and formidable that of the Ministry, Mr Jeffrey “could see no prospect of removing, or even alleviating it, by any alteration in the constitution of the House of Commons.” He is at pains to shew how any such expectation would be absurd; that the King, individually, neither is, nor can be consulted on the greater part of the appointments which are made in his name; that the patronage is vested substantially in the majority of the House of Commons, who can make a Minister, and by whom all Ministers know that they are made and continued; that in whatever way we conceive this assembly to be constituted, and by whatever form of election its members are supposed to be returned, still as long as men are men, and while causes and effects maintain their usual relations in application to human conduct, it cannot fail to happen that the persons in whom this patronage is vested will often be tempted to exercise it in their own favour, or in favour of their immediate connexions; that this is an evil which a change in the plan of representation would not only fail to cure, but would not in any degree touch or alleviate; that the people themselves are infected with this love of place and emolument, and that therefore the House, in case of so many more popular elections, would be just so much the more liable to the same temptations; and very important, though not very recondite, all these truths doth Mr Jeffrey explicate, and expound, and sift, and search, and illustrate, with a copiousness of diction and a felicity of argument which will prove puzzling to the Deacon who, fired with the hope of possessing and enjoying a Set of Maga, shall enter the lists with this doughty anti-reformer, who now delivers speeches somewhat fide, and indites epistles not very intelligible about the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill.

A zealous Anti-reformer in the Quarterly Review—whose admirable essays have attracted such universal notice, and met with such partial re-futation—proposed that this paper of Mr Jeffrey’s on Parliamentary Reform, once famous in its day, should be republished; and Mr Croker quoted from it an unanswerable passage in his speech in answer to the Lord Advocate. Perhaps there is as much fine “political literature” in it as in any thing that ever dropped from his eminent pen—nor does he in it confine himself to those airy or glowing generalities which too often elude the grasp, but he proposes such a plan of Reform as he thinks practicable, and explains “its principles, if not its details,” to which had the Lord Advocate adhered, it would not have, been to the detriment of his reputation, either for practical sagacity or theoretical wisdom.

Mr Jeffrey—after stating his own views—says, “Our popular reformers are undoubtedly far more specific. They are for cutting off the rotten boroughs, enlarging the elective franchise, and shortening the duration of Parliament.” But he says that he is satisfied that such proposals “could not be attempted without the greatest danger.”

To what length, therefore, does he think wise lovers of this matchless constitution might go in the matter of a moderate reform? “We would not scruple,” he says, “to take away the right of electing from several close and several decayed boroughs, and to give more members to several populous districts. The pecuniary qualifications of the electors ought, at the same time, to be somewhat raised, especially in the open boroughs; but, to compensate this, it ought to be estimated in the counties, as well as elsewhere, not merely by property or interest in land, but by property of all sorts, perhaps by the payment of taxes to a certain amount, paying a due tribute to the superior weight and respectability of the landed interest; and making the qualification lower for them than for other proprietors. Some regulations should also be adopted for avoiding the tumult and disorder which now disgrace our most popular elections, and which have inspired many worthy people with a general horror at the very name of a popular reform.” Much farther than this the deponent sayeth not; but he sayeth that such a moderate measure of reform would not materially touch the state of taxation or influence; that it would rather increase the aristocratical influence over the whole kingdom, instead of excluding from the House those who are now sent there by the interest of many noble families; and that if he thought it likely to produce an opposite effect, he should think it his duty to strive against it, as against a measure which would deprive us of all the practical blessings of our constitution.

When expressing such enlightened opinions as these now-a-days, moderate reformers are told to cease their “wretched gabble;” Mr Jeffrey has done so; and the Lord Advocate is not only willing, but anxious, to swallow the whole Bill!

Mr Jeffrey, during the course of these his various disquisitions, occasionally whispers such soft things into the ear of the Pensive Public as “We were always favourable to Parliamentary Reform.” “We have no great affection for rotten boroughs”—and so forth—as, if conscious of his own coldness or coolness, or at best lukewarmness in the cause, he wished to prevent that, if not suspicious, yet sagacious Lady from smoking, or say rather scenting the real state of his heart. If the Pensive Public, in the shape of Reform, were indeed his mistress, then never had mistress so “could-rifted” a lover—and we do not wonder that ere long she gave him his dismissal—sent him off with a flea in his ear—and told him never to look in her face more. Could his dull addresser, his chill embrace be the effect of infidelity? Shocking suspicion to cross the soul of fair Reform! Could he be dallying with some venal burgh? Or, horror of horrors! with some rotten wretch corrupt as the grave?

What else could Reform think on overhearing her false lover thus soliloquize! “The Borough representation is the next subject which claims our attention; but it is one of great difficulty, and requires much caution—not that the abuses in this part of the system are inconsiderable, or unfit for rigorous correction, but because they are mixed up with much that is good, as preventing greater evils, and because the sudden and complete alteration of this branch of the representation, by bringing it back to its first principles, is an experiment of vast difficulty and hazard, and ought, therefore, to be postponed until a beginning of Reform has been made on points where the evil is more unmingled with good, and the remedy more certain and safe. To take only a single example,—No man can deny that it would be highly impolitic to throw open all the boroughs in which the right of voting at present belongs to certain parts of the population. No man of common sense would wish to see the worst description of boroughs multiplied, in which from two to five hundred inhabitants have votes—boroughs which are too large to be in the quiet possession of a single great family, but not too large to be contested by men of ready-money influence—boroughs which are, for this reason, the very sinks of every species of corruption—yet it would be a very violent proceeding to disfranchise the places of this size where corporations elect, and to transfer their rights to certain large towns not now represented. It would also introduce into Parliament a different class of electors. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that a gradual extinction of the worst borough franchises, by the voluntary surrender of their existing rights for a valuable consideration, and a transference of their right of election to such large towns as Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and Sheffield, and to such of the large counties as send too few representatives—for instance Yorkshire and Lancashire—would be a most valuable improvement in the representation.”

“A wise and prudent statesman,” continues this Whig, “would stop at this point, and be satisfied with going thus far.” But where are these wise and prudent statesmen now? That a bill constructed on such principles as these would be brought before the consideration of the House, Sir Richard Vyvyan pledged himself, nor could Sir Robert Peel have refused it his support; but no! nothing would satisfy a Whig ministry, among whose officials is the very man who wrote that passage, and other men, who, up to the day they became so, stood pledged to the same principles, but a bill which not only holds them all at defiance, but violates them all, and gives them to the four winds.

Between the 1810 and the 1816, several articles on Parliamentary Reform appeared in the Edinburgh Review—and in one of these—on Wyndham’s speeches—an article written with great talent and eloquence—and seemingly a joint production of Jeffrey and Brougham—in mental powers par nobile fratrum—a more vigorous onset is made upon borough representation than either before or since in that powerful periodical. But about the 1816, the minds of the conductors began to waver on Reform—there is first a timid eating, and then a bold bolting of words, and the Deacons would be amazed at the impidity and activity with which their idol turns his back on himself, in a style far superior to any exploit of the kind ever commemorated by the Irish eloquence of Lord Castlereagh. They seem to have feared that in the article on Wyndham they had pushed their principles of Reform by much too far for their patriotism or their prudence; and that constitution of parliament which they had there calumniated, seem, restored to its pristine purity and original lustre. “To perform its duty to the public, the House of Commons ought to be so constituted as to give its members a common interest and fellow feeling with every part of the kingdom, and with every class and description of persons in the community. No one should be aggrieved or oppressed without finding a defender in that assembly. No interest, however small or local, should be overlooked or neglected, for want of an advocate. No measure should be adopted without weighing maturely not only the general good it may produce, but the partial evil it may occasion. When conflicting interests are opposed, a fair hearing should be given to all, before any decision is formed. When relief is wanted, or redress petitioned for, there should be some one present to recommend the one, or enforce the other. In these respects there is little to complain of in the composition of the House of Commons. There is no part of the kingdom which does not send members to Parliament. The numbers, it is true, from different counties, bear no proportion to their respective wealth or population; but no one seriously believes, that because Cornwall has more members than Yorkshire, the interests of Cornwall are better attended to in Parliament than the interests of Yorkshire. There is no class of the community that does not find in the House of Commons persons disposed to assert its rights, and maintain its interests. The poor, as well as the rich, have their representatives. The members for Westminster, and other large towns, where the right of suffrage is in the householders, are the virtual representatives of the lower orders throughout the kingdom. When a poor and oppressed man presents his petition to the House of Commons, through the member for Westminster, he intrusts his cause to the zeal and exertions of one who is returned to Parliament by men of the same rank and condition with himself. The inequality of our representation has this advantage, that, where religious bigotry interferes not, there is no description of persons in England, not dependent on alms for their subsistence, who are altogether destitute of political power. No regular system, except universal suffrage, could give us this species of excellence."

A Parliament so constituted as this, and so conducting itself, who, in their sound seven senses, would dream of subjecting to any experimental Reform? It seems to approach as near perfection as any imaginable model of earthly mould. Accordingly, its judicious eulogist, in the Edinburgh Review, though sorely dissatisfied with the Ministry, who, one year before he wrote, had, in opposition to the patriotic hopes and fears of the Bonaparte-bitten Whigs, sent a British army to the Netherlands, that settled the affairs of Europe, by the battle of Waterloo,

"Just hints a fault and hesitates dislike" of some trifling matters, to the removal or abatement of which he seems as nearly indifferent as a person of the Whig persuasion, and belonging to a party long out of place, can reasonably be expected to be to any thing rejoiced in by triumphant Tories. Our friend, after some very general proposals of plans whereby to diminish the power of the Crown, the old bear, bugbear, or bugaboo that used to keep perpetually prowling through this Periodical, says,— "We hesitate about proceeding farther;" and then very frankly admits, that "Parliamentary reform has never been popular in this country." In 1780, retrenchment, not reform, was the cry;—in 1792, men of rank and property feared and abhorred the very name, as well they might; "and at present, (1816,) as far as we can judge, it has still fewer supporters of weight and consequence, than at any former period." In the midst of this universal apathy, which he condemns not, or but gently reproveth, our friend shews himself so very moderate a reformer, that were he to speak so now, the Sun would cry, "a borough-monger, a borough-monger!" and, should no merchant-ship be sailing to Van Dieman's Land, nor transport to Botany Bay, propose ridding the island of him, by flinging the monster into the sea. Unworthy of breathing the air of a country long enslaved, but now about to be free, must the man be, who only some dozen years ago, was such a wretch as publicly to utter this shocking sentiment, even in a Whig publication—"We must begin by stating, that we are under no apprehension from the influence of Peers in returning members to the Commons!" In our county representation he knows no practical defect but the great size of the counties, and consequent expense of contested elections, and proposes therefore to diminish the size, and increase their numbers. Some, he says, have recommended the extension of the elective franchise to copyholders, but that, he thinks, would only multiply the number of voters, and increase the expense of elections. With the representation of towns having more than five hundred resident voters, he has no fault to find, except with the non-resident voters. Of the representation of towns having less than five hundred resident voters, he thinks unfavourably; and as in the instances of Shoreham and Cricklade, the boroughs were disfranchised, by act of Parliament, on account of illegal practices, and thrown the one into the rape of Bramber and the other into the adjacent hundreds—so he would recommend the extension of that principle to all boroughs of that description, where the election had been vacated under the Grenville Act, on the ground of bribery and corruption, proved against a majority or large proportion of the electors. But instead of throwing the seats into the adjoining hundreds, he would recommend transferring them to the larger counties, which would at once increase the county representation, and enable us to remedy the only defect in our present county elections. And the electors of the disfranchised boroughs, who were not disqualified by their participation in acts of bribery, might be declared freeholders of the county. Against these close boroughs, the members of which are returned by one or two individuals, without assistance from government, and without the risk of an election, although the strongest prejudices prevail, he is far from considering them the worst parts of our representative system. Nay, he pronounces on them a high panegyric. "The members of close boroughs are often the men of greatest talent and independence in the House. There is one advantage attending their situation, which belongs to no other description of persons. Firmness to oppose the people is sometimes as necessary a quality as independence to resist the crown. But the members of close boroughs are the only persons in the House who stand in awe neither of the crown nor of the people. * * * * If the lists of the House of Commons for the last forty years were consulted, we should find that a large proportion of the steadiest advocates of the people have been members for close boroughs." Yet, in a conversational debate about the Irish Bill, the Lord Advocate, in the face of the above incontrovertible sentence, had the imprudence, impropriety, and presumption to say of the self-same persons, "Is it not true, that the representatives of these boroughs have been sent here, like Knights Templars in disguise, to advocate the views of those who sent them here? Have they not almost invariably been the concealed champions of aristocracy?" For party purposes, how pitiable here is this glaring inconsistency and glaring contradiction. Yet was Mr Jeffrey's former opinion just? Not a doubt of it—and yet Mr Macauley—who is always puerile—tried to pass off on the House an argument against this part of the present system, which, however witty it might have sounded there, looks here the most childish of jests. "Every system of government that can be devised has its happy accidents—men of great ability come into power under every system—and I have no doubt that, if it were determined that the representation of the people should be confined to the hundred tallest men in the country, some of them would be found to be men excelling in qualifications for their functions. If the first one hundred names in the Court Guide were chosen for that purpose, or if one hundred gentlemen of tawny complexion were selected, the same thing would occur; and these happy accidents would form quite as just a ground for preferring any of these modes of election as the one to which I am alluding does for the present." How vastly clever! Mr Shiel much admired this reasoning: "The answer given by the member for Calne is a strong one." And then himself exclaimed, "Who are those that press round the backdoors of Parliament? How few are the statesmen, orators, political economists, compared with those by whom they are surrounded! I admit that a splendid catalogue, and emblazoned muster-roll of genius has been produced by the advocates of the borough system. Mark, however, over what a vast space they were dispersed—in how black a firmament they sparkle!" The Lord Advocate follows Mr Shiel on the same side, but rather prosily—though any prose or prosiness is preferable, surely, to such poetry as the above about the black firmament. "The right honourable baronet (Sir Robert Peel) looked back through a period of fifty or sixty years, and he found in the list of those who had been returned from a great number of places during that time, about twenty or thirty talented and great men. Now, I must say it appears to me, that, considering how many individuals these places returned in the course of fifty or sixty years, the quantity of talent was not so very great." This is either a shallow sophism or a weak misapprehension. Sir Robert Peel took the names of almost all the celebrated men in the annals of Parliament, and asked, whence came they? From close boroughs. Three-fourths of them, at least, and more, from close boroughs—one-fourth, or less, from populous counties—that is all. The fact is the argument—and the argument stands fast, in spite of Mr Macauley's blacks and tawneys—Mr Shiel's splendid muster-roll of genius dispersed over a vast space of black firmament—and the Lord Advocate's silly assertion that Sir Robert Peel had "picked out a few illustrious men who happened to come into the House from close boroughs!"

True, that twenty or thirty illustrious men are but few, my Lord Advocate, in proportion to the many thousand snuffs that have grumbled in that House, or lain asleep on the benches like swine in styes. But still fewer are they in proportion to the many hundred thousand million men who come and go out of existence, without ever being heard of out of the street in which, like good Tories, they fear God and honour the King, or, like wicked Whigs, do neither, but keep bellowing—a few millions of them at least—periodically on Parliamentary Reform. Small, alas! is the number of illustrious men that sit, stand, lie, walk, canter, or gallop, either for close boroughs, open counties, or any other spot on this our earth. But that close boroughs should have sent forth some score or so of such characters—while the whole country, with all its counties, cannot shew—during the same time—another half dozen, we must continue to think either creditable to close boroughs, or a mystery and miracle to be believed in by faith, not understood by reason—though we admit that a man of talents may be as tawny as Lord Durham himself, and—though neither the Lord Advocate, nor Mr Macaulay, nor Mr Stiel, be so—six feet high without his shoes, and a member of the Club.

The “stream of tendency” in this channel, so beautifully overhung with Blue and Yellow banks, has, we have seen, hitherto flowed with a gentle current towards moderate reform. Some parking shallows—some calm for flat dull deeps—some waterfalls making a pleasant din, and a pretty mist across which came the not unfrequent rainbow—but no great periodical risings, as of the Nile—no capricious floods from the mountains of the moon—no spates with a blue fresh invading the foamy saltiness of the sea. Nay, summer-drought drunk it sometimes almost dry, to the discomfort or death of the minnows; while some huge reformer, “wallowing unwieldily, enormous in his gait,” was seen plunging like a porpus in some pool, his posterior praying as it were for the knout with their e profunda clamati. Thus, in an article on universal suffrage—in the December number 1818—which tickles the tobys of the Burdettites, the Benthamites, and the Bedlamites, an ingenious disciple of the moderate school, under the tuition of Head Master Jeffrey, prefers the prevalent principle of our representation to any “uniform right of suffrage” that could be imagined—that of £10 householders included. His reasons he says, are shortly these,—“Every uniform system which seriously differs from universal suffrage must be founded on such a qualification as to take away the elective franchise from those portions of the inferior classes who now enjoy it. The only reasonable ground on which an uniform qualification of property could be founded, would be its tendency to secure the independence of the voter; but it is evident that such a principle, if pursued to its proper consequences, would disfranchise great multitudes of the present electors. After what we have already said on the general subject of representation, it is needless for us to add that we should consider such a disfranchisement as a most pernicious mutilation of the representative system.”

Mark that, ye Eleven Deacons—and ye Twenty Thousand Signatures. Lo! the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland, the Man of the People—nay, their idol—assisting an unprincipled Ministry to bring in a bill which in his own opinion (why changed?) perpetrates “a most pernicious mutilation of the representative system.” Such wickedness, if unrepentant, may not go unpunished even on this side of the grave.

But the Reviewer has other objections to “uniformity.” “It exposes,” says he, “the difference between the prosperous and the indigent in a way offensive and degrading to the feelings of the latter;” and he says truly that no system can be other than a very bad one “which thrusts forward the qualification of property in its undigested state, thereby teaching the people too exclusive a regard for wealth.” We perceive from the newspapers, that all £10 a-year householders are, by the Bill, to be given “their right” to vote for their own member; pray, why duth it take away “their right” from all below that rent? Do the children of the former come into the world with "L.10 voter" written in clear blue lines on the whites of their eyes? Of the latter with the melancholy word "Disfranchised?"

Come we now (in 1820) to the last elaborate Essay, we believe, in the Edinburgh, on the general question of Parliamentary Reform—the review of Lord J. Russell's speech in the House on the 14th December, 1819, for transferring the elective franchise from corrupt boroughs to unrepresented great towns. The same moderate measures of reform as before are here advocated—and Mr Jeffrey, or his mouthpiece, says, "it would be a gross deviation from those principles of prudence and expediency on which moderate reform is founded, if its partisans were unwilling, at a crisis like the present, to make some mutual sacrifices of opinion."

As far as Lord J. Russell's resolutions he is prepared to go—but no farther: and what are they? First, that it is expedient that all boroughs, in which gross and notorious bribery and corruption shall be found to prevail, shall cease to return members to serve in Parliament. Second, That it is expedient that the right of returning members to serve in Parliament, so taken from any borough which shall have been proved to have been guilty of bribery and corruption, should be given to some great towns, the population of which shall not be less than 15,000 souls; or to some of the largest counties.

On this scheme the Reviewer makes a few observations, which seem rather hostile to the Bill, and the whole Bill. For in the very first place he proposes "the immediate addition of twenty members to the House of Commons;" whereas, the majority who to other day prevented Ministers, for the time being, from taking away some sixty or so, have, by universal acclamation of the Reviewer's party, been carried to be the enemies of their country, and by that their vote for ever held disqualified for sitting in a legislative or deliberative assembly of free men.

Secondly, the Reviewer shews by a long historical induction of facts, that his proposed reform is agreeable to the ancient practice of the constitution; to wit, to transfer the elective franchise from one place to another, under wise regulations, and only in cases of convicted corruption. And he adds, "No man who adopts this reform, is bound by just inference to support other changes, not warranted by the practice of the constitution."

So sensible is the Reviewer here—whether Mr Jeffrey or his mouthpiece—that his doctrine will not please "the Reformers," that he says, "some may perhaps wonder that disfranchisement is so strictly limited to the cases in which corruption has been proved." All such cause of wonder is swept away by the Bill; and we most earnestly direct the attention not only of the eleven Deacons, and the seventeen thousand signatures, and the thirty-two thousand petitioners, and the one hundred and forty thousand "inhabitants" and "citizens" of Modern Athens, but the two and a half millions of the nation of gentlemen, the Scotch—and also the twelve millions of the nation of—(what without offence shall we call them?)—the English—to these arguments against the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, which Mr Jeffrey held to be conclusive, and which we will thank the Lord Advocate to answer, or any other moderate reformer, metamorphosed into a radical by the mighty magic not obscurely storied of in many demonologies.

Mr Jeffrey, or his moderate mouthpiece, has been telling us that the plan of Mr Pitt proposed to purchase the elective privilege from fifty of the more inconsiderable boroughs who should be willing to part with it—a plan, which, in a previous article, is called "wicked and profligate!" And then he mentions the plan of "Mr Lambton, a gentleman equally respectable for character, talents, and public principle, which proposes to abolish all corrupt, decayed, and dependent boroughs." This plan, out of courtesy to the living Lambton, which there was no reason he should shew to the dead Pitt, he does not call "wicked, profligate," and thin; but he says, "it will be sufficient, for the present purpose, very shortly to state one or two of the numerous objections which present themselves to those more extensive plans." Now, this more extensive plan is neither more nor less than the very grand measure itself, "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill!" Here they are—the one or two of the numerous objections—in themselves a host.

"In the first place, no such disfranchisement is known to the practice, or even the principles, of the British Constitution. It has often bestowed the elective franchise on grounds of general utility; but it has never, on such grounds alone, taken that franchise away. All political questions, indeed, are to be determined on the principles of utility. But it is very useful to a free commonwealth to adhere to its fundamental institutions; and whenever a substantial reform can be effected, agreeably to their principles, it is generally unwise, for the sake of quicker reformation, to act on maxims hitherto untried. The reform here proposed, (see the Review), is limited by the practice of the English constitution. It proposes nothing unauthorized by that practice, and it offers that security to all who adopt it, against its leading to consequences which cannot be foreseen or conjectured. The more extensive plan, on the other hand, quits the solid ground of the practice of the constitution, and ventures on the slippery path of general speculation. It necessarily appeals to principles, which, in the hands of other men, may become instruments of farther, and of boundless, alteration. Secondly, we doubt whether the caution hitherto observed in this respect, be not founded on true wisdom. It is the policy of a free state to keep up the importance and dignity of popular privileges. The right of election, the first of them all, ought to be held high. The body of electors ought to be considered as a sort of nobility, from which the members are not to be too easily degraded. As a monarchy and aristocracy have their splendour, so democracy has its own peculiar dignity, which is chiefly displayed in the exercise of this great right. There is something, in our opinion, truly republican in the policy which places the elective franchise and the royal dignity on the same footing, which secures both from being mere speculations of general convenience, and which pronounces the forfeiture of both, only where there is a gross and flagrant violation of the trust from which they are derived. Thirdly, it must be observed, that the power of disfranchisement is capable of great and dangerous abuse. The majority of a legislative body might employ it to perpetuate their own superiority, and to destroy every power that could withstand them. If the example were once set, of using it on mere grounds of convenience, it would be easy to find, on every occasion, plausible pretexts of that nature. As long as it is confined to cases of delinquency, it cannot be so abused; but if it were once freed from that restraint, it would become unlimited, or, in other words, despotic."

So much for the Body of our article—the Head you will find upon its shoulders—and now for the Tail.

The "inhabitants," the "citizens" of Edinburgh declared to a man, woman, and child, through the Eleven Deacons, the seventeen thousand signatures, and other public organs, that they must have "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." Very well. Let them have it. But, not contented with the Bill, the greedy dogs (we go no farther) must also have "the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate of Scotland," for their member;—and why? Because they swear that he has ever been the bosom-friend of Reform, and has undertaken, as accoucheur, to deliver her of the Bill. The teeming nation is near her time, and from her bulk you may back her for tris. Yes!—she will, to a certainty, produce three chopping Bills. But will the expecting grey-headed sire trust his pregnant consort in the hands of a man, who, through the long space of twenty revolving years, so far from ever having promised to deliver her, has been publicly threatening, if ever Reform should conceive, and his obstetrical services be called in, to strangle her Bills in the birth—all her three pretty little Bills "at one fell swoop," and leave her like Rachel in Ramah heard weeping for her children?

Let us try to be serious. Suppose on the day of the Edinburgh election, the Seventeen hundred, through Mr Blackwood, their spokesman, asked the Lord Advocate, "if he would pledge himself to support, with all his might and main, that moderate reform, away from which though he had once rather averted his face, he had afterwards made amends for that cold disfavour, by promoting its cause in many elaborate articles for twenty years—and to continue to the end of life that unflinching hostility to 'the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill,' which he had persevered in, through good report and through bad report, all through the prime of manhood, and well on to the verge of old age"—and what sort of a face, think ye, would his Lordship have put on and pulled in answer to the Baillie? Ask George Cruikshanks.

Lord Althorpe, we think it was, (his Lordship assuredly is no longer a boy,) who spoke of the "puerile vanity of consistency!" Now, a greater than Lord Althorpe—plain William Wordsworth—has said, that "The boy is father of the man."

And I would wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety."

This is good poetry—good philosophy—but it seems bad politics. There, the consistent boy should beget an inconsistent father; or rather, the old boy should give the young one not only a long lecture, but a sound licking, for daring to fling in his face puerilities that he has long outgrown, a face once made of blushes, but now of brass—once bright as morn with "the liquid dew" of candour and consistency, now black as night with shifting shadows, through which break at times, struggling like drowned starlight, a few fitful gleams of truth "seen but by glimpses." "The times are out of joint," when a respectable dull man like Lord Althorpe on political apostacy attempts to be jocular.

Mr Jeffrey is "in wit a man;" and, in spite of Lord Althorpe's sneer, would that he were likewise "in simplicity a child;" for, with all due deference to the House of Spencer, there is not one puerility—but there are many puerilities; and better even after your time to be an infant, than before it a dotard. Men of genius, and great talents, and integrity, like the Lord Advocate, cannot change their opinions at will—no, not in spite of their tongue and their teeth; for their brain keeps them to its convictions, and so does their conscience. There is no need for us to tie his Lordship down to the opinions of the boldest, and brightest, and maturest period of a man's life—that between his 25th and his 35th year; for were he to struggle as madly as a bed-ridden lameter to leave a house on fire, to get free from the thousand invisible bonds of thought and feeling that have been gathering about his heart and understanding during all that long time, never, never, could he break away from their bondage. His party came into power—and they could not do without him in Scotland. To that eminent situation he was called; for it was due to his character, and allotted to him by the voice of his country; nor could he, however reluctant, decline the service and the honour. His acceptance was due—if to no other—to the friend of his brilliant prime—personal, philosophic, and political—Lord Brougham. He must support the men and their measures. And that he does so, is a proof, no doubt, that he has brought himself to see, or to think he sees, the Bill in a less disastrous light than, judging from all his opinions in the past, one would have believed possible; but it is no proof (nor can this world, or this life afford one) that he has deserted the doctrines he espoused in his prime of youth, and was faithful to through his manhood, "even to the very time he did not bid me tell it."

But whatever the radical reformer may say to this, and even had the Lord Advocate thrown off his old opinions and put on new—old opinions, allow us to say, are not like old clothes, the worse, but they are almost always the better for wear. So there lies his Lordship's cast-off suit, if no longer fashionable, yet to our classical taste, which tries all things by an invariable standard, fit alike for Parliament or parlour, and more becomingly exhibiting the light but vigorous and elegant proportions of his person, (we speak both literally and figuratively,) than that more gorgeous apparel, though frilled mayhap with lace, and formed of velvet, in which he attended the Lord Chancellor's levee, and in which, one of these days, he will probably be attending the levee of the most gracious of all Whig-worshipped kings.

Hundreds of thousands of persons, now reformers to the utmost extent of the bill, and indeed to any extent that the ministers might have chosen to go, went along with the anti-reform or moderate reform opinions and arguments of Mr Jeffrey during upwards of twenty years; and now, at Lord Brougham's bidding and his, they have made—not a wheel—not a gradual Scotch reel—but a sharp turn about on the heel, with one shout "The Bill, the Bill!" Now, we ask these noisy persons, who have answered the arguments and set aside the opinions that, during these twenty or thirty years, usurped the seat of their understandings—Certainly not the Lord Advocate; for though his speech on reform in Parliament was a pleasant speech, and also not unphilosophical, it bore but lightly indeed on the Bill, and would have been every whit equally as suitable an enlogium on any or either of a hundred imaginable moderate reform bills. If it touched at all on "Principles or Details," it was with the touch of a feather. Indeed the best passage in it was little more than a résumé of several passages in old numbers of the Blue and Yellow, that had originally been indited for a different purpose, and it merely went to shew that as the whole framework of society was now wonderfully changed, and expanded by wealth and knowledge, so ought the constitution of Government and the system of representation. Sir John Walsh has some fine reflections on this part of the Lord Advocate's speech—which his Lordship must himself admire, but which are far above the comprehension of ninety-nine in a hundred who are now blustering about the Bill.

Another view of this subject, a very ingenious and striking view of it, was brought forward by the Lord Advocate. It is, perhaps, somewhat too abstract and philosophical in its nature, to be exactly adapted to the House of Commons, and would be better suited to a literary essay. His theory appeared to be, that we are now arriving at an epoch of great change, that one of those mighty crises which occur in the history of civilisation is at hand. Society, it is declared, is now in a state of transition, it has out-grown the institutions which were sufficient for its earlier days, it has wants and desires which are irrepressible, it is moving in a course which we may guide, but which we cannot arrest. We are supposed to be in a sort of chrysalis state, but undergoing that transformation which is to supply us with new wings, to soar to a yet higher pitch of prosperity and happiness. The whole of this argument may be true, and yet the Bill of Reform the worst possible, since the means adopted to facilitate the transition, may be far too violent and sudden. I object to the whole doctrine, it applied to justify a Government in effecting great and immediate changes in national institutions. I can only subscribe to it as a ground of gentle and gradual modification. It may be a curious speculation of moral philosophy in the closet, to trace this working of a new spirit in the human race and to measure the chances of its fermentation, eventually producing some great and novel benefits to mankind. But I contend that our faculties are too finite, and our experience too limited, to allow of practically shaping our course upon confused perceptions of an occult moral influence. The statesman is not justified in steering his course on such metaphysical abstractions.—He must cling to certainties.—Who, for example, is to calculate whether this shock of conflicting principles in Europe is to be succeeded by a new impulse of improvement, or whether it is to shake the whole social fabric, and throw us back into disorganization and anarchy? Such crises may be at hand, but if so, I have not philosophy enough to contemplate such a prospect without alarm; I am not sanguine enough to look at it with hope. History teaches us that these portentous periods, happily of rare occurrence, are, to those who live in them, periods of great suffering and calamity. Social order cannot take an entirely new form, without wrecking the happiness of a whole generation in its fearful change. It, indeed, one of these great mortal convulsions is at hand, we cannot hope to avert its progress. It belongs to greater wisdom to foresee, to greater power to direct its terrible course. We all hope for happiness beyond the grave, yet we recoil at the prospect of that dread change with instinctive horror and avoidance. The night of revolution may be succeeded by a bright aurora of prosperity and happiness, but it is beyond our ken, and probably it will never dawn to us. The very insufficiency of our faculties to calculate such stupendous results, renders it our plain duty, our clear interest, to avert such trials, if they can be averted by prudence, by temper, by policy, or by courage."

But though the opinions sworn to for twenty or thirty years have been all flung aside, or forgotten, by the serviles who never understood them; no change has taken place anywhere but in the jumble in their brains. The opinions, as we said, are as good as ever, and most of them—are ours.

The truth is that an opinion—common name of an idea—is a strange thing. Seemingly sometimes changeable in its colours as the chameleon, it is yet all one as the unchanging blue of its native sky. Your eye is in fault—and there is blame too, perhaps, in your position. Nay, who knows but you squint, and are positively in the jaundice? Poor miserable crooked and yellow political opinion! You look at it superciliously, askance, and adumic, and the world wonders at the elevation of your eyebrows, the misdirection of your eyes, and the dilation of your nostrils. You kick it from you as it is lying inoffensively in your path, or trample it under your feet, as a weed or a worm. But "igneus est olli virtus et celestis origo?" what you thought a crushed weed, springs upwards unharmed from your heel "a bright consummate flower"—what you thought a writhing worm, (and even if it were, oh! why did you tread on it?) was in truth a wing-folded bird, that up into the sun-light that shines not for such children of the dust as he who knew not its simple plumage, soars singing to Heaven's gate, and disappearing therein, mingles its hymn with those of the immortal choir.

But, to "descend from these imaginative heights," will the people who work the press, consider for a moment what they are doing, in heaping such loads of hardly-human abuse on the heads of all moderate reformers? What worse are we than was Mr Jeffrey—for example—was, every night and day of his life, between the 1800 and 1830? Do you, gentlemen of the ink press, if not of the wine, look back with disgust and anger on all the past life of that distinguished person? Had he been cut short in his career before the Bill arose to enlighten the Bar, had his miserable soul, think ye! been for ever lost? And what! if the new-light hath not yet dawned upon Maga, and other frail sisters—nor on Christopher, and other frail brothers—remember that, "Though many are called, few are chosen;" and that though forgiveness is in the power of all men, to a few only belongs conversion.

Praise ye then the Bill, the whole Bill—(Heaven forbid we should add, nothing but the Bill!)—and we as lustily shall abuse it with a corresponding deprecation. Let the groundwork of our article be—argument, and the mere ornaments, vituperation; and we care not, then, what figure you make of us—nor we hope, in our hands, need you—though we should seem mutually to make mouths at one another, like a brace of Franksteins designed by Mrs Shelly, and wrought in worsted by Miss Linwood.

Say not that we are Satan reproving Sin. Compare our vilest abuse of the most blackguard even of the Billmen, with yours of many of the most respectable, and some of the most illustrious, of our Men-at-arms, and ours will absolutely appear pænezyrical. Every man, young or old, that opened his mouth in the House against the measure, was, while on his legs at least, and generally ever since he sat down, in all the London newspapers, except two, a distinguished idiot, a fool likely one day to be famous, or a knave worthy of being known across the most distant seas. This is surely de trop—an unseemly neglect of the ne quid nimis—and will yet, we trust, so sicken the country of all violent reformers, as to impel her to throw them from her stomach.

Suppose we give you some instances of what we mean—not the first that come to hand—for these are shocking—but two or three of a slighter sort, where the abuse on their part, though gross, was not intolerable. No. Even these are disgusting—so, with a very few remarks, let us hasten to our end.

Mr Horace Twiss is a very respectable man, and a man of very excellent abilities; and that is no high-flown eulogium, surely, on one who was once in office—not, indeed, under Lord Grey—but the Duke of Wellington. Well, then—Mr Horace Twiss, being of opinion that L.10 was too low a qualification for the elective franchise among householders, was so presumptuous as absolutely to rise up in the House, and, among other matters, to say so—not sparing to give calm utterance to what seems to us a self-evident truth, “that a large portion of them must be men of narrow habits, scanty information, and strong prejudices—little shopkeepers, and small attorneys”—and others, of whom the author of Ecclesiasticus, he truly added, had no higher opinion, as public counsellors, than himself, who was not the son of Sirach. Now, such gentlemen as think, in opposition to Mr Horace Twiss and the author of Ecclesiasticus, that little shopkeepers and small attorneys are, for the most part, men of wide habits, full information, and weak prejudices, ought assuredly to say so—but not with a loud voice, and “visage all inflamed”—neither should they have abused the ex-secretary like a gang of pickpockets. Why, the most important point about the whole bill is the character of the L.10-a-year householders—and if not a single syllable must be said in detracton from their high merits, why any debate? Pass the bill, and by vote by ballot—that we may all be wiser.

Lord Wharncliffe had no disposition to dishonour those classes of persons who pay L.10 rent for their houses, but he found, on enquiry, that, in large towns, and in the neighbourhood of London, from which sixteen additional members are to be sent to a Reformed Parliament, there were few houses indeed under that rent. And if you add to the L.10 householders in Mary-le-bone, Pancras, and other parishes in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, the same class of householders in the extensive villages of Greenwich and Woolwich, you will have a constituency enormous beyond all calculation.

Are all men there likely, then, to be enlightened electors? and does the bill amount in many large districts to universal suffrage?

Sir John Walsh is not a man—is he?—to be abused and sneered at—and, what says he about the L.10 householders, and others of their class? Why, he says this—“I admit, and admit with that pleasure with which I shall ever observe the real improvement of my country, that a great advance has been made of late years, in the acquirement of knowledge, and in the mental cultivation of a considerable portion of those ranks. Among the opulent shopkeepers in London, among the respectable retail dealers in the provincial towns, among the superior class of yeomen and farmers, I have met very generally a degree of intelligence and information not merely confined to their own business, but embracing a more extensive range. I have observed a facility of language, and a propriety and correctness of thought, which denoted a considerable share of education and refinement. If these persons really have a very eager desire to possess votes for the return of members to Parliament, I should certainly not be inclined to throw any obstacle in their way. But I contend that Ministers have, in their measure, exercised no discrimination. The qualification Ministers have adopted will have the effect of introducing, not the intelligent and educated portion of the middle ranks alone, but a vast majority very differently endowed. I am sure that to no portion of the community would this measure be practically more unsatisfactory than to the valuable part of the middle classes, who would be thus confounded with those so much their inferiors both in attainments, property, and station in society.”

The Lord Advocate, to be sure, drew a picture of L.10 a-year household life in great towns and cities, exhibiting something like the relics of the golden age. Alas! his lordship's fancy was too poetical—and the records of the Sheriff-court in Glasgow, for example, and the statistical enquiries of Mr Cleland, (see article on the French Revolution and Parliamentary Reform,) will convince him that he was dreaming of an Utopia. Then, his lordship said, that such tenants would always be most happy to oblige their landlords by voting with them in all cases where a legitimate influence lay with the landlords. Sir Robert Peel, in a few words, dispelled that delusion—in which his lordship seems to be, in this provision of the bill, increase of the power of the aristocracy. In times of political quiet perhaps it might be as he said; but how—now? or during any similar storm?

But we are leaving the subject, we fear, a few inches; all we meant now to say was, that neither Mr Horace Twiss, nor any one else on his side of the House, said a syllable that was not true, about those said “middle orders”—and that the savage worry in which he and others, who uttered the same truths, found themselves involved for weeks, was disgraceful even to the canine and canine that waged it. Why, the Lord Advocate himself—a few years ago in the Edinburgh Review—wrote a severer truth of these “same middle orders,” which in the House he so beautifully eulogized. “It unfortunately happens, that this sound and pure body have more to hope from the favour of government than any other part of the nation. The higher class may, if they please, be independent of its influence; the lower are almost below its direct action; upon the middling classes it acts with concentrated and unbroken force.” True or not, this opinion is not very reconcilable with his Lordship’s enthusiastic delight in his ten-pounders. They ought immediately to be discharged.

But why do not the Ministers, who build their bill on the character of the middle orders, as on a foundation, explain to us the virtues—and the vices, if indeed they have any—of that character? Simply because they know nothing about it. “I confess,” says Sir John Walsh, “it appears to me that they have the very loosest and most inaccurate ideas of those orders, for whom they profess so profound a respect. It is not wonderful, that, contemplating this division of society from the lofty eminence of their aristocratic elevation, many shades and gradations in it should have escaped them, quite apparent to nearer observers. The liberality of the great leaders of the Whigs has ever been of a peculiarly abstract and speculative character, dealing much in generals, but little marked by any unusual affability or urbanity of demeanour, or by any attraction of social or friendly intercourse with less distinguished ranks.”

Most true indeed; and it is as creditable to Sir John’s temper as to his talents, to be able to speak so mildly of this part of the universal Whig character. Even the very meanest-born among them are as proud of their birth as so many little loathsome lucifers. Or if not proud, worse—ashamed; and they hang down their heads before those who may accidentally have discovered that they were “drab-delivered in a ditch,” or whelped in a kennel. But of the Whig-magnates of the land, the pride of person and of place, as well as of birth, is so monstrous, that sometimes they seem, as they pass mere mortals by, like maniacs concealing themselves to be each the angel Michael. Even the few men of high mental endowments they have ever had among them, held their heads absurdly high after this fashion; and so likewise—if after no other—did the women. Charles Fox himself—kind-hearted as he was—and having in the article of birth so very little to be proud of—except about election-time, held aloof in hauteur from his greasy constituents—nor was there on earth one more ignorant of the common character and ordinary goings of middle or lower life than the Man of the People. Nor much knew of her fellow-creatures, out of her own high circle, the beautiful and lovely Devonshire, although once she kissed a butcher.

Eulogiums, then, from Whig lords and lordlings, come with a bad grace and a good guffaw, on the character of the “middle orders.” They have not among them all the tenth-part of an idea of what is the meaning of these two words. Nor is their ignorance without excuse; for besides the disadvantage of the seclusion of their own estate, they have this difficulty to encounter on coming to the consideration of the subject—that it is most various and complex—and including—which many others as well as they do not seem to be aware of—many differences of character and of condition, all absurdly slumped together into one undistinguishable mass of confusion—under the undefinable terms—"middle orders."

Why, in some countries, it is said lamentingly, by philanthropists hopeless of revolution, that there are, alas! no middle orders—as in Spain. That is not altogether true; but we shall suppose it so, and what is the meaning of the sigh? Why, that there is a nobility and a mobility; or say rather a few thousand tyrants and a good many million slaves, with no "middle-order" between, no freemen. But the Bill is about Britain, and in Britain—in this sense—there is assuredly a mighty "middle order." As that most poetical of all political economists, James Ramsay MacCulloch, vaccinated the Scot, says of the gradation of rich and poor soils, in his illustration of the Andersonian doctrine of rent, that they run into each other "like the colours of the rainbow," so may we say, that in our favoured land thus blends into one Iris-like arch, of which King and Constitution are the key-stones—all classes of the nation. True, that this is but a simile—and that our population is not absolutely a rainbow. But the simile suffices for illustration of a great political truth. Attend now to this, we beseech you;—between the aristocracy, itself gorgeous with various colours, and the democracy, not without its lights and shadows too, there lies outspread at this moment before our eyes such another living landscape as tanks our hearts burn within us, and glory in being British-born. "These"—say we exultingly—"these are the middle orders—let them elect their own representatives—and, 'come against her all the world in arms,' no fears have we for the Isle of the Free!"

But stone-blind, or, which is worse, for utter gloom is not so dangerous as imperfect glimmer, rather purblind must those ministers be, who, looking in vain from the distant altitude of their own station, through a glass that, even to clear eyes, would show objects distorted as well as dimly—and in case of a not unlikely blunder by the unscientific, perhaps upside down—think they see the glorious middle orders of England in—the L. 10 householders!—and believe that the great interests of such a mighty, multiform, multifarious, and multitudinous society as ours can be wisely consulted, and happily promoted, and sacredly guarded by one arbitrarily-drawn line, which, as it sweeps along, cuts off in a thousand places the very best of those whom it was intended to include, and in as many places includes as many persons whom it was intended to cut off!

And this brings us to say a few words on one argument, (argument!) of most illustrious silliness, used by the weakest of the violent reformers, in proof of the bill being a good and safe bill (which all but the weakest of the violent reformers know it is not) for the aristocracy of the land. It must be so—one frequently hears the feeble fizz—"because all the most enlightened of the nobility are eager for the bill." And who are all the most enlightened of the nobility? Why, they who are eager for the bill—and because they are eager for the bill. A very simple and compendious process it is, whereby to settle a somewhat difficult political question, to assume that a lord is enlightened because he seems to admire a particular plan of Parliamentary reform; and then to assume that that particular plan of Parliamentary reform must therefore be most admirable—although, perhaps, the very lord, who is now lost in admiration thereof, a few months before, would, had he dreamed of its existence, have shuddered at it as a monstrum horrendum, informe, uterque, cui lumen ademptum, and for a dozen years before had been shouting, or rather squeaking for another bill, no more like it than an albino to a blackamoor. If this be not reasoning in a circle, then never saw we a turnspit in a wheel, nor in a cage a squirrel.

Sir John Walsh looks on this folly with the eye of a political philosopher. "If," says he, "we could find an adequate guarantee for the security of the constitution, in the great personal stake which the ministers, as individuals, have in its preservation, there can be no doubt that we might safely dismiss all anxiety upon the subject. The list of the cabinet is peculiarly and loftily aristocratic. Of fourteen members who compose it, ten are in the House of Lords. Of the four who are in the House of Commons, one is the heir-apparent of a wealthy and distinguished peerage, one an Irish peer, and one a baronet of very ancient family, and very extensive landed property. Nor do the other members of government present a less dignified catalogue of noble names. Every consolation which these circumstances can afford us, the certainty that, if they do not misconceive the consequences of their own measures, they will pay a fearful penalty for their error, we possess in a supreme degree. But we must take this comfort with some qualifications."

We must indeed. For, set aside the Canning party—whose reputation for ability is higher than for any thing else—and who do not appear to have had or to have much to say (interpret that as you will) on these measures—is not this not heaven-born but high-born ministry, as Sir John Walsh says, "totally inexperienced and untried in the management of state affairs?" Only think of the Budget! The same gentleman finely and truly says—"the qualities of mind, the habits, the description of talent, requisite to form a brilliant rôle in the ranks of an opposition, are very distinct from those necessary to a statesman administering the affairs of a great nation. There is a certain tact of government wholly different from the art of attack in debate. The present ministers have had no opportunity of acquiring this by the education of office, and they have not yet shown among them that native genius which would enable them to dispense with previous training. We have not, therefore, in addition to the assurance which their own state affords us, that confidence which in times of difficulty and danger we feel in seeing the powers of government wielded by hands of known and practised skill, directed by heads of true and experienced ability. There is often so much of recklessness and temerity in those born to great advantages and fortune, that I should much doubt whether in fact prudence would be most generally found in its possessors." Nothing can be more admirable; and suppose, then, that millions are astonished at what seems to them the dangerous audacity of reform, can their fears be allayed by any consideration of the hopes of a set of men who, though they have indeed much to lose in revolution, have neither been gifted by nature with any uncommon sagacity or foresight, nor instructed by experience in that high world-wisdom, without which statesmen must not think to lay even the hands of healing on the magnificent fabric of our constitution, even though it should seem to exhibit some few slight symptoms of time-worn decay.

But granting that each "Order" knows best its own interests—and generally speaking we should never dream of denying it—though as little will any rational mind deny that at times the judgment of each "order" is dismally darkened—we have not yet been able to bring ourselves to believe that the majority of those persons belonging to my Lord Grey's "order," who are as devoted as he to the preservation of its privileges, agree with him in seeing security to them in this all-providing Bill. We believe that the great majority of his "order" see in it alarming perils—and that hundreds as wise and as firm as he, in awe of the disastrous signs of great change now lowering on the horizon, fear that they who are now sowing the wind will reap the whirlwind.

Again—is this "order" alone, of all enlightened orders, the best judge of its own well-being? Is it wiser than—the church? The Church has declared its sense of the "scope and tendency" of this Reform—that it is fraught with the seeds of ruin. But Cambridge and Oxford are dim, dark places, that lie out of the day! Owl-eyed, moping monks alone haunt their cloisters. The universities are sacred to ignorance and superstition—the heads of colleges, in the march of intellect, behind the tails of pot-houses, and the bodies of mechanics' institutions, who lead the van of the age. Such is the insolent slang of the worthless legions of libellers and liars that, among the provisions of their darling Bill, grimly foresee, as they think, the overthrow of our church-establishment—of that "Church-of-Englandism," as it was christened by an old heathen, who, in his delirious dotage, has been long babbling at the head of the worse than rabble-~~out~~, the radical ring of Reform.

But much more might be said, with effect, on the folly of attributing all the wisdom resident in their "order" to the Seven Wise Men. On getting into office, the Ministers unasked—at least we do not remember that any body asked them—volunteered three pledges, Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform. The Lord Advocate, in one of his electioneering speeches, called them banners—and also stars. Retrenchment is a queer star, something like a farthing candle; the star of Reform about as big and bright as an oil-lamp before the use of gas—that of Peace, no doubt, is respectable, and though not much of an original, may pass in a crowd. As to banners, the only one that had any beauty in the eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, as he thought, the tricolor; whereas it turned out to be but a fancy-flag of some Spitalfields weavers. Retrenchment, it turned out, had been carried to its utmost by the Wellington Ministry; and these Whigs, less scrubby than they were esteemed by themselves and others, forthwith added to the Army and Navy Estimates, and refused to adopt the recommendations of that very committee for retrenchment of the Civil List, whose appointment had been the cause of their accession to power. As to peace, they illustrated the principle of non-intervention by a system of interference as various as unlucky; and an armament was on the very point of being dispatched by them to the Scheldt. We refer those who are not familiar with the Greatest Blunder of the Age, to an article in this number of Maga on their Budget. There they stood on the brink of being—over which they were about to be blown by the breath of a nation's ridicule. Their brazen countenances seemed scorn-proof; but their feeble bodies were staggering under the burden of derision. In this pitiable predicament, they clung for life to—the Bill. "In this very critical position," says Sir John Walsh, "they had no power to delay the Question of Reform, until they could procure for themselves and for the House the necessary returns and information; they had no choice between retirement, or proceeding to legislate upon this vital question, with the glimmering and uncertain lights of former documents, and extracted from the cobwebs of official Bureaux. We can make every allowance for the difficulties of their situation; but it was not less a matter of regret for the country, that a subject, involving its national existence, should not have had the good fortune to be brought forward by an Administration strong enough to be gentle, cautious, and deliberate. We are not reassured on entering this dangerous path, because we must tread it in the dark, and follow leaders who advance with the reeling, yet hurried steps of desperate weakness." As for Lord Dunham, he may very easily be a wiser man than he was when he framed the plan of Reform that fell under the castigation of the Edinburgh Review; but the plan itself being paper, does not improve in wisdom by age, nor like a winter pear, by lying on the floor of a garret. It is the same crude plan it was, when by the Lord Advocate "with spattering noise rejected;" yet now with avidity is it swallowed piecemeal by all the Ministers. Whatever fruit it be, it is not worth a plum—a green gage it certainly is not—nor yet a Magnum-bonum—nor should we be surprised were the Premier himself yet to choke on the stone. The Bill, at least, is not Brougham's Bill. But Brougham's Bill, was to be the delight of gods and men, children and old women; and how then happens it that a Bill, which is not only not Brougham's Bill, but a Bill which some ten years ago had his contempt and derision, should now be the Bill of all Bills, and pregnant with salvation? So much at present—and no more—for the embodied wisdom of the "Order."

'Is this, then, an aristocratical or a democratical Bill? And whatever it really be, what do ministers think it?

Let us hear the well-weighed and impartial opinion of Sir John Walsh, a man esteemed by all respectable parties, and allowed by them to be one of the most enlightened men of the age. His opinion may be thus stated partly in his words, and partly in our own:—

The first decided accession to the democratic influence is—the proposed destruction of fifty-eight or sixty members. The 168 seats which it is proposed to disfranchise, are filled by a class of members eminently attached to all the existing institutions of the country. And one of the best arguments in favour of close boroughs, he wisely says, in contradiction to the follies we have quoted above, is, that they afford a field, a noble one, for the fair play of intellect; and that a private gentleman has, through them, an opening to declare his honest convictions, without subservieney to the dictation of one peer, or of twenty thousand operatives. But be this as it may, the men who have filled the seats about to be disfranchised, have always been accused by their opponents of belonging to the conservatives. Well then, since 168 are to be taken away, and 108 or 110 added, there is a reduction of about a tenth of the whole House, and it is accomplished by a deduction to the whole amount of the difference, from the number of those members, who, whether in the ministerial or opposition sides, are, from their class and the tenure of their seats, likely to unite in defending the great institutions of the country.

The next accession to the democratic weight, in his opinion, arises from leaving so many flourishing towns of the second class with only one member, and adding only one member to several great manufacturing towns. He remarks, that that sort of compromise which now takes place very generally throughout the kingdom, between the influence of the upper classes resident in country towns, and the numerical majority of the lower—ending, for the most part, in each returning a member whose opinions assimilate to their own, is an arrangement which will be no longer practicable under the new Bill. For with but one member—in these all party spirit will be more violent, and there will be a struggle everywhere between what he calls, observingly, the aristocracy and democracy of the middle orders; and in the sixty-four boroughs which could, under the new arrangement, return one member only, a great preponderance would be given to the spirit of pure democracy.

The next element of democracy, pointed out by this calm and acute observer, is the transfer of the franchise to the large towns, chiefly manufacturing, in England, and to the great suburbs of London, in all 44; (recollect the statement respecting those suburbs we gave a few pages back from Lord Wharnccliffe, and which we see confirmed by that unconfirmed paper-voter the Courier, whose affection for L.10 householders doth fluctuate to and fro like the soap-suddy waves in a wash-hand basin,) in Scotland and Ireland 14 more; all these returned by electors, voting according to the very low rate of qualification fixed on, (whether it is to be adhered to or not, the Lord Advocate, in his late letter, sayeth not, because he knoweth not, although in a postscript, always the most important part of a letter to or from a lady, he tells the Pensive Public that circumstances had occurred, since he concluded the main body of his epistle, to confirm him in the belief that no alteration is to be made—or, as we should say in his ignorance on the only point on which the Pensive Public required any elucidation of his bill,) and you get another tenth of the House added to the democratic scale, or elected by voters on whom no aristocratic or permanent influence of any kind can be supposed to exist. Add to all this the throwing open the right of voting, from the corporations to the L.10 householders, in towns like Bath, Bury St Edmunds, &c., which is of course another transfer of power to the democracy, exactly equivalent to that of a close borough to a large town—and in counties the weight—not inconsiderable—thrown into the popular scale by copyholders and leaseholders; and who, after examining and enumerating all these additions to the democratic influence in the state, direct or indirect, will not agree with Sir John Walsh, that the change in our Government is even more vast and comprehensive than at first view we should have been led to suppose?

Why—the Lord Advocate himself—the man of the people—never dreamed, in his fairest visions of reform, of any such victory as this won by his democratic constituents. “The first article in a wise plan of reformation, would be, in our opinion, the immediate addition of twenty members to the House of Commons, to be chosen by the most opulent and populous of the communities which are at present without representation."—(Edinburgh Review, November 1820.)—Nor think, he said, that though, in point of mere numbers, this is but an inconsiderable addition—that there are not other circumstances in these cases more important than numbers. For he adds well, "twenty members of popular talents and character, representing the most populous districts in England, and depending for their seats on popular favour, would greatly strengthen the democratical principles in the House of Commons," and yet his Lordship tells us—not with a grave, but a bright face—that 'tis an aristocratical Bill! So much for the present for the democratical features of this Bill—now for the aristocratical—as painted by the unexaggerating pencil of Sir John Walsh.

First, on the line of disfranchisement which it has adopted with reference to the population and size of towns, there may, perhaps, be said to be rather a reservation of some portion of the existing influence of the Aristocracy, than any addition to it. It can only, he remarks, add to it, in a few cases, where a numerous body of non-resident freemen are exchanged for a smaller and more manageable set of L.10 householders. Now, a large number of the boroughs will consist of towns containing—say—three hundred L.10 householders—or made up to that number by the neighbouring parishes. For the character of such boroughs, see passim Articles on Reform in the Edinburgh Review. They are—as all the world knows—open to all sorts of illegitimate influence; and, we may assert, throughout them all a vast increase of bribery and corruption. In them, would not the Aristocracy seek to establish or confirm their influence? And are Whig-reformers enamoured (we are not) of such disputes and disturbances as those of Newark, Salisbury, and Stamford? But by what influence would such boroughs be swayed? That of wealth and high hereditary station. What would be the consequence? Nay—you do not ask—for you know—Precarious power in the hands of the richest and highest of the Peerage, or the greatest

Commoners—the general adoption of means to maintain it, which must always be revolting and unpopular, and which could not fail to weaken the Aristocracy far more than any power so acquired could strengthen them, by exciting against them fierce and permanent feelings of hostility among the lower orders of the people.

But what will be the tendency of the additions to the county representation, or the divisions of the counties into districts? Surely those features are sufficiently aristocratical. Sir John Walsh acknowledges they are—but then too aristocratical to win his admiration. The divisions of the counties into districts will, he thinks, add to the local influence of great estates. Do they need it? No. The large and remote counties are, it is well known, the strongholds of the great landed proprietors. Whereas, in the small counties, estates are more divided, and overpowering influence less known. "I acknowledge them," says he, "that it is an aristocratic, and a highly aristocratic measure. All that it does not give to pure Democracy, it disposes of in favour of the highest and richest of the Peerage and landed proprietors. The intermediate ground is entirely swept away."

These are large views—and no doubt they require illustration and confirmation, which Sir John Walsh has not been able to give them within the limits of a pamphlet. We hope that the evil will not prove so wide as he fears; for then, what will be a Reformed Parliament? The most independent, and perhaps the most enlightened portion of the British people—the less distinguished gentry—will seldom sit there; for the old straight avenues will be shut up—and felled "their old contemporary trees." To get seats, men must canvass large provincial towns, a pretty and pleasant pastime indeed—not cheap but nasty—and in which will best succeed the rabble-rousing Demagogue with a long red tongue, fiery face, and inflamed liver, or the rabble-buying Nabob with a long yellow purse, sallow face, and no liver at all. So much for the large provincial towns—and who will rule the counties? Sir John Walsh thinks—those who are "strong in the possession of the highest rank, of great and hereditary landed estates, advantages in short, to which men must be born, and which the exertions of a life, however meritorious, however successful, could never attain." Such, when the new system has settled, will, he thinks, be the inevitable issues; and so do ye—but, we add, subject still to confusion, disturbance, and occasional reversal.

Between the democratical and the aristocratic powers to be created by the Bill, what shall maintain the balance? The private gentry of England are extinguished. They have not been weighed in the balance and found wanting—for centuries have they been a race of patriots—but they are excluded from the grand national council. And lo! smiling graciously or loftily on the one side, the Patricians—and on the other, scornfully and grimly, the Plebeians. The one what-do-we-call-it full of Dukes, Earls, and Lords, kicks the beam—the contents fly first up, heads over heels, in the face of heaven, and then fall down, in one convulsive sprawl, on the bosom of earth. The other what-do-we-call-it, "heaped up full measure, and running over" with Plebeians, sits like a stone on a rock—the Democracy yells ca ira—and there is—a Republic. And a very good form of government, too, it is to those who like it, but sadly addicted to sudden change into a military and murderous despotism.

But it has been most truly said that now "the fanaticism of democracy is in its full tide of life and vigour." The lower classes in this country—and too many of the middle—are more than dissatisfied and discontented with the existing order of things, both in government and in society—they hate them with a perfect hatred. Never at any other time—spite of all the pretended improvement of the people in knowledge—were they so ignorant of the real sources of the permanent blessings they, as Britons, enjoy, and of the real causes of those not unfrequent hardships under which they suffer. Let us not scruple to say that they have shewn themselves too often, within these two or three years, as blind as brutal, as deaf as dangerous; and that their power now is the power of an irrational and ferocious giant. They are for taking things into their own hands. They must have their own House of Commons; and as for the House of Lords, why the Times, who alternately threatens and truckles to the monster, lately told us, that if the Peers shewed any hesitation about passing the Bill, it would be rescued from their delay by a process as summary as irresistible. Why mince the matter?—the populace would put a period to the peerage. Do you doubt? Then think of the Press. One of that power—the Spectator—smiles at us for saying that the Press will return a vast number of members to a "Reformed Parliament." We understand his smile—it is one of the most intense internal satisfaction. Were there more Magas—more Standards—more spirit—union—resolution—among the Tories—we had almost said more plague, pestilence, and famine, battle, murder, and sudden death, to scatter amongst the Whigs and Radicals—we might yet save the constitution.

Oh! hood-winked the great goggle-eyes that will not see what is in preparation with the populace for the people! and with the people for the King.

But we conclude with asking the Ministry one single question. What if their Bill prove indeed to be an Aristocratical Bill? Why a Wild Beast will tear them into pieces. And in tearing them into pieces, that Wild Beast will not only be obeying the instincts of his nature, but in that obedience be likewise acting in strict accordance with the dictates of reason and justice. For the mob believes—is allowed—has been taught to believe the Bill to be, in its principles and its details, democratic;—and who will deny that nature, education, time, and opportunity, all unite to make him of principles and details the best of all judges?—Democratic it is to his heart's no longer insatiable desires—and see ye not how he hobbles—hear ye not how he howls—in long privation impatient of provender, and proving that the Mostodon is neither a fabled nor an obsolete monster?

The Ministry will have something else to carry—by and by—besides the Bill. But the nation—we suspect—has no great trust in the strength of its back and shoulders. In the midst of all this democratical delirium, they are not popular. Nobody shouts their names—the very mobs seem ignorant of their existence. The cry is still—the King—the Bill! But the men of the Three patriotic Pledges and the one blundering Budget are with the populace “strictly anonymous;” and the foolish Ministers are merged in their wicked measure. Soon will they have to stand a terrible trial. For a strong and stern party, determined on the most radical changes in all institutions, though now, for the furtherance of their own schemes, they are with the Ministers, will, by and by, be against them with a republican and implacable enmity; while the Conservative Party, still strong in numbers, in a common creed, and in their devotion to the cause of freedom and their country, will fall upon them flying in discomfiture from the demagogues. Mercenaries at best—the Mercenaries of a Faction—they will fly—or fall between two fires—poured upon them from the foes as well as friends of the Constitution. That will be a Final Settlement—but the Bill is not one—if you think so, go read the Examiner. You will find no shilly-shallying in his straightforward and vigorous columns. If he had believed the Bill to be aristocratical, he would have torn it into shreds and patches. But he sees in it—not an end—but a beginning; and his eyes are piercers. Till now he never hesitated to scatter his scorn over the Whigs. Even now he is but barely civil; nor will his courtesies continue one moment longer after they begin to shew a returning anxiety for their “Order.” By an entire abandonment of the interests of their own class—that is, in the light in which they have considered them all their lives long, up to the period of this blessed Bill—can they hope to possess the favour of that formidable section, of which his talents—and we scruple not to add—in our rooted enmity to his principles—his political integrity—for though pernicious, he is honest—have made him—as far as the Press is at work for revolution—the Leader?

By way, then, of L'Envoi, let us say or sing—that if the Mob smells deceit and delusion in this Bill of yours, and finds that he has been cheated, we would not stand in your shoes—() Ministers!—for a trifle; for the shoes will be all that is left of you—and your rumps will be in a worse predicament than ever a Pump-Parliament.

THE LATE ELECTIONS IN ENGLAND.

DEAR NORTH,

THE decree has gone forth, and been executed—that advice which a peer of the realm, in his place in Parliament, told the King's Ministers could only be given to the Sovereign by men with the heads of fools, or the hearts of traitors, has been given, and acted upon; and the people, under the influence of universal and frantic excitement, have rushed forward to undo themselves. Unwilling as I am to give way to forebodings of gloom and disaster, knowing that cheerful exertion better becomes a man who is anxious to do effectual service in a good cause; yet, when I reflect upon the events of the last four weeks—when I see how all the ties of sense and feeling, which bound men to one another in relation to public affairs, and which have so long given strength, and dignity, and solidity to the British empire, have been torn asunder in order that that may be done, which when done, must for ever prevent these ties from being reunited—when I reflect upon these things, I am oppressed with no dishonourable melancholy, and, with a heart struggling with its own heaviness, sit down to communicate my thoughts upon what has so recently taken place before our eyes.

And first—there is a mystery in the matter which has not yet been fathomed, and we have yet to discover the hidden source of the general and active revolt which has taken place against all the principles and feelings which have heretofore appeared to actuate the great body of the English yeomanry. The English elections are now over, all but one—the great and valiant struggle in Northampton—and from one end of the kingdom to the other, from Cornwall to Cumberland, and in no places more conspicuously than in these extremes themselves, a simultaneous burst of disloyalty has taken place to old friends, old feelings, and hereditary attachments; while reasonable gratitude for long services, both in public and in private, both general and local, seems to be utterly erased from the hearts of men, where one would have thought it was fixed as safely and as certainly as the love of their wives and children. Shall it be said that all this is in consequence of the conviction of their understanding, that the changes proposed to be effected by the Reform Bill ought to be effected? Ridiculous! The yeomanry, who have come forward with such vivacity in favour of the Reform Bill, know no more of its provisions than they do of the Koran. I have myself been among them, and talked with them as they flocked from village and hamlet to range themselves under the banner which they and their fathers before them had, up to this time, always opposed; and when I spoke of certain changes proposed to be made by the Reform Bill, without mentioning that they formed a part of the measure for which they were so clamorous, the mention of such changes was received with indignation, and they were ready to have signed a petition against them. That every weaver occupying a house for which he paid, or promised, a rent of ten pounds a year, with no more property in the country than his loom and the clothes upon his back, should have as much privilege in returning representatives as they whose families, for generations past, had dwelt upon their own land, seemed to them monstrous; yet still they would go forward and vote for “the King and Reform.” That a contracted view of the duty imposed upon them by their personal loyalty to the sovereign, has greatly influenced the English yeomanry in the late election, admits of no doubt; and that it was cunningly taken advantage of by the revolutionary leaders, was from the first apparent; but even this, powerfully influential as it was—and none but those who saw some of the election scenes in England, can well imagine the force and enthusiasm derived from the notion, that the will of the King and the Reform Bill were identical—even this is hardly sufficient to account for the headlong infatuation which bore down every consideration that might have been expected to affect the hearts and minds of Englishmen.

Shall we believe, according to the mean and disgusting flattery of the popular candidates upon the hustings, that the "diffusion of intelligence" has wrought this great change, and made men cast aside the old mooring chains of hereditary feeling and affection, as the antiquated and rusty bonds of prejudice? Intelligence! alas! for such pitiable vanity—such gross delusion—such wretched folly, "pranked in reason's garb." Intelligence! who that has ever heard the empty prate—the noisy nothings—the worst ideas stolen from the worst newspapers, repeated in the barrenest commonplace of language, which these talkers about "intelligence" constantly put forth, without feeling at his stomach a something extremely resembling sea-sickness, at the bare recollection of a thing so nauseous? Well might the bard who sung of the spleen, be reminded of that disgusting class of creatures, whose paltry smatterings of knowledge, floating upon an enormous tide of vanity and impertinence, leads them to chatter about intelligence, the proper spirit of which they have no capacity for feeling.

"Witlings—brisk fools, curst with half sense"
That stimulates their impotence."

No—the part which the electors of England have taken with regard to the Reform Bill, is the result of ignorance—ignorance of the Bill itself—ignorance of the effects which it is calculated to produce upon the frame of society, both social and political—and above all, ignorance of the real character of the men who have advised the measure, and of the circumstances under which it was advised.

"How pitious, then, that there should be such dearth
Of knowledge; that whole myriads should unite
To work against themselves such fell despite—
Should come in frenzy, and in drunken mirth,
Impatient to put out the only light
Of liberty that yet remains on earth!"

Never, indeed, was the real liberty of England in more jeopardy, for real civil liberty is to be found in the permanent and protecting power of law, and the change which the madness of the time rages after, is one which must, of necessity, destroy the stability of every institution, unless it be expected to revolutionize human nature as well as the British constitution, and to make the breath of popular feeling as regular and steady as the trade winds.

Ignorance has been, I maintain, at the root of all the revolutionary hubbub, under the influence of which a Parliament has been elected, which it is frightful to behold, for it has not been elected to deliberate for the people, but to do their will—a will which some will repent of, and almost all will change before six months are gone. By what various channels, in what way, and to what extent, this ignorance has been wrought upon, so as to produce so violent and so universal an impression upon the people, is, as I have said, a difficulty which has yet to be cleared up; but added to all other grounds of alarm upon the present occasion, there is this, that a power is at work producing tremendous effects, the operation of which is probably not guarded against, only because it is not seen nor understood. It would be needless and foolish to deny, that at this moment a democratical frenzy pervades and possesses the nation, from whatever source it may have sprung.—The seas which divide us from the continent, and have preserved us from the dreadful encroachment of foreign enemies, have not been sufficient to guard us from the contagion of that political fever which rages there, laying prostrate national welfare and social happiness, amid a wild uproar of senseless hollow vapouring about liberty and the tricolor. By whatever means the infection has been communicated, we certainly have caught it:—the poison rushes through the veins of the country, producing like effects of vast and intemperate folly; and it is only in the providence of God to say where it shall have an end, and what shall bring back the hearts and minds of this people to a healthful state, if, indeed, that can be hoped at all, without a fearful interval of scourging and suffering.

Although there is so much difficulty in assigning a cause adequate to the effect which has been produced upon the yeomanry of England in warping their better feelings, and imbuing them with a taste for revolution, yet some of the things which have contributed to this state of mind lie upon the surface, and these I shall briefly notice. The most important has been the unremitting exertion of the newspaper press, which, with but very few exceptions, has been devoted to the promotion of revolutionary principles. At the present crisis, nine-tenths of the newspapers read by the people labour daily or weekly to inflame and mislead the minds of their readers, by every species of fraudulent and exaggerated statement which considerable skill and habitual perseverance in lying can suggest. It is no wonder that this should have produced a very powerful effect upon a people who are almost all, more or less, readers of newspapers. Even those who do not read are impressed by others who do, and every village ale-house where a newspaper is taken in, becomes a fountain of dangerous and revolutionary principles, which find their way into the house of every farmer and yeoman. This is an evil which cannot be combatted without great exertion; but if not met, it alone would in time be sufficient to destroy the good spirit and the salutary institutions of this country. Every thing must sink before the violence of an industrious and skilfully conducted press, if that press is allowed to be all but unanimous on the side of revolution. But why is it so? First, because the newspapers which flatter the people and their prejudices, and tell them agreeable lies, are the most likely to be preferred by them; and, secondly, so far from an additional exertion being made by the conservative party on that account, to meet the revolutionists upon their own ground, and outwrite them in the newspapers, as they are outwritten in other periodicals, these great engines of political influence have been greatly neglected, and with disgraceful tameness and quiescence the Tory party have looked on, while almost the whole force both of the metropolitan and provincial newspaper press, has been zealously directed against them. The doctrine on politics, or on any other subject, which at first appears to a man foolish or revolting, if it be continually presented to him day after day, with fresh arguments in its favour, will soon become tolerated, and in the end will probably be adopted by him, unless he use means to counteract the effect of habitual repetition. If, then, the leading newspapers, which every man who mingles in the world, or the world's business, must read, have been gained over to the advocacy of revolutionary principles, there is, and there can be no chance of adequately meeting this evil but by making newspapers as good in every matter of detail as those which are emphatically said to "lead" the public, and which shall direct the minds of the people to sound and sober views of rational liberty, and to the valuable-ness of the remarkable institutions which have so long preserved the nation powerful and glorious upon the earth, amid the distractions of political conflict, and the crash of revolutions with which Europe has been visited.

Again it has been said, and with truth, that the personal habits and deportment of the Tory lords and gentlemen have not been such as to win the affection of the middle classes and yeomanry in the country. They have not mingled with them, nor identified themselves with them as they should have done; and therefore there lurked secretly, in the breasts of a great many, a desire to avail themselves of the first plausible opportunity to evince their sense of the cold, and, as it appeared to them, disdainful conduct of the Tory magnates of the district. This disposition was easily seen, and readily taken advantage of by the Whigs, who have made it their business personally to ingratiate themselves with those very persons whom the Tories had alienated or offended; and thus not only was political support very much withdrawn from Tory candidates, on grounds merely personal, but even where support was given, it was by no means with that heartiness and zeal and lively spirit which distinguished the support of the other side. On the side of the Tories, support was in many cases given as a political duty merely;—on the other side it was given with that vivacity which accompanies an action that is personally agreeable. The influential Tories have been so long accustomed to high office—have been so habitually occupied with official business, and so far removed from the necessity of attention to those particulars which ensure popularity, that it must be confessed they have something to learn in this regard, and they will now see how useful, and I should hope agreeable also, it will be, to cultivate a more friendly personal intercourse with those who expect that the confidence which they give will be requited with courtesy. There is no doubt that so far as political feeling went, the Marquis of Chandos was as likely to lose his County seat as other Tory lords and gentlemen whom the reforming frenzy has ousted, yet he was triumphantly returned through his personal popularity. He personally interests himself in whatever is of interest to the resident gentry of the county, and therefore there is no power which the combined zeal, cunning, and hatred of the Whigs can bring to bear against him, which will avail to deprive him of the confidence of the county to which he belongs.

A third reason for the Tory candidates being so generally unsuccessful, is that they too easily give way. In every case where the Tory candidates withdrew, not only was there an immediate loss on one side, and a triumph on the other, but the consequences extended themselves to other places, and caused a total alteration of the previously existing balance of influence. Had London not been given up so early in the field, it is by no means clear that Kent might not have been contested with success—but the panic of “resignation” spread, and people stood aghast, instead of fighting their battle manfully, even with the least hope of success. In the northern Counties the consequent loss to the Tory party is manifest—Yorkshire, Lancashire, Northumberland, and Cumberland, were all to have been contested, but in all except the last, the candidates gave way without a struggle—the whole force of money, and electioneering material which the ministerial party had collected for all these contests, was of course immediately devoted towards Cumberland, and the County was lost to the Tory party. Had contests taken place in Lancashire and Northumberland, whatever might have been the success there, Cumberland would have been saved from the undivided domination of revolutionary feeling, and the absurdity of sending a person to Parliament who himself declared on the hustings, that he was not “a fit and proper representative” for the county. I know it may be said that these counties could not have been contested without a vast expenditure, and without exciting much tumultuous agitation, and I well know how naturally any man of good feeling must turn away with loathing from the prospect of the disgusting scenes of a contested election; but we should not let the revolutionary party get all the advantage of thus scaring us from our right, and if there ever was a time in which great sacrifices for the sake of county representation ought to be made, that time was on the late occasion.

Something however must be allowed to the unpopular candidates on the score of the danger of personal violence which in many instances threatened them. No man is called upon rashly to peril his life in an election brawl, and some who have thus ventured have become the victims of the brutal ferocity of the revolutionary mob. It would be well if those who sit at home in their closets, or by their firesides, and write or talk of the increased “intelligence” of the people, as the cause of the change in the selection of their representatives, would take a journey to a contested election now and then, and see how this “intelligence” manifests itself—that they would witness the shocking brutality—the gluttony and drunkenness—the yells, and the ferocious violence of a mob whom nothing but force, such as influences cattle, can control. At the late elections in England, there were several carried by mere brute force—the voters on one side were escorted to the poll with acclamation, while, on the other, they were prevented from going to the poll by violence offered to their persons—many were severely wounded, and some dangerously. In other places the terror of physical force was such that contests were not attempted. Is this the “intelligence of the people?” Is it of such patronage as this, that those calling themselves Parliament-any Reformers are so proud? And let it not be said that it is to the mere mob and none other, that this violence is to be attributed. Those who set them on, or who "hallooed" them on, to use one of Mr O'Connell's strongest expressions, were not of the mere mob, but such as make speeches and write in newspapers; and some instances there were of men of property, with a number of persons in their employment, who were not voters, letting loose their workmen at the time of the election, with no other conceivable intention but to overcome, by brute force, the freedom of election, and to effect that by the violence of a mob, which they could not effect by fair and unobstructed voting.

Amid the general defection from old principles and old friends, it is a cheering reflection that the Universities have done their duty. If there be any just criterion of the sentiments of the educated classes of England, it is to be found in the decision of the large constituency who elect the University members. With regard to Dublin, where the election lies in the Corporation of the University alone, there may be some ground for alleging that no particular weight is to be attached to its decision; but in the English Universities, whose Masters of Arts, with the right of voting, are scattered all over the kingdom, and actively engaged in the affairs of life, it is of the very highest importance to find them at such a time promptly and vigorously deciding against the headlong proceedings of the King's government. I rejoice more especially over Cambridge, upon the old principle, that there is more joy over that which was lost and is found again, than over that which we have always had in possession. In Cambridge an earnest and vigorous struggle was made—minds and bodies were heartily and zealously engaged in the good cause, and thus the victory was obtained. Had any languor, or indifference, or relaxation of exertion, crept into the proceedings, a different result would have followed, but the young men of the professions had their hearts in the matter, and carried the day. Let then the result of the Cambridge Election, as it fills us with good hope concerning the principles of those who really ought to lead the country, also furnish us with an example to be imitated. Bad as the aspect of affairs may be, and it is sufficiently gloomy, it would be worse than madness to sit down in inactive despondency. There is yet much remaining to be done, and, by spirit, energy, and discretion, much may yet be accomplished. It is not presuming too much, from the returns that have been already received, to take the number in the new Parliament who will be opposed to "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill," at two hundred and seventy. This to be sure will leave a large majority in its favour; but a strong minority is something, and a few minorities of 270 would make Ministers feel in rather an uncomfortable position. Besides the Bill,—even the amended Bill,—was full of errors which every man acquainted with the localities of the places where the measure has to operate could point out. These must not be lost sight of; some sense of common justice, or the shew of it, must still remain with the ministerial side of the House of Commons, and when palpable errors are held up before them they must pause, and condescend, at least, to their discussion. Let then the Bill be fought point by point,—temperately, fairly, discreetly,—but with unflinching boldness,—let there be no flaggng, no running away from the difficulty and trouble of a determined struggle upon every part and parcel of the Bill, and much—very much will be gained. The people have gone headlong in ignorance of what the Bill is;—long and arduous as were the debates upon it in the House of Commons, it was upon the general question of the goodness or badness of our present representative system—the new measure has yet to be sifted—its inadequacy shewn—its injustice exposed—let that be done as it ought to be—let the ground be contended inch by inch, and a victory will be won, in winning round the common sense of the people.

But without, as well as within the walls of Parliament, a victory is yet to be gained by vigorous, patient, and good-humoured exertion. For the moment the Tory lords and gentlemen are perhaps sore at the treatment they have received,—they well may be,—but to let such a feeling continue were folly ;—perhaps they have deserved some of the disappointment they have met with. Let them deserve it no more,—let them cultivate the personal good will of the gentry of their counties, and organize matters against the next election. If every Tory gentleman took the pains to make a list of the names of all the freeholders in his neighbourhood,—to ascertain the side in politics on which they generally voted,—and to teach those of his own party the means of making their freeholds legally perfect,—so that no doubt could exist about their right to vote when the election came on,—a great part of the trouble and difficulty which generally attends a contest would be saved, and the party possessing such information would come into the field with almost a certainty of the quantity of support he might calculate upon. In elections, more than any thing else, knowledge is power, and no exertion should be spared either in obtaining and digesting this knowledge, or in conciliating the good will of the people, and instructing them upon the real nature of the Reform Bill, respecting which they have imbibed such vague and extravagant notions.

In Scotland you have made a better fight than we can boast of. I flung my hat in the air until it almost hit the sun, when I heard of the ejection of Jeffrey from Edinburgh. The county, too, has returned a good man and true, and his speech was excellent ; but Sir George Murray's speech at Perth is the best we have yet had upon the present state of political matters, and every one,—even the Times newspaper,—is loud in its praise.—Your old friend,

THE WHIG-HATER.
